UMass students survive scare after cruise ship nearly capsizes

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

What was supposed to be nine days filled with relaxation and fun left two University of Massachusetts students grateful to escape with their lives when their cruise ship nearly tipped over in July.

"There were people all around the boat bleeding," said UMass junior Elizabeth Sweeney, who was boarded on the ship along with her family and boyfriend, UMass sophomore Charles Thebado.

The Crown Princess was on a nine-day Western Caribbean cruise and had just left Port Canaveral en route to New York on July 18, when its crew reported problems with the steering equipment and the 113,000-ton ship listed hard to one side, sending furniture and debris flying about the boat and injuring 240 passengers, according to cruise line official.

Thebado and Sweeney, along with Sweeney's sister and her boyfriend, were in Thebado's windowless ninth-floor bedroom when they began to hear a loud vibrating sound emanating from the ship.

"I didn't think anything of it," said Sweeney who had traveled to Alaska with Princess Cruises in 2003. "Big ships make noises like that every once and awhile."

As the boat continued to tilt, Sweeney's sister and her boyfriend grew concerned and stood up.

"All of a sudden the boat lurched, everything not bed down flew across the room, along with us," said Sweeney.

"We were all wedged against the door," said Thebado.

With the group remarkably unharmed from the fall, they wedged open their bedroom door wide enough to fit Sweeney's sister out into the hallway to open the door.

Once outside the room, the group witnessed the pure chaos that had emerged throughout the ship.

"People were frantic, crying, yelling, looking for people, screaming to find their parents," said Thebado. "We didn't know what was going on or what to do."

"The captain got on while we were tipping and sounded out of breath. He said everything would be 'Ok' and that we didn't need our lifejackets," said Sweeney. "It seemed like the boat was tilted for a long time, but it may have been only a minute or two," said Sweeney.

The ship, which hand tilted 38 degrees towards the starboard side, eventually leveled out, leaving Sweeney and Thebado, along with over 3,000 passengers, to search for members of her family scattered across the 19-floor ship.

Sweeney eventually found the rest of her family, all of them unharmed. The same could not be said for nearly 300 of the ships passengers.

"My dad was sitting by the pool when the ship began to tip," said Sweeney. "He said the water came gushing out of the pool and people who were in the pool were shoved out and sliding all around the ship."

"There were a ton of people lying on ground bleeding with crew running around frantically," said Thebado. "The pool water was starting to rush down the stairwells and throughout the entire boat."

"Everything was a mess," said Sweeney. "Food from the buffet had mixed with the water and was floating around the ship, there was broken glass everywhere and we didn't have any shoes."

As the terror finally winded down, Sweeney and her family shared each others harrowing accounts of where they were when the ship began to tilt.

Sweeney's grandfather, former Marine John O'Brien, was reading a book on the balcony when the ship began to tilt.

Sweeney, who was pushed up against railing, was forced to hold on until the ship was leveled.

O'Brien was unharmed.

Though federal investigations continue, Princess Cruises president Alan Buckelow wrote in a letter to passengers that "the incident was due to human error and the appropriate personnel changes have been made."

No further specifics were given in the letter, which was posted on the company's Web site.

Princess is one of 12 brands operated by Miami-based Carnival Corp., the world's largest cruise operator. The Crown Princess was christened in June 2006 before embarking on its maiden voyage to the Caribbean from its home terminal in New York's Brooklyn borough.

Fewer freshman expected for 2007

By Anna Dollanitis

The freshman class at the University of Massachusetts will reach approximately 4000 students at the onset of the 2006-2007 academic year, dropping from an all-time high of 4,427 students in 2005-2006.

"The issue of the number of freshmen is actually the result of a combination of circumstances. The most important is that we try to keep the total undergraduate student population at about the same size, although as we finish renovating space and adding classrooms and faculty, as well as residence hall beds, we may be able to grow to a somewhat more competitive size," said Chancellor John Lombardi. "The reason this freshman class is smaller is to compensate for the size of the graduating class."

The decrease in students came on the tail of a particularly serious housing crisis during the 2005-2006 academic year.

Students arriving on campus last fall were surprised to find that because of a surplus of accepted students planning to enroll, the university would be unable to accommodate students in the campus housing system. Upwards of 700 students, mostly freshmen and transfer students, were assigned to temporary housing in campus residence halls, as well as in off-campus hotels during the Fall 2005 semester.

"When I found out I was in temporary housing, I was disappointed and confused as to what exactly it meant and how long I'd be there. I felt differently about my roommates and my dorm–even though I was there a whole semester it

Carroll recounts terrifying ordeal

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

Nearly five months after being safely returned to the United States, former University of Massachusetts alumna Jill Carroll has unveiled a harrowing account of her nine-month abduction through an 11-part series in the Boston-based Christian Science Monitor, where she is currently employed.

The 28-year-old journalist was kidnapped Jan. 7 by a previously unknown group calling itself the Renegade Brigade. Her Iraqi interpreter, Alan Enwiya, was shot dead.

Carroll, whose captors treated her as an "honored guest" according to Carroll's account, tried to convert her to Islam, made her recite the Koran and expressed their bitter hatred for America.

Below is an overview of Carroll's ordeal, with excerpts from her series in the Monitor:

"One day, hopefully, one day, America, all of America gone," said one of my guards early in my captivity. "I don't quite understand," I said. "All America?" My female jailer Um Ali, listening in on the conversation, translated the sentiment into simpler Arabic for me. "No journalists, no people, no nothing," she said.

But Carroll's captors also constantly made efforts to ensure Carroll was comfortable and remained sane, leaving her confused in her their true intentions. The group even gave her a gold necklace upon her release along with $400.

They took pains to explain they wouldn't take the $100 in cash they'd found in my pockets.

"When you return to America, this with you," said one, waving the $100 bill.

Who were these people? Again and again, I saw that their beliefs would allow them to deprive me of my freedom and kill Alan, yet also lead them to express sincere concern over my health and well-being as their hostage. Kidnapping was justified but taking money was not.

Carroll was kept in numerous different locations and was surrounded by a "family" of captors that included armed guards, obedient wives and young, playful children.

If I pretended hard enough, I could almost fool myself

UMass strikes deal to buy Frat Row

TOAN TRINH/COLLEGIAN

Five pieces of property on North Pleasant Street, formally home to four fraternities and one sorority, will be dissembled in the near future, as part of an agreement between the property owner and UMass officials.

By Eric Athas

A deal has been reached, a price has been set, and the destruction of five Frat Row houses is imminent, according to University of Massachusetts officials.

The five pieces of property on North Pleasant Street, formally home to four fraternities and one sorority, will be dissembled in the near future, as part of an agreement between the company which owns the property and UMass, according to Joyce Hatch, Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance.

The Department of Capitol Asset Management (DECAM) has been negotiating on the University's behalf. Hatch said throughout the summer, DECAM has been going back and forth in talks with representatives from Alpha Tau Gamma Inc (ATG), the company which owns the land.

"Part of the agreement in the offer that was made on our behalf included the buildings being demolished, and the land being graded and seeded," said Hatch. "As soon as [ATG] is comfortable signing this agreement, they would be quickly demolishing them, that's my expectation."

The properties are located at 375, 387, 389, 395 and 401 North Pleasant St.

Hatch said the offer made by UMass was accepted by ATG, but the details of the salesman service agreement are still being worked out by lawyers representing both sides.

"ATG was sent something to sign, but I don't know where they are with that," said Hatch.

Negotiators for ATG were not available for comment, while the company's treasurer, Jim Mulcahy, declined to comment on the alleged agreement.

Last semester, the houses located at 389 and 401 North Pleasant St. were both operating fraternities, and the house located at 387 North Pleasant St. was a sorority.

But last April, the Daily Collegian first reported that the presidents of the two fraternities and one sorority were told they would not be living in their houses beginning Fall 2006. The three presidents, Ben Levine of Alpha Epsilon Pi, Long Tran of Pi Delta Psi, and Teavy Moeung of the Sigma Psi Zeta sorority, were fuming after they reportedly received a certified letter informing them of their forced departure. The presidents also claimed the property manager filled them in on the news.

Despite claims from the presidents, UMass and ATG officials did not mention any movement in the deal until recently. The other two houses, located at 375 and 395 North pleasant St., were vacant last year. Now all five houses are currently vacant, and will be indefinitely, according to Michael Wiseman, Director of the Office of Greek Affairs.

"It's just a matter of time before they are destroyed and dissembled," said Wiseman. "In terms of fraternity housing, traditional fraternity housing is not going to be a model here anymore."

Wiseman said of the 12 operating fraternities and sororities on campus, only six currently are living in traditional houses.

This recent agreement comes after over three years of discussions between UMass and ATG. In March of 2003, after the University didn't make an offer, ATG posted the five pieces of property on ebay.com.

Officials may alter school-year calender

By Melissa D'Amico
Collegian Staff

In hopes of making the school year most beneficial for students and faculty, officials at the University of Massachusetts are reviewing the school's current academic calendar and discussing possible adjustments.

"There are currently various conversations ongoing about our calendar," said Chancellor John V. Lombardi. "For various reasons we've been asked by many parents and students to review our calendar and see if an adjustment would improve opportunities for our students."

Lombardi said students and parents have made suggestions to correspond with other universities. He said among those suggestions were earlier starts to the semesters and a shorter winter session.

"They want to reduce the long winter session," said Lombardi. "They want a calendar just like their friends at other universities."

The university has been asked to review the academic calendar for reasons including more competition with other similarly sized universities, greater summer opportunities for students, and more adequate time for the university to complete construction projects.

"All of the universities we compete with for students have an earlier start date for the fall and spring," said Lombardi. "Generally, the start is before Labor Day or immediately after Labor Day for the fall, and for the spring semester around January 12 or 14. A revision of our current calendar would enable the Amherst campus to become more competitive."

Many UMass students are put at a disadvantage when applying for the best internships and co-ops because of the University's late May exam schedule, explained Lombardi.

A calendar change would also allow the University to hold graduation exercises around May 17, a date consistent with that of similar universities. An earlier graduation date would also allow the University to expand its summer term classes, and begin offering 4-week courses that other universities offer.

"We get out of school so much later than anyone I know," said UMass junior Susan Allen, who is in favor of a calendar change.

Allen, who is a member of the UMass swim team, said a change would make life less boring for athletic teams during semester breaks.

"We are all alone on campus for like a week or more just swimming, no classes or anything and it gets really boring," she said. "I also think that Christmas break is so long that people get out of the routine of school. They get used to doing nothing just like summer."

The longer summer period, which would result from a calendar change, would give construction and renovation projects greater flexibility to complete projects, and factor in construction delays that the current schedule does not provide, according to Lombardi.

"I believe we should keep [the calendar] the way it is," said senior Mike Anderson. "That way students will have enough time to make money to afford the ever growing cost of tuition, books, and even gas to get to and from school."

Despite the fact that a calendar change may be beneficial for many students, other considerations must be taken before a calendar change can be approved.

"We must consult with our faculty through the Faculty Senate, with various student groups, with our Five College colleagues, and with the UMass System office, among many other constituencies," he said.

Faculty Senate Secretary Ernest May said that the faculty's thoughts on the calendar change depend on which month they believe is more beneficial to have two weeks for scholarship and research.

"A few seem to favor January, but my sense is that more would prefer May," said May. "While I know I can't speak for all faculty members, I am confident that a majority of the faculty would support the change if it is deemed to be in the best interests of students."

The UMass academic calendar is currently still under review, and any decision regarding the change to the calendar will be made after a formal proposal is created.

North apartments open for student debate

By Shauna Staveley
Collegian Correspondent

Among the handful of major construction projects on campus last year, the North Residential Apartments at the University of Massachusetts has been cared for like a newborn baby.

UMass provided 24-hour live Web cam footage, along with a Web site of architectural renderings and updates of their first residential development in 35 years.

The recent opening of the North Apartments has students weighing the financial and social benefits, and university officials backing up the $92.5 million construction project.

"Well I think that, the closeness to the campus itself, the classes, any activities that you want to do as a student – everything is in walking distance," said UMass Operations Manager, Aida Claudio. "As opposed to if you live in an off-campus apartment complex you have to drive in, look for parking that's not going to be anywhere near where you want to go, due to parking restrictions you have here."

"It's brand new, includes all of your utilities, and completely furnished. You don't have to worry about bringing those things in," Claudio said.

Most residents living in off-campus housing agree that many of the apartments don't have that pristine look to them and accept that their apartments have suffered the wear-and-tear of past tenants, due to the constant moving in and out of furniture, and partying.

Off-campus students also realize that they have to deal with nine or 12-month leases, security deposits, utilities, and expensive rent, depending on the complex and the amount of people signed onto the lease.

North Apartments has an approximate monthly cost of $750 per apartment roommate, without any financial aid factored in.

Liz Brown, UMass Assistant Director for Finance, said that UMass looked at market rates, what other schools were charging for apartment-style living, construction costs, and the debt UMass would take on with the project to determine the cost of living in North. Brown also said that the price they determined was not a moneymaking venture, as the university is simply trying to cover the costs of staffing, furniture, and utilities, particularly central air-conditioning.

Massive fire destroys Amherst bank

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

A spectacular fire tore through the Bank of America at the corner of Triangle and East Pleasant streets Aug. 25, leaving the branch behind as nothing more than a pile of rubble.

Amherst Fire Chief Keith E. Hoyle said investigators have narrowed the possible cause of the blaze to something electrical in the mechanical space in the void above the first floor."

"Probably an HVAC (Heating, Ventilation, & Air Conditioning) fan, but they cannot be certain," said Hoyle.

The fire reportedly began at 6:30 p.m.; 30 minutes after the last employee left the building.

Andy Martin was withdrawing money from the drive-through ATM when he noticed people staring at the side of the bank talking on their cell phones.

"I had parked my car and gotten out to see what they were all looking at when I saw smoke coming from the roof," said Martin. "I moved my car, and when I came back later, the bank was gone."

Five other firefighters narrowly escaped harm, Hoyle said; by exiting the building through the first-floor windows seconds before the ceiling fell.

One Amherst firefighter, Larry Tebo, was injured with a pulled hamstring and a broken finger. He was removed by ambulance to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton and is expected to miss two weeks of work, said Hoyle.

Video footage of the fire can be seen on dailycollegian.com.

The video shows flames shooting from the wood structure and rapidly spreading throughout the structure in a matter of minutes.

The blaze marked the second major fire here this month. A condominium at 8 Emerson Court exploded and burned last week, leaving two people hospitalized. That blaze was caused by liquefied gas vapors, authorities have determined.

North village dorms:
Apartments open as scheduled

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

In recent months, the North Residential Apartments went under several changes of status, keeping students on their heels about what would come next.

The new housing was originally "on-schedule," then was "delayed." And then about a week ago, it was put back on-schedule to open on its originally scheduled date, according to University of Massachusetts campus housing officials.

Despite the on-and-off reports, all four buildings in the new student apartment complex at UMass opened on Sunday, Sept. 3, as scheduled.

John Findley, associate director of Housing Services, said the campus notified students who are living in Building D of the North Residential Area that the facility would open at the same time as the other three buildings. Due to a tight construction schedule, students had been informed earlier last month that a delay of two or three weeks might occur in opening the fourth building.

The delay would have forced over 200 students to find alternative housing for an extended period of time.

The campus had been coordinating regularly with inspection officials as the complex neared completion, Findley said, and he expected occupancy approval to be forthcoming from the state building inspector within this week. Some work will continue in all four buildings after they open, in the common areas only, Findley said.

The $92.9 million complex is the first new housing on campus in 35 years. Dawn Thompson, director of residence life, noted that the facility's 864 beds have made a major difference in what has been a tight housing market. UMass expects to meet all undergraduate requests to live on campus this fall, with no students assigned to live temporarily in off-campus hotels.

Each apartment unit in North Residential will have four single-occupancy bedrooms for a total of 864 beds. The units include two bathrooms and a shared kitchen and living room space.

Ship's tilt leaves 200 hurt

A similar tilt occurred in February on a ship also operated by Princess. Soon after leaving the Port of Galveston, the 2,600-passenger Grand Princess made an emergency turnaround because a passenger suffered a heart attack. The ship tipped sharply to its side, injuring 37.

The cause of that incident, too, was determined to be human error.

All 3,100 passengers and 1,200 crew members were accounted for, the Coast Guard said. But at least 14 people suffered serious injuries, including a child and an adult with injuries considered critical. About 70 others had lesser injuries, said Cape Canaveral Fire Rescue Capt. Jim Watson.

The ship returned immediately after the incident to Port Canaveral, on Florida's east coast, but departed again for New York two days later and picked up a new load of passengers for a similar, shortened cruise.

"We express our sincerest apologies for this regrettable event, and fully understand that this was a distressing experience for all who were on board," Buckelow wrote in the letter on the company's Web site.

At the time of the incident, seas were calm. The ship was on autopilot, with its captain, Andrew Proctor, away from the bridge. The company earlier said Proctor has worked for them nearly 35 years and had an "exemplary record."

Ironically, the Princess Crown, which shows movies every night on their 60 foot screen, was scheduled to show "Titanic" on the day of the near-disaster.

The showing of the film was cancelled.

Besides the whole almost tipping over, I had a great time," said Sweeney. "I think I'd want to go on a smaller boat next time, one that I could see land the whole time."

The Crown Princess was on a nineday Western Caribbean cruise when the 113,000ton vessel nearly tipped over.

Smile, you're on 'Campus Camera'

By Anna Doliantitis
Collegian Staff

A new set of eyes will be watching when students enter and exit residentories at the University of Massachusetts this fall.

The installation of approximately 32[illegible] security cameras, which will cover all 45 residence halls on campus, will be completed for the start of the semester, according to UMass Chancellor John Lombardi.

"[illegible] from the past to the present, and [illegible] we anticipate in the future all institutional crisis campuses are subject to the same kind of security issues. [illegible] residential populations [illegible] across the nation," said Lombardi. "Per[illegible] events that result in loss of property or [illegible] any kind or another [illegible] residence halls remind us of our obligation to continue to improve our security [illegible]."

Cameras already exist in residence halls on campus with the few exceptions being Brooks, Chadbourne, Crabtree, Greenough, Hamlin, Johnson, Kennedy, Leach, Thatcher, and Wheeler.

The planning of the new security measures began in 2000 when David Scott, the chancellor at the time, suggested the installation of security cameras in the Southwest Residential area courtyards, in order to deal effectively with potentially dangerous student behavior, according to Ed Blaguszewski, Director of the UMass News Office.

The UMass Police Department (UMPD) and UMass Housing Services worked collaboratively to make decisions and coordinate the plan.

"The security cameras are focused on doorways, lobbies, and areas of high student congregation," said Blaguszewski emphasizing that the cameras are for security not surveillance. "Police use the cameras to gather evidence, not to watch students 24/7. They're not tracking the students' habits across campus. They don't have the interest, time, or personnel for that."

The UMPD uses its Web site, www.umass.edu/umpd to show clips of security camera footage in an effort to obtain information from students who may have seen the suspects.

In the past, the cameras have been the key for the UMPD to charge law-breakers.

"I was really happy that they had the cameras on campus. I never really thought about how useful they could be until I became a victim," said Cassandra Klimkutz.

During finals week of last semester, Klimkutz and her neighbor in the Field residence hall in Orchard Hill were victims of vandalism to their dorm room doors.

"Dining commons compost, worms, and who knows what else was thrown at our doors and our rooms were ruined to the point where we couldn't even live there for the rest of the year," said Klimkutz.

"After the event, we had no leads and there were no witnesses to help identify possible suspects, but the cops were able to access security cameras in the entrance of my dorm [illegible] the other dorms in the area [illegible] that were able to eventually [illegible] who the vandals were," said Klimkutz.

Of the students responsible were charged with Malicious Destruction of Property and was ordered to pay fines, while the other two students were not charged, according to Klimkutz.

"I would definitely feel much safer with the cameras on campus, and I never thought I would say that, because I am sure that before this incident, I would always say that they were a complete invasion of privacy," said Klimkutz.

In September 2005, a suspicious man was seen entering a dorm room in the Van Meter residence hall in the Central Residential Area, and the UMPD asked students to call the confidential police tip line with any information on the man.

Earlier in 2005, security cameras observed an armed robbery in the same residence hall, however, the robbers left when an alarm sounded.

The increase in security comes following a report released by ABC Primetime News last November, which declared that UMass has the highest violent crime rate of any school in the nation equal to its size. This assertion outraged UMass officials, drawing criticism of being "inaccurate and badly flawed in its methodology," from a November 2005 press release from the UMass News Office.

"ABC News used outdated data to calculate its 'rating' of campus crime, ignoring 2004 data that showed a reduction in violent crime of more than 50 percent at UMass Amherst. ABC News is using only 2002 and 2003 data, although Clery report information for 2004 was due at the Department of Education by Oct. 1, 2005," said Blaguszewski.

The Federal Jeanne Clery Disclosure of Campus Security Policy and Campus Crime Statistics Act "requires colleges and universities across the United States to disclose information about crime on and around their campuses," according to the UMPD Web site.

The statistics from the Clery Act break crime into four categories: crimes occurring on campus, inside residence halls, on non-campus property, and on public property. Furthermore, the statistics show the type of crime, ranging from [illegible] lence crimes such as murder [illegible] sex offense to non-confrontational crimes, such as dr[illegible] violation and bur[illegible]

According to the [illegible] Act statistics [illegible] campus [illegible] residence halls [illegible] 2002-2004.

The [ABC] report dres[illegible] ly from the year the Red Sox Patriots became world champions," said Student Government President, Elvis Mendez. "Consequently, the riots and other abnormal behavior played a large role in distorting the actual figures presented during the report."

The Amherst campus, along with the other system campuses, have demonstrated the existence of strong, ongoing, and constantly improving programs that began many years before ABC's distorted program and will continue long after," said Lombardi.

Although the cameras will provide additional security on campus, the residence hall monitoring security system will continue to exist in its present form.

"Our job is to monitor who goes in and out of the building," said Lombardi.

UMass junior Brittany Smyth, who has been a security monitor since freshman year. "If there is [illegible] cation, we call for either [illegible] security to check it out. [illegible] type of vandalism [illegible] e, it is easier [illegible] and that person [illegible] ion."

[illegible] y measures, which [illegible] l, which [illegible] lice Cadet [illegible] program, in [illegible] provide, "an [illegible] an for suspicious [illegible] potential crime [illegible] various programs [illegible] its service and a [illegible] pression Defense [illegible] d each semester, [illegible] Blaguszewski.

[illegible] walking escorts that [illegible] ople know about. You [illegible] 2123 and ask for an [illegible] anywhere on campus," [illegible]h

[illegible]bardi said the existence of [illegible]eras does not invade the privacy [illegible] students.

"[illegible] security cameras are everywhere," said Lombardi. "When we [illegible] to an AIM machine there is [illegible] security camera that takes our [illegible] ture, similar security cameras are located in many other locations throughout our state and nation and of course, any of us who visit casinos are under constant surveillance all the time." "If you are coming and going and not doing anything wrong you have nothing to worry about. The people who are doing wrong things are the ones who don't want it," said Smyth.

While the security measures will keep an eye on unwanted visitors of dorms, the total cost of the installation is expected to reach $500,000, according to Blaguszewski.

"Because the security upgrades are within the housing system, these current investments will not have any impact on tuition and academic fees, and the current cost is already included in the housing rates," said Lombardi.

UMass wages battle against plagiarism

By Susan King

As part of a nationwide effort, the University of Massachusetts is beginning to crack down on plagiarism with the introduction of unified detection programs and tools to educate students.

Defined in the Student Code of Conduct as "knowingly representing the words of another one's own work in any academic exercise," plagiarism accounts, to some extent, for 10 percent of academic dishonesty cases. This number continues to rise by approximately two cases per year with the increasing ease with which one can "cut and paste" sections of papers from the Internet.

In order to create a unified and efficient system of handling this growing practice the UMass Faculty Senate created the Ad Hoc Committee on Student Plagiarism (ACOSP) in November 2005. The committee is comprised of several faculty members as well as graduate and undergraduate students. Stanley Hertzbach, Professor of Physics and Academic Advising Dean of the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics, and William Curtis Conner, Associate Professor of Chemical Engineering, have co-chaired the committee since December 2005.

Previously, instructors would enter "suspicious" passages into search engines, such as Google, which was inefficient and subjective. In 2005, the library ran a one year trial period of the program Turnitin, which allows a professor to compare a student's paper to Internet sources and previously submitted papers. Turnitin will only show a professor which sections of a paper match different sources, but does not determine if a paper has been plagiarized nor does it do any grading; the final judgment is up to the instructor.

While debating an agreement with Turnitin, members of the Senate expressed concern over the legality and ethicality of the program. Because student's papers are submitted to the database, it could be a possible infringement on copyright and property laws, however, the university was able to reach an agreement which allows UMass submissions to remain separate from papers submitted by other colleges and universities.

According to Dean Hertzbach, this will have very little, if any, impact on the effectiveness of the program because this feature has already been requested by several schools with similar concerns, and it is also standard with Turnitin's main competitor, My Drop Box.

Anne C. Moore, Associate Director for User Services at the W.E.B. DuBois Library says approximately 168 professors registered in Turnitin since February 2005 and about 1700 papers have been submitted.

The university signed a year long license for the 2006 year, along with a one year trial of My Drop Box. Professors are encouraged to submit papers to both services in order to fully experience each program and ultimately decide which would best benefit UMass.

As professors begin to check papers using the database, plagiarism cases are likely to rise sharply before students realize instructors are taking the issue seriously. The Education Subcommittee, part of the ACOSP, is developing a clause that professors will be able to insert into syllabi, stating that computer programs may be used to check students' work.

Several students have also taken an active interest in bring plagiarism on campus to a stop. Jonathan Moreno, a 2006 Chemical Engineering and Biochemistry Molecular Biology graduate, sat on the Academic Honesty Board through the Ombud's office before serving as a student advocate on the ACOSP.

"These students," Moreno said of those who practice academic dishonesty, "are making a farce and mockery out of our educational system and, to a large extent, devaluing the other incredible work that goes on at UMass". He continued to say that an issue he has especially struggled with was that while many students were caught, clearly there were far more who were and are still able to engage in plagiarism at UMass and for this reason, Moreno believes that a "turn-it-in drop box" will be an asset to the school.

The ACOSP will also create programs to increase awareness and understanding of plagiarism, intellectual property, and academic integrity on campus, for both students and instructors. Moore says, "we approach these services as a way to teach students how to prepare a research paper, to be effective and ethical writers, to think for themselves and to respect the intellectual property rights of other writers who preceded them". A Web site featuring tools and resources for students and instructors is being developed for early fall semester.

The committee will also work to support faculty in handling cases and ensure the student's rights to due process are respected if there is an accusation.

According to Catharine Porter, the Ombudsperson, there is no "set sanction" for this behavior, however, most faculty will recommend the student receive an "F" in the course and after two charges of academic dishonesty, a potential suspension or expulsion may result. This punishment, Moreno said, does not "send a clear message to the student body that this conduct will not be tolerated".

The ACOSP and Faculty Senate will continue to work diligently throughout the coming year, encouraging instructors to use the accessible programs and helping students prevent any indiscretions in their academic work.

In order to create a unified and efficient system of handling this growing practice the UMass Faculty Senate created the Ad Hoc Committee on Student Plagiarism (ACOSP) in November 2005.

Students attend a course in China's Shantou University, where a professor in China was first forced to resign because of plagiarism.

SAT scores plummet across the nation

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

A new SAT test filled with more advanced math problems, more reading comprehension and the addition of a new writing section were blamed for the sharp decline in Massachusetts SAT scores in 2006.

The new writing section on the SAT, which closely mirrors the SAT II Writing test, is an hour long test that includes a writing sample and multiple-choice editing questions. The new writing test increased the length of the SAT to three and a half hours from three hours.

While Massachusetts students posted a higher average score on the new writing section (510) then the national average (497), the Massachusetts' average reading score fell, from 520 to 513.

Massachusetts' average math scores also fell from 527 to 524. One of the sharpest declines came within the males math scores which plummeted from 545 to 516.

The average writing score for black students in Massachusetts was 426 – 59 points lower than the mean national average and 12 points lower than Latinos.

Massachusetts wasn't alone in their plummet: test scores fell nationwide. Average reading and math scores fell a total of 7 points, which was the the sharpest decline in 31 years.

Average reading scores fell from 508 to 503, and math scores fell from 520 to 518, with the changes hurting males more, according to an Aug. 28 press release by the College Board.

The College Board, which administers the exam, downplayed the drop in scores, saying it amounts to a fraction of one question per exam.

"When a new test is introduced, students usually vary their test-taking behavior in a variety of ways and this affects scores," said Gaston Caperton, president of the College Board.

The board's explanation: fewer students took the exam a second time, which typically raises combined math and reading scores 30 points.

Of the 1.5 million test-takers, 47 percent took the exam only once, up from 44 percent a year ago.

The College Board also insisted fatigue wasn't to blame. The new exam has been expanded from three hours to three hours, 45 minutes, and can take more than a full morning counting prep time and breaks.

Some parents and fair-testing advocates predicted the longer exam would cause scores to decline, but the College Board said its research showed no drop-off in student performance as the test goes on.

Still, the results will spark debate over whether the College Board – also facing criticism over 4,000 incorrectly scored exams last year – was able to deliver a new test that is comparable to the old one.

Mendez set to rehaul SGA

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association duo President Elvis Mendez and Student Trustee Mishy Leiblum have plans to "flip the SGA on its head" in the upcoming school year at the University of Massachusetts.

In an effort to increase the level of accountability held by student senators, Mendez and Leiblum have created a referendum that would lower the number of senators seated in the SGA from 80 to 49.

"We want people that will appreciate their place and feel as though they have to truly represent their constituents," said Mendez. "A majority of senators failed to be actively involved in student concerns."

Mendez said it was far too easy for students to be elected to Senate in previous years, as evidenced by last year's results that showed many senators wining a seat with as few as one vote.

"Passing this referendum would ensure that the senators that are elected are the senators that will take the seat seriously and will represent their constituents correctly," said Mendez.

Mendez stressed the importance of the SGA giving the power back where it belongs: to the students.

"We have a budget of roughly $1.4 million, we want these funds to be a resource for students, not just Registered Student Organizations," said Mendez.

Mendez and Leiblum have opened the fund in hopes of simplifying the process in which students gain access to that money.

"It used to be a ridiculously lengthy process for a student to throw a one-time event," said Mendez. "This fund will give students access to those funds without jumping through hoops. This fund will allow a greater percentage of students [to receive] a greater chance at receiving funds."

With campus security seemingly becoming increasingly noticeable, Mendez and Leiblum agreed in the importance of attempting to strengthen and increase the awareness of student rights.

"We received a lot of complaints from students last year that said they weren't given due process in housing disputes," said Mendez.

Mendez has teamed up with Student Legal Services Office to organize speaking forums that will attempt to help students differentiate the thin line between security and invasion of privacy.

Mendez has also reinstated funds that were originally meant to be used in the hiring of a student lawyer.

The lawyer, through SLSO, "will provide legal advice and legal council at a very reasonable price," said Mendez.

Mendez and Leiblum also plan to fulfill their campaign promise and reach out to the local community though the implementation of the new "Student Bridges" program, which will offer mentoring and tutoring for disadvantaged students within the Holyoke area.

One aspect of the program involves taking inner-city youth on tours of the UMass campus; the youth participants will then be broken up into focus groups and questioned in order to compile data on the accessibility of UMass.

"As members of a university, we're supposed to educate one another in order to become better citizens," said Mendez. "This program, through educating inner-city youths, can in turn help educate us in ways to address the needs of the underprivileged."

"The project is just a pilot program built to help us begin to explore and maybe improve existing university outreach programs," said Liebium.

The duo's campaign also put a large emphasis on the hiring of new teachers helping students finding ways to purchase cheaper textbooks, two areas in which the SGA has planned to address in the first few weeks of classes.

Working together with the Faculty Union, Liebium is currently attempting to track the progress of the administration's implementation of its "250 plan" to hire 250 new faculty members.

Welch's donate 500K to scholarship fund

Jack and Suzy Welch have given an additional $500,000 to the John and Grace Welch Endowed Scholarship Fund.

By Matt Belliveau

Jack and Suzy Welch have given an additional $500,000 to the John and Grace Welch Endowed Scholarship Fund.

Established in 2001 with a $1 million endowment, the fund awards scholarships to two graduating seniors from Salem High School in Salem, Mass., who will be attending the University of Massachusetts.

The scholarships cover tuition, fees, and room and board and are renewable for four years, provided that the recipients remain in good standing at UMass. This year's scholarship recipients are Thomas Long and Emily Barnes, who will join six other students on the Amherst campus who have received the scholarships in previous years.

Long plans to major in chemistry; Barnes will study mathematics.

"When I heard that I had received the award I was overwhelmed with a sense of excitement, achievement, gratefulness, and relief," said Barnes. "The Welch Scholarship will free me from worry about finances and allow me to focus on my studies. I am very excited about coming to UMass because of the numerous opportunities the campus provides. My plans for the fall include majoring in mathematics, contributing to the community service organization called SHARE, and joining an Ultimate Frisbee Club."

The scholarship fund honors the memory of Welch's parents, whom the former chairman and chief executive officer of General Electric Company credits with instilling in him the values and work ethic that have made him one of the world's most admired business leaders.

Welch said, "I got my start at UMass, and I hope that these scholarships help other UMass students get the education that will help them succeed in their lives."

Welch is a native of Salem and a graduate of Salem High School. He graduated from UMass in 1957 with a bachelor's degree in chemical engineering, then went on to earn a master's degree and a Ph.D. in that subject from the University of Illinois. He began his career with GE in 1960 and advanced to lead the company as CEO and chairman for 20 years, retiring in September 2001. Since then, Welch has served as a corporate consultant to a number of Fortune 500 companies. He has written two best-selling books, "Straight from the Gut", in 2001 and "Winning", with his wife Suzy in 2005.

Welch received the UMass Engineering Award in 1974 and the President's Distinguished Alumni Award in 1981. In 1997, he was given the University's highest honor, the President's Medal.

Of Welch's gift to the scholarship fund, UMass Chancellor John V. Lombardi said, "Jack Welch is a longtime friend and supporter of the Amherst campus, and of higher education. We are delighted that through the generous support of Jack and Suzy Welch, graduates of a public high school of the Commonwealth will be able to attend its flagship university."

Dead UMass teen dishonored

Eric Athas

The capability of the Internet needs no clarification. It continues to revolutionize our lives in every way possible, but one Web site is testing society's ethical values.

The recent tragic death of one UMass student has left family members, friends and a campus grieving. Jordyn C. Teixeira, 19, of Dartmouth, was killed in a motor vehicle accident on Aug. 5. She would have been a sophomore at UMass today.

While her passing must be agonizing for many, a MySpace spin-off Web site must only make things worse.

Ms. Teixeira was recently included on a Web site that serves one horrible purpose: posting the MySpace profiles of the deceased. It's called MyDeathSpace.com.

Visit it, and you will see the names and pictures of MySpace members who have passed, along with a link to their profiles. You will see a directory of names, each person labeled with a number. Ms. Teixeira is labeled as "Death No. 422," and she's joined by over 500 others. Each numbered as if they are products.

Next to each name in the MyDeathSpace directory is a few words describing how that person died.

"Fell from bridge," reads one description.

"Beaten to death," reads another.

"Strangled, shot in head, and set on fire," reads a third.

It even has the name, picture and profile of a deceased 13-year-old boy with the description, "Suicide (Gunshot)."

The son of Indianapolis Colts coach Tony Dungy, James, who committed suicide last December is listed on the MyDeathSpace directory.

James Dungy is "Suicide No. 58."

There is a link on the site, which displays the "Hate Mail" the site's founder has received. Much of it is from friends and family members of people included on the Web site.

Ms. Teixeira was recently included on a Web site that serves one horrible purpose: posting the MySpace profiles of the deceased.

"I think what you are doing is disgusting and disrespectful," wrote one person.

The site also sells pins and magnets with the MyDeathSpace logo, a skull, printed on them. There is even an online forum where members of MyDeathSpace.com discuss death, including the deaths of some MySpace members. This site, however, has no official affiliation with MySpace.com.

The contents of this Web site made my stomach turn, and I began to wonder why someone would want to create MyDeathSpace.com.

So, I decided to send an e-mail to the Web site's founder, Mike Patterson. I wanted to be direct, honest and offer him my own opinion of his site, but more than anything, I just wanted a few questions answered…

"Hello, I am the managing editor for the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. I recently fell upon your site following the tragic death of a student at the University of Massachusetts. The reason I am e-mailing you is I am writing a column detailing the atrocity of your Web site. I would like to give you a chance to respond to those, like myself, who think that your Web site is sick and a disgrace. I am not attacking you personally, I am just stating my opinion about your Web site, and would like to give you a chance to respond. Why do you even have this site? What's the point? What do you say to family members who may be hurt after seeing loved ones on your site? Thanks, Eric"

I was shocked, and very impressed by Patterson's response time. Within minutes I received an e-mail from him…

"Hey Eric, thanks for the email. First and foremost, please let me know when your column runs. I'd love to read it. Why do I have this site? To document all the dead myspace users. It is an eye opening experience and it is my hope that teens will read about the tragic deaths on the site and learn from them. What do I say to family members who may be hurt after seeing loved ones on your site? I have honored all requests made by family members to remove loved ones from the site. –Mike"

Maybe I'm just being stubborn, but the answers to my questions were scrappy. I already knew the site documented dead MySpace users, and what are teens going to learn about by looking at a list of gruesome deaths?

My knowledge and admiration for the First Amendment is strong, and I am in no way arguing against Patterson's right to publish this Web site. But it's not about rights, it's about respect. Forget about teaching teens a lesson through MyDeathSpace, which consequently makes no sense at all. Forget about how "eye opening" this site is, or whether or not Patterson has "honored all requests made by family members to remove loved ones from the site."

There is a certain amount of respect that the deceased deserve, and when you decide to turn death into a gimmick, a game or a topic of conversation, that respect is lost.

One other thing, the post scriptum from the bottom of Patterson's e-mail response to me:

"PS- We now have mydeathspace wristbands for sale on the forum! Check them out!"

The label breaker

Debra Capellari

I don't lie, and I can't claim that I've never labeled someone before. What's my favorite label? "He's too emo for sunshine." Yeah, I said it. It's a common flaw, labeling.

It's a very human trait, something that we all do because we've been taught to categorize and classify, to box up neatly, to swiftly and efficiently group like things with like things. But have we ever stopped to wonder what labeling is really all about? Or the ramifications that come along with neatly boxing someone up who doesn't seem to fit in the boxes that we give them? What happens then?

I'll be honest; labeling is really easy. You meet someone, and in maybe 30 seconds you have him or her all figured out. This girl with the hardcore, black eye makeup is a punk, that guy in the pink polo is a prep and that kid with his computer and really thick glasses? Yep, you guessed it, a nerd. There are all kinds of labels we give people: rich or poor, boring or wild, spoiled or independent, a stoner or straightedge, a jock or a band geek, gay or straight – the list goes on and on and on. We, as people, have conveniently come up with as many categories as we can to make our lives that much easier, to make categorizing and classifying far more efficient.

We, as people, have conveniently come up with as many categories as we can to make our lives that much easier, to make categorizing and classifying far more efficient.

And then one day, you meet someone new, and you just can't help yourself. You quietly think of all the labels that you've stored in your brain all through your life. You assess the clothes, the hair, the makeup, the books, the way the person talks and even what he or she talks about. You begin to try to box the person up like you always do, but you can't do it.

The more the person talks and the more you listen, you realize that this one doesn't fit into any of your categories. This one breaks all of your molds; this one isn't an easy classification. You sadly have to admit to yourself that this person is a label breaker, a person who smashes through all of your efforts and remains unclassified and thoroughly out of any box you try to put them in.

We all have label breakers in our lives. They're unavoidable. It's impossible to classify everyone you meet. However, what you choose to do with the label breakers in your life remains up to you. It's classically human to avoid the people in your life who you just can't seem to pin down. It makes it easier to get through the day if you can keep everyone in your life in some semblance of a classified order.

Here's a tip: before you write off those people who don't fit into your categories and your boxes, why don't you reassess exactly what your labels are all about? It's difficult to take a big step back and analyze a habit that you've had for a good portion of your life, but for as much as labeling is human, so is the ability to scrutinize your own behavior.

Could your labels reflect things that you're afraid of, or your inability to accept people who have different beliefs than you? If you're really honest with yourself, and it's not an easy thing to be, you'll find yourself discovering more and more about your own beliefs, rather than focusing your attention on labeling everyone you meet. Once you've decided to push yourself to see past your own stereotypes, you can begin to challenge yourself to change them, and open yourself up to the possibility of having friends from all different walks of life.

Look, we're all guilty of labeling, but at the beginning of a new year it's important to remember we always have the ability to change and evolve. Next time you meet someone, stop yourself from labeling too quickly. I'm not saying that everyone you meet will be your new best friend, but I am saying that whether you absolutely adore, or really dislike the new people you meet, at least you've allowed yourself the ability to see them for who and what they really are.

That is one of the best opportunities you can give yourself. Let the people you meet force you to question yourself, and push yourself to become more open. It's a challenge and an opportunity that no one should miss out on. You'll be that much better for it.

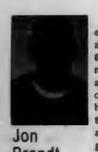
Make life, not money



Jon Brandt

Well, another summer has ended, and as the school year is about to start again, I've been thinking about just what summer means to us. For many students at this school, there are only one or two real summer vacations left before we need to head out into the real world. Soon we won't be able to have three months off to get part time jobs and stay out late with friends. It's weird to think about it, but it's yet another phase of our lives ending.

I'm sure I speak for a lot of people when I say that for years I would look forward to summer break for almost the entire year. Finally, after being cooped up inside for months in class, you would get a chance to run around outside and have some fun. Of course, after a while it gets a bit old, and soon you start to actually want to get back to school. That's pretty much the way it is for us now. Our break seems so long, and it is – about three months off. By June and July most people are bored at home and ready to come back to UMass. This happens every year.

I noticed this summer, however, that the summer break doesn't seem as long as it used to. Last year, for instance, the summer dragged on and on to the extent that it was no longer enjoyable being home. But this summer is different for some reason. I've been working three jobs this summer, which has drastically cut down on my time to just hang out and relax. It also starts to take a toll on you when you realize the summer is almost over in early August. Unfortunately, UMass is one of the last schools to resume classes, so we have to wait around while our friends leave one by one.

Just when I thought I'd done a lot this summer – having three jobs and all – I realized it's really been a summer wasted. I'd planned to go fishing with friends a few times, take a few road trips, and even read a few books. Now looking back on it, I never got around to fishing (or even going to the Cape for that matter), I took only one road trip and I didn't read all the books I'd hoped to. There's quite a difference between keeping busy with a few jobs and keeping busy with things you actually want to do. I didn't even get to see one friend for two months because we both worked so much.

We'll have plenty of time later on in life to be beaten down by work and chained to desks, but as students in the prime of our lives, we should enjoy our summers.

Our time as students is too short to waste by throwing ourselves into the work force. It's good to have jobs, but we shouldn't allow ourselves to be consumed by it. We'll have plenty of time later on in life to be beaten down by work and chained to desks, but as students in the prime of our lives, we should enjoy our summers. People are always complaining about how long the vacations are, myself included, but I've realized that there is far too much out there to do, and we just don't do enough of it.

We must be home for three months, and of course that will get old pretty fast, but home is what you make of it. For some, home is a house where you live with your family. For others, home is an idea of what your life should be like – maybe back in your hometown with old friends staying out late. Whether it's a room with all of your things or just good times, you need to realize that it won't be there forever. Keeping the memory alive is important, but memories fade too. You need to just enjoy your time as you have it. It's the experiences you have that will make a good life, not a bank account.

At some point you're going to realize that you're no longer a kid, you have responsibilities and summer will be just another season. Take advantage of it while you have it now, because whether you're a freshman or a senior, it will eventually catch up to you. The days of our youth are over, but that doesn't mean we can't enjoy the things that used to entertain us for hours in the hot summer heat. Ride a bike, play some whiffle ball and stay out late on weeknights. That summer wind is blowing by.

Preparing for Zoo Mass

Kevin Dooley

To all the freshmen (and whoever else wants to read), I have a personal question for the class of 2010 at UMass: How many murderers do we have? I ask this question for a very practical reason, and it's not to lure Barbara Walters away from The View to do a 20-20 special to assess how violent of a school UMass is.

If you're anything like me, you wanted to, or maybe you did, murder the 1,000th person who had this following conversation with you:

Uncle/Boss/Someone you can't stand says: "So where are you going to school?"

You say: "UMass Amherst."

Uncle/Boss/Someone you can't stand says: "Ha, ha, UMass? Don't you mean Zoo Mass? I have a friend whose niece went there…"

So the conversation trails off like most conversations trail off, that being one or both of the people trying to find a way to end the conversation without taking five minutes to do so. Now is UMass a zoo?

Um, technically it is still a university that encourages learning, for now at least. But let me set the record straight and give some advice on how to survive this jungle. I'll keep it simple and give my advice in a question-answer format. Please make note: I'm not giving any advice on how to write an original column.

Q: Where can I use my UCard?

A: I'm glad the imaginary person interested in my article has asked this question. You can use your UCard to make almost any purchase around campus including doing your laundry and the Pita Pit, but it gets even better this year my friends. This year you can use your UCard when paying to go to the bathroom or to get back into your dorm building. Don't you worry about where the money is going. Just swipe your UCard and a debit of $5 is automatically taken off. Simple, right? That's what I thought. (You know what? I was going to make another "all the money is being wasted on construction projects that seemingly never stop" joke, but they've all been told, and I just don't have the energy.)

This year you can use your UCard when paying to go to the bathroom or to get back into your dorm building.

Q: Why is Dominos trying to contact me so much? It's kind of scary.

A: It sure is. Dominos makes itself known more than a mother who gave her son or daughter up for adoption and is now on the Maury Povich Show trying to reunite with him or her after he or she becomes famous or wealthy. The only problem is that you don't have any money or won't after about two weeks. I've got a feeling we're going to have a lot of homeless people at UMass this fall, but that's no problem. Everyone can be a homeless person or beggar for Halloween. Speaking of Halloween…

Q: I've heard it gets crazy during Halloween around here. Is that true?

A: Yes, but Halloween is also the time when I realized a couple of things were going wrong. First, I had made more trips to Wal-Mart on a desperate search for orange face paint and white overalls for my Oompa-Loompa costume than I had made visits to my classes. Second, my wallet was doing a great impression of Nicole Ritchie on a 30-day fast. Meanwhile, I was doing my best impression of a bloated whale. Damn Dominoes.

Q: What's that Facebook thing everyone talks about?

A: Facebook is great when instead of turning off the lights in your dorm and hiding under the covers to delay writing a term paper due the next day, you can look at other people's pictures and learn that that person likes to shop, hang out with friends, and partayyyy. Another great thing Facebook allows you to do is make friends with people whom you have never spoken to in real life. Matters only get creepier when you can check that Facebook-only friend's status. More often than not, that status reads something like: Getting crunk with my favvvv girls tonight. Check back on Monday for all the hot pictures you lonely loser.

Q: Are office hours worth going to?

A: Absolutely not. The only thing office hours are any good for is clarifying something you don't understand, and possibly help your grade in a class you're struggling in. One could make a safe bet and say more men have been to the moon than people have been to a professor's office hours. I once went to office hours and the professor hid under her desk, claiming she was certain she was on an episode of "Punk'd."

That's all the advice I have for now. Before I get in trouble I should add that I was kidding about having to pay $5 to use the bathroom and to get into your building. It's only $4.95.

Incorrect first impression

Adam McGillen

I'm not going to lie: I never wanted to go to UMass Amherst. All through high school in my small hometown, I was built up by my teachers to believe that I had it cut-out for the Ivy League schools. When it came time to apply, I reached a little too far, got waitlisted and ultimately ended up at the very last school on my college list.

Disappointing, right? I'm sure a lot of students here can relate, because a lot of graduating high school students see UMass as just a state school, not a prestigious university. I made that mistake too.

Of course, UMass didn't help the situation. In fact, I had all of my prejudices reinforced at the dreaded orientation. I'm sure a lot of you incoming freshmen hated orientation just as much as I did. I never wanted to go, and I couldn't wait to leave – and I even showed up a day late.

Scavenger hunts, long lines at the dining commons, a dreary prison-like residence in Northeast, awkward group events and stupid, meaningless tasks were the name of the game at orientation. I'll admit, "Casino Night" was a diamond in the rough, but feeding a bad habit for gambling is a pretty unfair way of drawing me in.

Orientation felt too much like summer camp. Well, I've never actually been to a summer camp, but I imagine it is made up mostly of meeting new and different people while sweat is streaming out of every last one of your pores because it's 98 degrees outside and the closest air conditioned environment is Wal-Mart, and you can't go there because you have a team meeting in five minutes with a team you have never met before.

A lot of that was my fault. Much like going to a job interview, I felt I should put my best foot forward and wear a nice shirt and pants, because we all know how vitally important that first impression is (i.e. applying to college). The end result: a mug-shot of a disgruntled Irish kid with hat-hair and a saturated dress shirt forever imprinted on my school ID. They say a picture is worth a thousand words, and if you saw the one on my ID, you wouldn't have to read any of this to know how I felt about orientation.

Maybe I came in with the wrong attitude. Maybe I was still upset about ending up at my safety school rather than the other schools I had worked so hard for. Or maybe orientation was really just as awesome as being at the wrong end of a kick in the nuts.

The sweating you will get used to, and you may even come to like how overwhelmingly warm the classrooms are – it does make it much easier to fall asleep during class.

Honestly though, UMass is nothing like orientation paints it to be. Picking classes and housing is about the only thing that you will ever see from orientation again. Ok, you might go on a scavenger hunt, but it will more than likely just be for clean clothes or cash. And, you might end up at a "Casino Night" of sorts, but you'll probably leave broke and a lot less sober than you were at orientation's night of gambling.

The sweating you will get used to, and you may even come to like how overwhelmingly warm the classrooms are – it does make it much easier to fall asleep during class. The heating system has one setting, hellfire, and it won't be shut off until May rolls around, so now is a good time to buy those pants with all the buttons down the leg, so you can rip them off in a snap to cool off.

If you live on top of Orchard Hill, you'll enjoy breaking your neck heading down to campus when winter rolls around, and then breaking a sweat while you try to drag yourself back up after class. I heard an awesome idea about a chair-lift for the Hill last year; it would be so useful. Where is that thing?

Through it all, I've come to love this school. I've made a lot of great friends, a lot of whom can relate to hating orientation but enjoying all the other things UMass has to offer. If this school were anything like orientation, I know a lot of us would have dropped out two weeks into freshman year.

UMass and I, we got started off on the wrong foot. It was my last resort and the last thing I ever wanted. Now, I can't see myself at another school (except for any school with air conditioning, of course).

So, welcome back returning students. I'm sure a lot of you are excited to get busy lifting that GPA up (and getting that BAC even higher). For those coming here for the first time, let me give you a bit of advice: never judge a college by its orientation. Oh yeah, and never judge a person by their student ID photo.

New rules need to change

Greg Collins

As the fall semester begins, attention will refocus back to the new alcohol policies adopted by the UMass Amherst administration last spring. Michael Gargano, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, cited concerns for the safety of students and for the image of the University to justify increased restrictions on alcohol use and public displays of alcohol-related flamboyance.

Under the new rules, explained in detail on the UMass Web site, no more than 10 people are allowed in a dorm room in which alcohol is present (the so-called "unlawful gathering" rule). Engaging in drinking games "designed for the purpose of rapid and/or excessive consumption," is also prohibited, as well as intoxication which "requires the attention of University staff or which causes a disturbance or is a danger to persons or property."

Additionally, the display of alcohol containers within a dorm room, such as stacking beer cans on a window sill, is prohibited, as well as the possession of alcohol paraphernalia, like funnels and beer pong tables, in residences.

The consequences for violating the campus alcohol policies are a one year housing probation and entry into the BASICS (Brief Alcohol Screening and Intervention for College Students) alcohol prevention program. Additional violations will lead to potential housing removal, the BASICS program and eventual permanent housing removal.

The aim of these policies is not necessarily to completely eliminate alcohol use on campus, but to limit counterproductive alcohol consumption. Essentially students are being afforded the privilege by the UMass Amherst administration to use alcohol in a safe manner unless its use has a deleterious effect on other people, property or the individual himself or herself.

The problems arise when students do not use this privilege in a more responsible way. In 1997, after students from UMass Amherst and MIT were killed under the influence of alcohol, the Massachusetts Board of Health created more stringent policies to combat abusive alcohol behavior. A Harvard University study concluded that these new policies were not enforced strictly, and thus had not been as successful in limiting alcohol abuse as it could have and should have been.

College drinking in Massachusetts has continued to be a problem even after the Board of Health created the new regulations. So the question remains whether new policies, relating not just to alcohol but also to other areas of public policy, are more effective than the previously existing ones in accomplishing its original tasks.

Make students who are caught doing these acts for the first time assist public maintenance workers in repairing damaged facilities for the rest of the semester on the weekends.

Thus I would propose eliminating the new regulations regarding unlawful gatherings and alcohol paraphernalia possession. Instead I would enact only one additional policy, but would also adopt stricter penalties for violating all of the alcohol policies already in effect. Those who are found disrupting the peace, damaging property or hurting himself or herself, in the discretion of UMass Amherst officials or resident assistants, should be punished swiftly.

For instance, make students who are caught doing these acts for the first time assist public maintenance workers in repairing damaged facilities for the rest of the semester on the weekends. In addition, have these students sit in a lecture hall, supervised by an RA, on Friday and Saturday nights for the three weeks following the violation.

Another problem I have with the administration's alcohol prevention policies is the wording used to describe the alcohol prevention BASICS program, an initiative, according to the UMass Web site, intended "to help students explore their alcohol and drug use in a non-judgmental environment." Avoiding judgment is fine as long as alcohol advisors firmly inform offenders that they will face severe consequences (whether due to externally imposed sanctions or damage to their own health) for damaging public property, disrupting other people or hurting themselves.

It has been argued that this BASICS program has had dubious results attempting to combat abusive alcohol behavior (the people I have talked to who participated in the program said it was ineffective) and that fixing property and enforcing other harsh punishments will not change a student's drinking habits.

However, although external constraints and programs may not be sufficient in reaching a student's inner conscience about his or her alcohol abuse, they may be a necessary aid to make clear to the student that disrupting other people's lives and property will not be tolerated.

In all activities of pleasure, including social gatherings with and without alcohol, people should enjoy themselves up to the point where responsibility succumbs to reckless and self-destructive behavior. Are beirut games inherently irresponsible? Not necessarily, but they are if they start becoming noisy and disruptive to nearby residents.

Is having fun reckless and self-destructive? Not usually, but it does mean that with the de facto privilege provided by the UMass Amherst administration of being able to drink leisurely comes another responsibility called trust.

The ebb and flow of friendship

Kathryn Bruck

In my limited set of experiences and observations, I've come to see life as a series of rushes and lulls. Periods of chaos, periods of uncomfortable transition and wonderful lulls of just being that can make some of the other, nastier phases seem like detours through hell. While the powers-that-be often provide their own unique catalysts, one cycle that every American teenager invariably experiences (directly or indirectly) is the transition from high school to college.

The whole concept of high school is so anthropologically anomalous it's no wonder it becomes the center of such preoccupation. The idea of cramming a bunch of people, all homogenous demographically and geographically, with no family ties (usually) to connect them, is kind of unnatural. Even our earliest ancestors kept their interactions limited to genealogical ties. So it's not surprising that high school does result in a sort of weird fascination. Compounding the weirdness, as people get older, they love to think their identities are determined solely by internal mechanisms fueled by personal ideologies. Maybe this is true to some extent, but I think people often overlook just how profound their friends' influences are.

Even if you go to the same school, it's often revealed that this life-sustaining connection you made with each other in high school is nothing more than a dependency fueled by insecurity.

The period of post-high school development is probably the most hyped transition the American adolescent will go through. That brief moment of time in the summer after your first year of college seems to be the most thorough example of all the rapid fire changes that went on during the crucial first year.

There seem to be two examples of post high school extremes: The first being those who ruled their adolescent domain from a throne of coolness, unadulterated by anything but the slightest flirtation with awkwardness. These individuals approach college in one of two ways: as the end of an era they regrettably realize will remain unsurpassed by college and all life experiences thereafter, or a continuation of their empire encompassing all things socially graceful and energetic.

The second extreme being those who cowered under the shadow of awkwardness in middle school, perhaps found their niche and socially stabilized during high school and they approach college with tentative anticipation. They half expect a regression into middle school coping mechanisms, or a joyous halo of experiences which will bleach out the humiliation of their less quirkily hip days.

I've moved around a lot, so I've always been pretty acutely aware of my friends and how they fit into my life. The varying nature of friendship has also been something I've tried to stay on top of as well, because you never know which friends are here to stick around, and which are simply mildly to severely friendly acquaintances. Despite my determined awareness, college has sort of put a cog in the works of how I process my friends in my head.

A chief example of this is the best friend, or the extremely close friend. You finish each others' sentences, you do everything together, but most all you share what's really important: The conversations about life, the heartache, etc.

Unfortunately, these friendships don't always survive the transition from high school to college. College is alternately viewed as a social downgrade or promotion, or some potential combination of the two. Even if you go to the same school, it's often revealed that this life-sustaining connection you made with each other in high school is nothing more than a dependency fueled by insecurity. When you're trying to strike out on your own, this can be the most damaging stage for a friendship to get stuck in. It often makes it impossible for the friendship to evolve enough to survive new friends, new places and new experiences.

While this is a common and profound example of the fluctuations friendships go through, I've personally had quite a few positive evolutions take place. I've had friends who were close during middle school, but nonexistent throughout high school, become confidantes in college. The bottom line is you can never really predict the way college will change your life, or how much your friends, new and old, influence your perceptions about it.

Entering a new period in your life allows you to view other people, and yourself, in new ways. Whether these perceptions will remain accurate to you through all the other events and experiences of your life is a personal choice. You can allow yourself to be susceptible to the ebb and flow of life, allow it to carry you along and mold your perceptions, or you can dig your heels in, process and hang on to your ideals and remain steadfast through it all.

I haven't quite decided what the best approach is, but I'm beginning to think it has a lot to do with what kind of person you are, and ultimately, that is its own comfortingly consummate truth.

Seeking stimulation

Caroline Moretti

Everyday on the UMass campus, we find ourselves seeking answers to the important questions: How laid back are my professors? How many tests will I have to deal with? And will I really have to show up that often?

It's a widely known truth that as students at this University we're required to take quite a few classes that have little to do with our major. GenEds are supposed to help us become well rounded human beings, and let us take classes on subjects that we wouldn't normally be exposed to. Often though, these classes are on topics that we have little interest in, and we're apt to forget altogether once the semester ends. Luckily, we have a huge variety of choices when it comes to fulfilling our BS's and our U's. This is a huge University, and there are an awful lot of classes that could cover the topic of diversity. If only there was a way for me to find out the best way to get through my HS.

One of the most important factors in selecting a nice, painless GenEd is finding a good teacher. One who won't take his 100-level classes too seriously, but could still hold my attention through a boring lecture. In short, I'd like to have a professor who was kind of cool.

Enter ratemyprofessors.com. A Web site that helps the common student find the teacher who gains accolades from the most stringent critics: the students themselves. Professors are rated on a scale of one to five in the categories of ease, helpfulness and clarity. The ratings each professor receives is averaged into a category of overall quality, which is represented by a smiley face.

If your teacher gets a bright yellow smiley, you're in the clear. Conversely, if you see a little frowny face, drop that class like a hot potato. Otherwise you might get a teacher who is, as one reviewer said, "bad, unclear, and dumb as bricks."

Those who rate somewhere in the middle get a green face whose expression ranges somewhere in between concern and nausea. There's even a rating of physical attractiveness for each teacher. So if you plan to slouch in the back row with your iPod plugged into your ears, you can at least choose a teacher who's hot to tune out.

For the seasoned student, ratemyprofessors.com is a mere preliminary examination of the situation. When it comes right down to it, we're looking for some level of entertainment when we enter a classroom. We're not expecting our teachers to juggle flaming swords or balance a ball on their nose, but it wouldn't hurt if lectures were interesting enough to keep us listening for the full fifty minutes.

The cool professors are the ones who understand our short attention span and try to accommodate our rapid-fire, edu-tainment needs.

I suppose this is a reflection on our generation, as we constantly seek stimulation. If we can't be entertained by our education, then we'll use our laptops to IM our friends instead of note taking. We're a bunch that gets bored easily, and this is where the split in the mindset of educators begins. The cool professors are the ones who understand our short attention span and try to accommodate our rapid-fire, edu-tainment needs.

Then come the toughies, who also recognize our lack of interest and refuse to accommodate, refuse to turn their classroom into a multi-media show, because whoever said that biology had to be fun?

Finally comes the wannabes. Teachers who are trying to master that Power Point presentation of lecture notes, but just can't seem to get the projection screen to work without an obligatory 10-minute visit from a tech-guy at the beginning of every class.

We all have to take general education requirements, and we'd often like them to be as quick and painless as possible. Minimal tests and laid back teachers seem to be the name of the game, and we're all secretly hoping for a class that we won't have to go to all that often. Now we can base our choices of classes on a rating Web site, avoiding teachers with tough standards and less-than-movie-star-good-looks altogether.

Is our goal here really to avoid working at all costs? I sort of hate to say it, but maybe the hard-nosed professors are sort of (ugh) right. With all the money that we (or our lucky parents) are spending on an education, maybe we should be expected to do some work, or at least show up to the classes we're paying for. Think about that before you crack open the crossword puzzle.

On the other side of the coin, maybe for all the money we put into this, we should be expecting more than some mind-numbing lectures read straight off of a piece of paper. There's nothing worse than the discovery that your class is an absurd waste of time.

So, three cheers for ratemyprofessors.com no matter where you stand. It can help you find that dream class to sleep through every Friday morning, or lead toward that teacher who will give you more inspiration for your buck.

Carroll recounts abduction, release from captivity

UMass journalism professor Karen List, speaks to reporters during a press conference on the day of Carroll's release.

Carroll laughs with her parents, Jim and Mary Beth Carroll, days after her release from captivity.

Five months after she was released by her Iraqi captors, Carroll is describing the terror she felt during her 82-day ordeal.

into thinking I really was a guest, living with an average Iraqi family for a story about daily life. But I wasn't a guest. I was a prisoner.

In her first public account of her 82-day hostage ordeal, Carroll gives readers a glimpse into the day of her abduction.

The first interview on our list that morning was Adnan al-Dulaimi, a Sunni politician. While there was a handful of what Western journalists considered no-go neighborhoods in Baghdad — his office wasn't in that category yet. We'd been to Mr. Dulaimi's office several times before without a problem. Our last trip had been two days earlier to set up this interview. In retrospect, that was a fatal mistake; we had given someone 48 hours to prepare for our return.

After arriving at Dulaimi's office, Carroll was told that the interview needed to be rescheduled, and left.

As Carroll's driver had begun to pull away, a large blue truck with red and yellow trim backed out of a driveway in front of their car, completely blocking the road. Several men were standing around it, motioning to help it back out. The men then turned to the car, pointed pistols at them and briskly approached the car.

Carroll assumed that this was the normal security detail she had become accustomed to while living in Baghdad.

But unlike the previous times, Carroll explains, the men didn't lower their weapons — and they kept advancing.

The gunmen ran at us. A whisper exploded from me into a scream, "No, no, NO!" as I tried to get out. The door closed on my right ankle as someone shoved me back in, pushing so hard that the right lens of my glasses popped out. Adnan was gone. A man jumped into the driver's seat. Other men jumped in sandwiching me between them. We sped away, out onto the main road, then turned right.

"Jihad! Jihad! Jihad!" my abductors shouted, excited and joyful. "Jihad! Jihad!"

Carroll was quickly brought to one of her captor's homes, where they sat her on a couch, handed her a remote and said "Whatever you want."

"How do you channel surf with the mujahideen?" I asked myself that question as I flipped from one show to another, trying to act casual. The captors frequently interrogated Carroll, accusing her of having a electronic tracking device in her body meant to "send a signal to your government."

They wanted to know my name, the name of my newspaper, my religion, how much my computer was worth, did it have a device to signal the government or military, if I or anyone in my family drank alcohol, how many American reporters were in Baghdad, did I know reporters from other countries, and myriad other questions. Then, in a slightly gravelly voice, the interpreter explained the situation. "You are our sister. We have no problem with you. Our problem is with your government. We just need to keep you for some time."

Carroll was also forced to make a number of videos in which the captors coached her to cry on cue.

"We need to make a video of you," he said. "We want your family to see this. We want to make them see you in a bad way, so that they want to move, quickly." A vision flashed through my head. I was going to be one of those hostages surrounded by men with guns in a video broadcast on Al Jazeera. I'd always worried about becoming one of them.

While only four of her videos ever reached the outside world, Carroll made nearly a dozen, including retakes when she didn't cry enough to "satisfy" her mujahideen producers.

They kept wanting to film different videos with different demands aimed at different audiences. Sometimes I was pleading with the American people in general for help. Once I asked the King of Jordan to free Sajida Mubarak Atrous al-Rishawi, a woman who tried to blow up a Jordanian hotel Nov. 9, 2005. Her explosive vest failed to detonate and she was caught. Another time I begged for aid from the leader of the United Arab Emirates. Later, I made one denouncing him.

Carroll thought about escape from the beginning and made several elaborate plans but was moved often and would constantly watched by armed guards.

Escape looked impossible. All the things I had imagined about the future — marriage, children — they were just gone. They were just gone, and not going to happen.

To stay sane, Carroll would send "mental messages" to her family.

At night, I would think hard about Katie (Carroll's sister), sending her mental messages: "I'm OK. Don't worry. Can you feel me, Katie?" In my head, I'd write letters to Dad, in North Carolina, telling him about my days. I'd imagine him hugging me and hugging me in the doorway, telling me everything was OK.

After six weeks of captivity, Carroll writes she began to "lose it". The captors had given her a new name, Aisha, and continually tried to convert her to Islam.

"We are afraid for you and don't want you to go to hell," she said. "We are afraid that we'll see you [on Judgment Day] and you'll say, 'Why didn't you save me?'"

A day before Carroll was set to be released her captors joked about killing her.

"Jill, we asked the Americans for the women prisoners and there were none," he said. Normally his voice was slow and quiet, now it was loud. "Oh," I said, crouched in darkness, blind, lost, and breathless.

"And then we asked the government for money, and they gave us none," he said.

"Oh yes, I know," I said.

"Now we're going to kill you," he said, agitated and close to my head.

I thought they were going to do it. I imagined the gun. All they'd told me that day had been lies.

I knew I couldn't be afraid. I had to make them think they were good people who weren't capable of killing me. I forced a laugh. "No, Abu Rasha, you're my brother, you wouldn't do that!" I said, trying to keep the desperation out of my voice. He laughed, more convincingly than me. "No, we're not going to kill you," he said. "We're going to take you to the Iraqi Islamic Party and drop you off."

Upon her release, one of her captors began placing $100 bills in her hand. The man gave her $400 for the computer that was damaged in the abduction and $100 for "her trouble."

Then he said, "Oh yes, we got you this," and shoved a box into my narrow field of vision. He opened it and pulled out a gold necklace, with a pendant attached."

Carroll entered the Iraqi Islamic Party (IIP) office and handed a note to a man behind a desk that stated she was "the kidnapped journalist."

Carroll was then driven to the IIP headquarters and eventually was connected with two close friends from the Washington Post, including Ellen Knickmeyer, the Iraq bureau chief.

She then called her twin sister, Katie.

Carroll's 82-day ordeal was over.

I sat and talked with Ellen. After a few minutes, she said, "You can take off your hijab now."

"No, no," I said.

I waited a minute. Then I said, "Well, actually ... I guess I can."

Carroll's account has been widely read across the country by millions of people, including her Karen List, her former professor at UMass.

"I found her story to be so powerful that I had to put it down over and over again. It was too much to take in all at once—even installment by installment," said List. "For me, it was like re-living those 82 days, only this time I knew what she was doing too."

Article may bring scientists closer to understanding diseases

By Dan Terk
Collegian Staff

In hopes of wiping out some of the world's deadliest diseases, one University of Massachusetts professor recently published an article to shed some light on possible solutions.

UMass professor of chemistry, Lila Gierasch, has recently published an article along with her co-author Zoya Ignatova of the Max Planck Institute in Martinsried, Germany outlining their recent work on the anti-protein clumping capabilities of the molecule known as proline.

This research has ramifications in both the biotechnology and health care industries. The most lauded aspect of the study is that it is viewed as a preliminary step towards preventing and understanding many complex diseases such as Alzheimer's, Huntington's and Parkinson's, which are all believed to be linked in some way to protein clumping, or aggregation as it is more often called.

However Gierasch points out that her studies thus far are in bacterial cells, "it is far from clinical studies" she said, emphasizing the fact that "anti-Alzheimer's" drugs will not been seen on the market as a result of this work any time soon.

"This tells us something about how cells may cope with the problem of protein aggregation – that is a clinical problem in these disease" said Gierasch. "The diseases themselves are very complicated, people don't even know if the aggregates are toxic."

Therefore, she said, using proline to prevent aggregation may not cure the disease.

Proline is a small amino acid and at the center of the research. Amino acids are the building blocks of proteins which in turn are the building blocks of all cells. Therefore proline is already present in the human body, but it does not serve as a defense against clumping.

During the folding process, proteins sometimes misfold and then they tend to aggregate, or clump together and this can lead to health issues. It is also known that the longer a protein takes to fold the greater the chance that aggregates will form.

The protein used in the study was produced by bacteria cells and was intentionally given a DNA mutation that causes the protein to fold in about three seconds, as oppose to one second, thus resulting in a much higher chance of aggregation.

It was found by Gierasch and co-author Ignatova that proline, if present at the start of the folding process, will help stabilize the folded protein.

One of the keys to the study is that proline will dissolve partial folded proteins that are usually not soluble in water, a trait that often leads to aggregation. In the same way that dish-soap causes grease from a dirty pan to dissolve in water, proline helps a protein's grease-like building blocks to dissolve.

Proline is a preventative measure, not a remedy to protein aggregation. It was shown that if proline was added to a cell which already had aggregates of misfolded proteins, the proteins would not refold properly and it actually helped to stabilize the aggregate.

Besides the possible medicinal applications of proline the "very practical and very immediate [application] is in the pharmaceutical industry," said Gierasch. Pharmaceutical companies want to produce proteins for use as medicines, but they must have well folded proteins and proline is a way to improve the production of these desired proteins.

The work was done using a technique that was developed by Gierasch and Ignatova several years ago and they were able to observe the folding process "in vivo" – meaning within a living cell, as oppose to "in vitro" – inside a test tube. Using florescent dyes that were incorporated into the proteins, the folding process can be tracked along with the formation of aggregates.

The next step in the work is to continue with the same methods but manipulate the abilities of proline to stop aggregation at different stages and study the properties and morphologies of each stage. Gierasch said "this will help people who want to understand the disease, then we can see what's the toxic species – is it the early aggregate or the later?"

Associate Professor of biochemistry and molecular biology at the University of Kansas Medical Center, Mark Fisher said, "This is ground breaking… it can help us use new tools to understand how proteins fold and misfold," adding that about 50 percent of known diseases are a result of protein folding defects.

Professor Fisher has written a commentary about the research entitled "Proline to the Rescue" that will be published along with Professor Gierasch's article in the upcoming issue of the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences.

An article written by UMass professor of chemistry, Lila Gierasch, is viewed as a preliminary step towards preventing and understanding many complex diseases such as Alzheimer's, Huntington's and Parkinson's.

'UMass Extension' reaches out

By Krista Cocco
Collegian Correspondent

All across the country, children of deployed parents, who are stationed overseas or out of state in the military, are suffering from stress and fear of what lay ahead.

UMass Extension, a program which addresses high priority issues within the commonwealth, and its 4-H program, made their effort towards helping these children with a Family Fun Day that took place this past July at Camp Marshall in Spencer, Mass.

About 80 children enjoyed games, food, rides, swimming, canoeing, and a cost-free day devoted to them.

UMass Extension and the 4-H program helps children who have become "suddenly military," meaning either one or both of their parents have been deployed out of state or overseas for a period of time longer than usual.

Many of these children's parents were serving in the National Guard a few weeks a year and now are serving in Iraq for 18 to 20 months.

UMass Outreach worker Wesley Blist said that the day showed the children that "somebody cares during these difficult times."

Gretchen May, UMass Extension Educator, believes that the children got a lot out of Family Fun Day.

"It was important for the kids to participate with other kids in the same situation as them," said May. "The children got to share their worries, desires and expectations that becoming suddenly military with people who understand and could relate."

This day was meant to free the kids of their usual fears and fears.

May, who is also the state coordinator for Operation Kids, said, "the kids just had fun, they played, swam, ate and found a day dedicated to them."

North residents sound-off

The recent opening of the North Apartments has students weighing the financial and social benefits, and university officials backing up the $92.5 million construction project.

from $799 a month to rent for a one bedroom to $1,000 a month for three bedroom apartments. This cost includes heat, water and gas (not a common lease) and a security deposit covering the first month's rent. (It costs extra to include electricity or internet.)

Currently, one could quickly realize the financial benefit for four people in a three-bedroom, three-bathroom apartment. Therefore rent can be divided among residents. Parking is also free, whereas North Apartment's closest parking lot, Lot 44, costs an additional $200 for a permit.

Tin Aung, a 2006 UMass graduate, said that she rented her three-room apartment in Puffton for about $346 a month, but her utilities cost between $375 and $380 – that's $721, only $29 less than North's "rent," and one less bedroom in exchange.

Aung emphasized, however, that the cost wasn't the only difference to take into consideration.

"I enjoyed living off campus because it allowed me to have my own place – but at the same time, I missed the dining common and meeting new people, like neighbors down the hall," she said. "At Puffton, you had your own group of friends and you hung out with them, but living in a dorm, you meet someone new each day."

Forum on drinking

By Anna Doulantis
Collegian Staff

Three presentations on substance abuse from the University of Massachusetts were selected to be included in the 20th annual National Meeting on Alcohol and Other Drug Abuse and Violence Prevention in Higher Education.

The conference, which is coordinated by the U.S. Department of Education, will be held in Arlington, Va. from October 19-22. The presentations will be made by experts from UMass' Center for Alcohol and Other Drug Abuse Prevention and the School of Public Health and Health Sciences, according to the organization.

Putting Research into Practice: Using BASICS for Adjudicated Students will be presented by Diane M. Fedorchak, the director of the BASICS intervention program, and Gloria T. DiFulvio, the program's evaluator. BASICS (Brief Alcohol Screening and Intervention for College Students) "is a new program implemented last year through University Health Services. Any student who violates the campus alcohol policy is referred to the program. Students can also self-refer," said DiFulvio.

"Research for the program began at the University of Washington in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The university received a large grant of $1.5 million to implement the program," said DiFulvio. Data was collected using surveys from students who have gone through the program since it began in February 2006. They anticipate that approximately 500 students per semester will go through the program during the next two years.

The program aims to reduce high-risk drinking, which Sally A. Linowski, the associate director of University Health Services and CADAP director, defines as, "drinking that causes consequences, whether it's keeping people up at night, peeing in elevators, or throwing up in bathrooms. Any person can have a high-risk drinking episode."

"It's fair to say that about one-third of students report experiencing consequences, such as arguments, missed classes, and hookups they would rather not have had," said Linowski. "The other two thirds, if they drink, drink moderately and responsibly."

Linowski, along with Captain Michael R. Kent of the Amherst Police Department, will be giving a presentation entitled, Cops, Campus, and Community Partners: Communication, Collaboration, and Consistency in a Newly-Formed Coalition.

The presentation will show "how the university is working with Amherst police to improve the health and safety of the university and surrounding town," said Linowski. "The presentation focuses on how the parties collaborate and share data, which comes from web-based surveys taken from a random sample of students."

"My role as co-chair is to bring people together and help them problem-solve," said Linowski, who organizes the collaboration of students, university staff, local residents, cops, and bus drivers. "We can all help solve problems," she added.

Linowski's organization, the Campus Coalition to Reduce High-Risk Drinking bases its program on the model of harm reduction, and urges students to "assess their own risks and take steps to minimize harm," said Linowski. "We want students to ask themselves, 'What could I do to cut down and how would I do that?'"

The program received a $9400 grant from Boston University to get started two years ago, but also receives donations from the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority and various other agencies.

"We can get a lot done with people's commitment," said Linowski.

The presentation entitled, Making Smart Choices: Using Small Group Norms-challenging Model to Correct Student Athlete Misperceptions about Alcohol Abuse, will be made by John H. Kleschinsky, a graduate student researching the Smart Choices program.

"The problem that we address with UMass Smart Choices is that when students overestimate the use of alcohol by their peers, they tend to use more themselves," said Kleschinsky.

Kleschinsky's data was collected through self-report surveys with athletic teams on campus, in which athletes were asked about their in-season and out of season drinking habits. The results were presented through PowerPoint.

"This leads to a correction of their misperceptions, and helps them discover that most teammates hold moderate attitudes and behaviors with regard to their alcohol use, and also informs student-athletes with permissive attitudes towards alcohol abuse that they are in the minority. This leads to a discomfort about this behavior and motivation to reduce alcohol use," said Kleschinsky.

"One of the biggest complaints I have heard is that the reason students drink is because there is nothing else to do," said Kleschinsky. "I understand that at times UMass can seem very overwhelming and students can very easily get lost in the shuffle, but the minute each one of us moved in to the dorms our freshman year, we became adults. Therefore, if there really is nothing to do around here, then the onus is on each student to request the services and programs that will make them happy and successful at UMass."

Former U.S. Surgeon General Dr. Jocelyn Elders speaks at E. J. Thomas Performing Arts Hall at the University of Akron. Elders addressed university and local high school students about AIDS awareness and binge drinking.

Fewer freshman may improve class environment always had a temporary feel," said sophomore Alicia LoPilato.

Sophomore Breanna Keegan, who was temporarily assigned to live in the Orchard Hill residential area, said, "If I didn't relocate to Southwest [residential area] and find my three best friends in Moore Hall, I'm certain temporary housing would have completely ruined my first semester."

"When you walk into class there's a maximum capacity posted. How is that different from housing? It shouldn't be. It seems UMass is solely interested in allowing more students in to get their tuition money and placing the burden of temporary housing on the freshman student- as if they don't have enough things to deal with," added Keegan.

Incoming freshman Kim Koady expressed her relief upon being assigned to her first choice residence hall. "I'm very glad I was not a part of that hectic situation last year. I'm not sure how I would react...it would have greatly changed my view of the school seeing that they couldn't control the number of students entering, and that would have been a major disappointment."

"I hear the situation last year was a mess, but it didn't stop me from going to UMass. If the situation were the same, I'd play the cards I was dealt and move on with it," added incoming freshman Greg Varypatakis.

Lombardi commented that the slightly smaller freshman class will help with pressure for general education classes and other freshman oriented programs.

"Classes are ridiculous. I often saw classes overpopulated, so latecomers would sit in the back of lectures on the ground or stand on the side. Lecture halls actually became overwhelming, and it's much easier to not go to class when you know you're not going to receive any specific attention," said Keegan.

Communications professor, Donal Carbaugh, who teaches courses popular among freshman students, commented on the impact that a smaller incoming class might have on the classroom experience. He stresses the importance of the university adding faculty, and slightly decreasing the number of incoming students, until satisfactory accommodation of demands can be met.

"Because the total student population will remain about the same size as last year, there should be no loss of revenue for the campus and its academic and extracurricular programs," said Lombardi, "however, in order to grow we need to have more faculty; we need to have more residence hall rooms, which we have achieved to some measure through the North Residential Area; and we need to expand some classroom capacity, a major goal of the construction activities currently in progress or planned."

"I think it was probably a good thing that the freshman class will be smaller by about 400 people," said sophomore Rachel Fisher, "It keeps the classes at good sizes, and with 400 more students, housing would have been an even bigger problem."

UMass named one of top schools

The 2007 edition of America's Best Colleges ranked UMass-Amherst 46th in the "Top Public National Universities" category.

The University of Massachusetts ranks among the nation's top 50 public national universities, according to the 2007 edition of America's Best Colleges, released this week by U.S. News & World Report.

In the Top Public National Universities category, UMass Amherst ranks No. 46, along with four other institutions. Among all National Universities, UMass ranks No. 98, with six other institutions.

Many critics, including UMass Amherst Chancellor John V. Lombardi, believe the methodology of the U.S. News rankings to be simplistic and inaccurate. For instance, they question whether academic quality can be measured in a reputational survey of presidents, provosts and admissions officers, who may have sufficient knowledge to accurately evaluate only a small number of institutions.

In the magazine's National Universities category are the 248 American universities (162 public and 86 private) that offer a wide range of undergraduate majors as well as master's and doctoral degrees; many, such as UMass, strongly emphasize research. The magazine's rankings are based on data that includes peer assessment, student retention, faculty resources and student selectivity.

In 2006, UMass the report ranked 50th in "Top Public Universities" and 98th in "Best National Universities."

Nursing dept. receives $40,000

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

The School of Nursing at the University of Massachusetts, along with Franklin Medical Center and Baystate Medical Center, are using grant funding to develop a program to help nurses quickly and accurately determine what medications a patient is taking as they weigh treatment options. The idea is to reduce unwanted drug interactions for patients early in their care.

The two-year, $40,000 grant comes from the American Society of Health System Pharmacists Research and Education Foundation and will be used to find the best ways to identify all patient medications. Thirty undergraduate nursing students at UMass will initially be trained before the program is offered to the two area hospitals. The project begins in September and runs through August 2008.

"One might think that obtaining an accurate list of medications that a patient takes at home prior to admission to the hospital is an easy task. Not so," said Edward Tessier, a lecturer at the UMass School of Nursing and clinical pharmacist at Franklin Medical Center in Greenfield.

He said a number of factors, including the use of multiple health care providers and multiple pharmacies, use of over-the-counter and herbal or complementary therapies, and limitations in electronic medical records across inpatient and outpatient settings make reconciliation of medication lists complicated.

He also said researchers are pleased that the ASHP Foundation is supporting research aimed at helping nurses and pharmacists to better obtain accurate medication histories.

The two-phase project will focus on how nurses can best work with a pharmacy to identify an accurate patient medication history in an efficient and effective way. The first phase involves nursing students at UMass where the researchers hope to refine elements of obtaining a medication history. The second phase will be put into place in 2007 at both Franklin Medical Center and Baystate Medical Center in Springfield to support nurses in the medication history and reconciliation process.

"This represents a collaborative interdisciplinary approach to safe patient care and builds on the existing research around patient safety that is underway with the School of Nursing," Tessier said.

It also utilizes undergraduate students to participate in research, and has implications for the future nursing curriculum at UMass.

Kinesiology awarded two grants

Faculty members from the department of kinesiology in the School of Public Health and Health Sciences at the University of Massachusetts have been awarded two grants from the National Institutes of Health.

Patty S. Freedson, professor of kinesiology, leads a team of researchers that has received a five-year, $1.25 million grant from the NIH to develop and implement novel statistical methods to reduce measurement errors associated with current methods for assessing physical activities. Accurate measurement is necessary to examine dose response relationships between activity and health outcomes.

The investigators, who include John W. Staudenmayer, assistant professor of mathematics and statistics, and John P. Buonaccorsi, professor of mathematics and statistics, will use methods such as graphical models, neural networks, support vector machines, and error reduction methods to enhance the quality of the physical activity measurements. The work extends investigations initiated by Freedson's doctoral student, David Pober, who also earned his master's degree in the department of mathematics and statistics.

Pioneering work by Freedson has been done at UMass to improve activity assessment methods using accelerometers to assess free-living physical activity. Her work has led to widespread use of this technology nationally and around the world, including the National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey (NHANES), which is conducted annually to assess the health and nutrition of children and adults in the U.S.

Graham E. Caldwell, associate professor of kinesiology, heads up a research team that has received a two-year, $133,405 NIH grant to study muscular properties and balance control in older adults.

Collaborators in the research are Richard van Emmerik and Jane Kent-Braun from the department of kinesiology, and Buonaccorsi from mathematics and statistics.

A major health concern for aging adults is their susceptibility to compromised balance and a greater risk of falling. Aging also results in profound structural and functional changes in skeletal muscles. The project will relate the properties of muscles controlling the ankle joint to balance performance in healthy young people (age 21-35) and older people (age 65-80). The muscle properties will also be used to construct a musculoskeletal model to simulate the postural sway in young and older subjects. The development of this model will permit further investigation of the effect of muscular properties on balance. This research could be important in developing successful balance training protocols designed to ameliorate the effects of age-related deficits in balance. Such balance training could reduce the risk of falling and improve the quality of life for elderly adults.

UMass welcomes its most diverse class since 1997

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

With tougher admissions standards in place, and a decrease in the number of first-year students, the University of Massachusetts will welcome its most diverse class since 1997.

Michael Gargano, vice chancellor for student affairs and campus life, said an increasing number of families recognize the quality and value of a UMass education, resulting in more applications from top students.

"We have again enhanced the academic strength of the incoming class, recruited additional students to our honors college and broadened diversity on campus," Gargano said. "We're very pleased at becoming the institution of first choice for a growing number of excellent students."

This fall's class, by design, is smaller than last year's 4,427, allowing the campus to better manage the strong student interest for on-campus housing. Overall undergraduate enrollment is expected to remain about the same, with 18,450 students compared to 18,483 last year.

The high school GPA of the first-year class, compared to last year, increased from 3.36 to 3.45, and SAT scores increased one point to 1144. On average, students ranked in the 24th percentile of their high school class, an improvement of three points. At Commonwealth College, the university's honors college, enrollment of first-year students will be 480, an increase of 18.

The diversity of the class will increase by 3 percent to a 20 percent representation of African, Latino/a, Asian-Pacific Islander and Native American (ALANA) students. This is the highest percentage since fall 1997, when new ALANA students accounted for 20.7 percent of the class. The number of women enrolled is 53 percent, compared to 52 percent last year.

Student Government Association President Lizzy Mendez and Student Trustee Mindy Tarlow have led a strong charge toward greater diversity in admissions, and they were pleased when the goals weren't but were surprised to see the final numbers.

"It's a step in the right direction," said Mendez. "But now the question becomes 'Where is that incoming mass?' In a way, Native American, African American, Latino/a ..."

She said that, from the socioeconomic element. A lot of [people think diversity only pertains to African Americans. ... There's a lot to be said of the working class. Unless you're rich, you can't afford to attend [state] here," said Mendez.

Application for admission peaked an increase of 11 percent, the third consecutive year of growth. Of the 22,455 applications, 64 percent were from Massachusetts students. The growth in applications was somewhat greater for out-of-state students (13 percent) compared with in-state (10 percent). Selectivity increased, with 71 percent of students admitted this year compared to 80 percent last year.

"A lot of these students end up dropping out," said Leiblum. "So those numbers might be slightly inflated. The next step is retaining these new students."

This was the first year that the campus had an Early Action admissions program, allowing students who consider UMass to be among their top choices to apply early and receive a decision by mid-December. Of the 3,038 students who applied through the program, 2,557 were admitted as Early Action students, and 29 percent (1650) will enroll this fall. On average, the academic profile of this group is higher than students who entered through the standard process.

This year, in-state undergraduates will pay $9,595 in tuition and fees, and $6,989 for room and board, for a total cost of $16,584. Out-of-state undergraduates will pay $19,317 in tuition and fees, and $6,089 for room and board, for a total cost of $26,306.

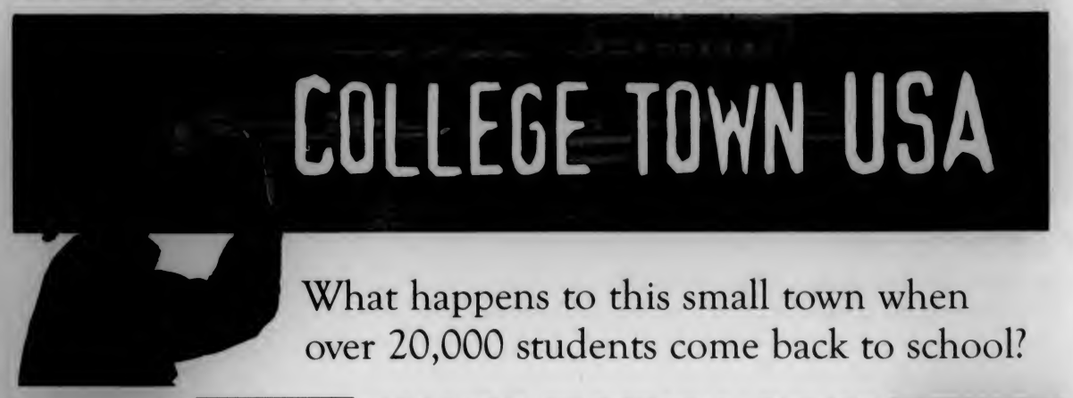
Welcome to Amherst Massachusetts



What happens to this small town when over 20,000 students come back to school?

Amherst has a population of 34,874 people according to the 2000 U.S. Census. Approximately 24,000 undergraduate and graduate students

The arrival of UMass students in September causes a 69 percent increase in Amherst's population

In 2004, UMass Police arrested 266 people for liquor law violations, and referred 770 others to alcohol aversion programs

When the words Amherst, Massachusetts are uttered, most young people automatically think UMass, wild parties, large classes and Antonio's Pizza. And as a new semester begins, and students begin flocking back to campus, the uptown invasion begins.

Getting hit by the five surrounding colleges from September through May, the town of Amherst sees a substantial increase in population, keeping business owners and police officials busy.

"UMass, Amherst College and Hampshire College are extremely important components of the community," said Amherst Town Manager Larry Shaffer.

"Those institutions are woven into the very fabric of the town. Without the educational institutions, Amherst would not be the community that it is.

By doing nothing more than simply returning to Amherst in the fall, UMass students drastically change the town's dynamic. Amherst is a town with a population of 34,874 people, according to the 2000 U.S. Census. With a population of approximately 24,000 undergraduate and graduate students, the arrival of UMass students in September causes a 69 percent increase in the town's population during the school year.

The atmosphere Amherst creates during the school year is something that many students are unable to experience within their own hometowns.

"One advantage to being in Amherst is being so close to all of the shops and restaurants," said sophomore Katie Imber, of Princeton, Mass. "I love being able to walk into town and grab a piece of pizza at Antonio's, rent a movie, or shop for shoes in Zanna."

Imber said the emergence of college-aged kids into Amherst center makes it an appealing place to be.

"The environment in town is different from home because it is so youthful and fun – where else can you find a town where every store, restaurant, and street is filled with college students?" she said. "I love the change of atmosphere. It's a lot more entertaining and fun than my hometown."

The addition of thousands of college students to the area also introduces an entirely new market for business owners. The quiet town in Western Mass. transforms into a feeding ground of hungry, thirsty college-aged kids.

"The Pub is definitely a lot different in the summer months than during the school year," said Meg Ostendorf, a manager at The Pub, located in Amherst. "During the summer we tend to get a lot more families coming in to eat, while during the school year we get a lot more young people who come in."

The presence of college students within the town also creates a different workforce within businesses in the area. During the school year, most businesses have a greater number of college students working for them.

"I love working in a college town, it can be very stressful at times, but it is definitely a lot of fun," said Ostendorf. "During the school year we have a lot more college students who work with us at The Pub, and college students are definitely really cool to work with. They have a lot of energy and they are really fun."

More students visiting restaurants and bars during the school months, means more alcohol-related problems.

"We have had problems before with people coming into The Pub already pretty intoxicated, or people who bring their own alcohol into the restaurant, and we have had to ask people to leave before, but that all just comes with the territory," Ostendorf said. "We haven't had to face any problems that any other pub hasn't had to deal with too." Barhopping is just one of the aspects of Amherst that UMass students flock to.

The unique features of the town itself contribute to the fulfilling experiences students have while gaining an education.

Historical sites such as the Emily Dickenson Homestead and Museum allow students to learn about the history and culture of Amherst: something that students may not be able to experience if they choose to solely interact with the UMass community.

"Certainly, our role as the home to the great American poets, Emily Dickenson and Robert Frost, shape our identity," said Shaffer. "Our beautiful intact downtown is a source of great pride to the community. Our wonderful nature trails and recreational assets are known throughout Western Massachusetts. Hiking the notch, visiting our Farmers Market, going to Atkins Farm, visiting the spectacular Jones Library or enjoying one of our incredible restaurants all enhance our perspective of what we are as a community."

When the student population rises, economics and culture are not the only activities students participate in: the amount of crime which is committed within Amherst is affected.

"A large percent of the college-age people we arrest come from UMass as opposed to Amherst or Hampshire College," said Amherst Police Lieutenant Scott Livingstone. "But I attribute this to, again, the number of students involved rather than the college they attend."

Crimes reported on the UMass campus are documented through the UMass Police Department, which is separate from the town of Amherst. Only if a student is arrested by the Amherst Police are the crimes documented by the town. Amherst and UMass are treated as though they are two completely separate populations in terms of crime.

On the UMass campus alone in 2004 there were three robberies, three arson-related crimes, and seven forcible sex offences, according to the UMass police Department crime statistics. The number of these crimes, committed on the UMass campus, almost matches the number committed in Amherst, despite the smaller population size.

In the town of Amherst in 2004, there were five robberies, three arson related crimes, and 10 forcible sex offenses, based on the FBI Crime Reports.

Although the Amherst Police Department does not hire more officers to work during the school year, other adjustments are made in anticipation of the return of college students.

"Time off or vacation time is not allowed for police officers in September and October, as well as April and May," Livingstone said. "If it's an emergency, officers can submit request to the Chief, and some officers have been granted time off for weddings and other such events.

"Extra patrols are hired on overtime to supplement the regular patrol shifts on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday nights for most of the fall and spring. That would give me about 15 to 20 officers working at a time on any specific shift. By the end of October most of the officers are already looking foreword to intersession," he added.

Crimes which involve drugs and alcohol increase the most during the school year, record show.

"Alcohol related crimes, [such as] operating under the influence, assaults, noise violations, and minor in possession, all go up drastically during the school year," Livingstone said.

In 2004 alone, UMass Police arrested 266 people on the UMass campus for liquor law violations, and referred 770 others to alcohol aversion programs. UMass Police also arrested 98 people for drug law violations and referred 25 others to drug aversion programs in 2004.

The number of alcohol and drug law violations committed on the UMass campus is significantly greater than those crimes committed on the Amherst College campus.

Regardless of an influx in crime, many police officers enjoy their job within the college town.

"Personally, I love working in a college town," Livingstone said. "I have been a police officer since I was 20-years-old and have 25 years on the job, all in Amherst. I have been able to see a lot of changes, both in town and on campus throughout my career."

A large percent of the college-age people arrested come from UMass, but the majority of the number of students involved rather than the college they attend

Bonnaroo '06 indulges music and mayhem

BY ALEX BUTLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Before we begin, it is important to note that one journalist can only cover so much. The ideal Bonnaroo weekend is simply not possible. No one can see every band that the festival offers. Dear lord, let's not even think about it. I managed to see fifteen acts through the entirety of the three days without losing sanity in the Tennessee heat. But I can say with all honesty that what happened in Tennessee the week of June 16, 2004 will stay imprinted in my mind forever. I have very few "actual" notes from the trip itself, and whether I can put it all into words in any coherent way is beside the point.

There are certain things in life that are almost impossible to record with words. Parachuting from 12,000 ft., or fighting a grizzly bear would be two examples. Spending three days in Manchester, Tenn. with 80,000 men, women, and children during the Bonnaroo Music Festival would be another. This was going to be a weekend with 108 bands, 31 comedians, and a gigantic 700-acre farm field in the heart of Tennessee.

A constant state of confusion usually rides along with these chaotic experiences. Add 80,000 people, hallucinogenic drugs, thousands of gallons of alcohol, sweltering June heat, and the will to put up with the entire ordeal (the last step can be significantly more difficult for some than it is for others). This confusion would set the theme for the entire weekend: the weirdness had begun.

People go to these sorts of events for various reasons. Some go to be loyal to a certain band. Others go to meet with friends. Many find the drugs the do-all and end-all of everything. Still others just come to witness it all happening. Seeing such a blend of culture — this was the most fascinating. Here, people got their taste of what the "degenerate generation" is like. Weirdos and freaks of all sorts congregate there. Some of these people were the very ones we were told in elementary school to avoid. The clash was amazing, however. During the whole trip, we were forced to deal with each other. We would stand behind each other for toilets. Wait to get a piece of fried dough together. Our colors mixed to make a bright mess of curiosity and eagerness. We were a hope that would swell and eventually fizz out.

Andrew Bird is an astonishing creature. He is regarded as a brilliant musician wherever he seems to go, but he is still true to his underground fans, which is something of true merit. It is not his goal to become what others expect him to become — he regards himself quite independently. A mark of any true artist is the ability to dip into different styles, and use this at will. And Bird is no exception. He grabs from his folk roots, classical melodies, anything he can get his hand on, and eloquently loops them over and over to create a multi-layered sound. Armed with a violin and a guitar (and one hell of a talent for whistling,) Bird stands alone onstage. With a small presence, he easily crafted the music the way he pleased. Every song was his and he wasn't shaken one bit with the audience before him. Despite one loose cannon ranting about a broom he had found, the crowd was cheerful and quiet, loving it all the while.

After the concerts, something happens that only occurs with crowds the size of small towns. The audience disperses; evenly and without hesitation on the lawn. The feeling is similar to that of an ocean wave coming over you in the middle of a wave you already weren't quite ready for, and you can easily find yourself drowning in sweaty tank tops. People try and think they know where they're going, but no one does. All you can do is try to go with the flow, and find another stage.

"Seu Jorge is playing I think."

"Who? The guy from Life Aquatic?"

"Portuguese David Bowie covers?"

Bits and pieces of this type of conversation flood the area, along with the usual panic of, "I really, really don't know where I am right now," and the offers of various substances. It was a bit jarring being offered ecstasy sixty or seventy times — and pot only a handful. Tall, interesting people were afoot, and if you didn't know the lingo, you could be rolling down the dirt streets of Bonnaroo in no time. At that moment I was splashed by a giant water-sprouting mushroom. The times were changing, and the drug culture was getting more complex. People wanted to go all out now, putting all their chips in one pile. Woodstock doesn't seem comparable to what this is now; a long time has passed. For many, this would be a lot different.

The heat finally starts getting very real, and off in the distance Ben Folds is trying to get his crowd to harmonize together. He scrambles from one end of the stage to the other, explaining what chords are to kids who are half in space and are able to see the music as well as they can sing it.

But we are all in it for the long haul, and all you can do is try and stick with it.

Connor Oberst from Bright Eyes is being presented somewhere off in the distance. All I can think of is how his shaky, expressive tongue will match the hyper audiences that I see around me. It would be interesting to see, but I know my head will not able to take it. Not in this heat.

Devendra Banhart then jumps on a different stage looking like some spirit coming out of a brightly light, fluorescent forest. He is hairy, big with a small body, but looked comfortable hugging his guitar. I start to wonder how all of these artists are dealing with the largeness of the crowd. I had figured that it would bother a lot of young blood, but these performers were coming prepared. They were ready for this.

Tom Petty would be up next. Headlining the second night, the famed guitarist was the first main act to greet everyone at the same time. (Petty, Radiohead, and Phil Lesh had the fortune to play when all other sets ceased, giving them full attention from all eighty-thousand). Everyone saw the same Tom Petty, but it was clear that the bright optimism people brought with them into the field would not stay long.

The problem was that everyone expected to like it. Being a musical veteran with the respect he receives from the music community, you would think everybody in the world will dig this guy. This was not the case, as we found out. It was clear as day that most of the audience was feeling it, but a significant portion faked smiles through the music that their parents blast on Saturday afternoons. Tom Petty played a solid show, but at the end of the day, it was just a big publicity stunt to highlight his new album, which, as we were reminded of 400 times a day, would be released July 25th. Stevie Nicks even showed her face on stage; a "complete surprise". But ah, the guitar solos were historic to hear, and they played on for what seemed like forever.

But the audience also had a split feel to it, and the reason was quite clear. The way Bonnaroo works is you can either have a weekend pass (the most popular choice) or you can have a day pass. Day passes are more feasible if there is only one act you'd really like to see, and for a large number of nervous Tennesseans, this was the case. Families had already laid their blankets when the gates were opening for the rest of the crowd. This transition was tricky. There were blatant clashes of cultures, the two biggest being age and money. Rural Tennessee was not the most lucrative of all places, and you could see it in the worn faces of certain families. If you looked closely, you could see some envy for the others; the young, wealthy teens who drove down in their own cars to be young and reckless for a weekend. But after the initial glances were traded, all was forgotten.

In June, thousands gathered in the arid fields of Manchester Tennessee to feast on the delights of Bonnaroo's music and mayhem.

At the end of the Tom Petty era that ended the second night, the crowd was let loose – the main event being over, 1 a.m., and the night had barely started. Three large veins began to emerge, all leading to more music. Amidst the sea of sweaty t-shirts, I found myself facing My Morning Jacket.

Stemming from Louisville, Ky., this band has seen more than their fair share of rock'n'roll ups and downs. Not many bands can say that they have none of their original members, but some can. Jim James, who seems to decide when he wants to sound like Neil Young and when not, led the charge with rousing vocals. He had the ability to look unlike any musician, more of a broad, beer-guzzling member of the crowd, and also the ability to take everyone by

It was a weekend of fun and fantastic music at the "All Good" festival, where music lovers of all ages soaked in the good vibes.

Festival goers assemble atop Marvin's Mountaintop in West Virginia for a day of music and sunshine.

It's 'All Good' on the Mountain Top

BY JENNIFER SCOTT
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

If the terms "ground score," "Shakedown Street," and "Clean Vibes" ring any bells — and the smell of patchouli triggers your olfactory hues — this article will probably hit close to home. If not, then please sit back and pay attention for your next festival experience.

It's mid-July, and we finally get our things packed tightly into the old borrowed jeep, intent to get on the road. We will meet our friends on top of a mountain in West "By God" Virginia (that's what the locals insist on calling it). The drive is one of the best parts: starting out in familiar territory, the scenery slowly, but surely, changes. It feels like there is a sort of time warp on these long trips, transcending space and time. But when you start getting overtired — that is when the real fun starts. That's when we, in particular, felt as though we were traveling through Europe, or between planets in outer space. But the blinking of a gas light always brings us back to reality.

Getting to the 10th annual All Good Festival is great fun, but once you have actually gotten the getting there done, other tasks arise, even if it is 5 a.m. After finally parking your car, finding a camping spot, you have to set up your tents and get settled. Throughout it all there are people – people you can't avoid meeting, and you wouldn't want to – especially when things aren't going smoothly. Along come those who are willing to give you a hand. So, even if you find yourself up the proverbial creek without a paddle, there is likely to be a nice new friend who will offer you food, water, and a place to rest. This reminds you that even if things don't go according to plan, you can go with the flow and proactively have a good time.

Apparently the venue, which rests upon the secluded Marvin's Mountaintop, can hold up to 20,000 people. The first few hours are like culture shock, but in a good way. The smells of barbeque and sounds of favorite CDs are present at any time of day. When there are 20,000 people all in one place, there is never a dull moment. You are just surrounded by life in every nook and cranny of the makeshift villages that you have created with tents and hospitality.

Venturing to the stage is always a fascinating journey. The characters that surround you broadcast a "feel good feeling," and you know that it's only to get better. An amazing aspect of the stage area at All Good is the natural "stadium seating." It's created by an extremely steep hillside which stands about ten times the size of Central's hill at UMass.

Once the music started, energy rose up in waves across the rolling fields on Marvin's Mountaintop. Everyone was dancing, and some were in crazy costumes — look in one direction and see a Cyclops, a giant booger, or a green James Brown that hula hoops. Look the other way, and spot children giving out flowers. One little boy's shirt read "celebrate your youth." Good advice to adults who take life too seriously, as it was just the place not to.

Although the whole atmosphere is enough to make the experience unforgettable, the music is the reason that everyone is there. Les Claypool's funky bass playing was unforgettable. The great entertainer put on a pig mask for part of his performance, and the crowd loved it. Trey Anastasio soon joined him on stage, and the cheers exploded as they jammed out on the famous tune "Mr. Oysterhead."

Umphrey's McGee stood out as well. As my friend Dayna, a fellow All Good guest, noted, "They play differently at festivals than they do at their own smaller shows, but they did well at the festival and could appeal to a bigger crowd that may not have known of them otherwise."

Then there was the Disco Biscuits' late night set, which is always a sight to see. It didn't start until 2 a.m., and kept going until the wee hours of morning. But this didn't stop anyone from joining the festivities. Thousands of people enjoyed the show to the very end — which is one of most out of control scenarios to witness. The fact is, if you want to get the full "Bisco" experience, it's probably beneficial to alter your state of mind. We had the right idea.

Robert Randolph and The Family Band were exceptional, due to Randolph's expertise on the lap steel (a steel guitar that is laid in front of the musician like a keyboard). The instrumental montage was certainly a thrill and got everyone dancing and singing karaoke style to the chorus.

The Black Crowes set showcased the enthusiastic front man, Chris Robinson dancing his heart out. The set thoroughly engaged the crowd. I agreed with my friends that night that Crowes are "true" rock stars.

The GreyBoy Allstars played a late night set after the Black Crowes. The spectacu-

'Novem' tells story of the band's sad demise

By MONICA GLEBERMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When you make a home video you never think anyone but friends and family will view it. This notice of privacy becomes stronger as the years go on. In this day and age privacy seems to be something everyone is striving for, but no one has. Last year amateur film makers made a documentary that exposed something that had been hidden from the public for over thirty years.

Imagine the spring of 1973 — the world is in turmoil, war is on everyone's mind, and nine young college students formed a bond at Harrison State University in Indiana.

These nine students all shared a love for music, and studied it at their college. Their names were Austin Rowles, 21, Dana Taylor, 20, Mark Winstead, 20, Kristy Doyle, 21, Peter Shipley, 19, Alan Levinly, 20, Thomas Lewdowski, 23, Dennis Clark, 21 and Jaslyn Walker, 28. These nine students played music together after their classes, and soon became a group who played at any event they could.

Winstead, who was on a full music scholarship at Harrison State, came up with the idea of having each member create a song that they felt strongly about. His uncle owned a recording studio called Dark Horse in Franklin, Tenn. He offered the group a chance to record their songs free of charge after the spring semester was complete. The group jumped at the chance, and they spent a week camped out at this remote studio, recording their songs and becoming closer friends.

The group worked on songs, partied together, spoke their mind, and basically enjoyed being together recording their music.

Originally, the group didn't even have a real name. However, during one of their recording sessions they took the name "Novem," which is Latin for the number nine.

On May 19, 1973 the group headed back to campus. They were exhausted, but satisfied with the hard work they had put in to make a record. Sadly the group would never get a chance to see how their music would affect people. The group got into an accident on the way back to campus and all were killed. They were virtually unknown until an amazing coincidence happened.

Filmmaker Brad Kimmel directed an 87 minute drama entitled "Novem," which chronicles the chilling story of the band's demise.

The movie is remarkable; it makes you feel like you have been warped into the 70's. The movie discusses war, partying with different women, and just really brings you back into the day when music was of the most importance, not being a celebrity. The film makes you really feel that these students wanted to record music and make a difference.

Novem at Dark Horse Studios, May 15, 1973, four days before their deaths. Alan, Jaslyn, Dennis, Kris, Tom, Austin, Dana, Peter, and Mark.

Unknown information about these students is still floating around. To find out all the latest updates, to hear their music, and order either their CD or the documentary, please visit www.novemsongs.com.

Tygh Runyan stars as Tyler in New Line Cinema's action feature, "Snakes on a Plane," which opened on August 18th following a mass of internet hype.

'Snakes on a Plane' barely escapes a crash

By PETER FRISMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One common trait among soft drink commercials is that they hardly ever tout the product itself — how good it tastes or other supposed benefits. Instead, the advertisers rely on an image, the concept of the product rather than trumpeting the benefits of its actual consumption. It's almost as if the actual product and its use were irrelevant. The soda is not presented as something to drink, but as a concept of something to buy for the pure sake of its purchase.

Is the viewing of David R. Ellis' "Snakes on a Plane" really necessary? After all, it's made an impact upon popular culture and been the in-joke of people before it was even released. What more could the movie have to offer than what it has already? Of course, one does not see "Snaf" for the sake of seeing "Snaf," he sees "Snaf" to witness the "Snaf" experience. He wants to be thought of as playfully hip, with a tongue-in-cheek sense of humor, and the actual viewing of the movie is nothing but a step in the process of the experience. After months of being an Internet meme and the focus of the cult movie community, "Snaf" feels more like the image of a product known as a movie than an actual movie, that is, something designed to entertain in its own right.

And in arguing the validity of the movie itself, one is prone to overlook said movie. Samuel L. Jackson plays FBI agent Neville Flynn, who is assigned to protect an easygoing surfer dude, Sean Jones (Nathan Phillips), who has witnessed a brutal murder by a ruthless gang member, Eddie Kim (Byron Lawson).

The two take a plane trip from Hawaii to Los Angeles, where Sean can testify against Eddie. But Eddie, determined to take out the witness at any cost, plants dozens of venomous snakes aboard the plane, to be released during the flight. The snakes escape on cue, and without any apparent provocation, begin attacking the crew and passengers. The duty of keeping both the plane running and Sean alive falls on Flynn.

The level of sympathy of a character is inversely proportional to the chances she'll get killed off. The yipping Chihuahua in a handbag and the arrogant Brit? You can bet they're both going to die, and in highly amusing fashions. The two young brothers and the baby? No chance in hell. The select few sympathetic characters that do die are saluted with a dollop of soft music before the action resumes. (Enough

Nicolas Cage stars as John McLoughlin in Oliver Stone's new movie "World Trade Center," which is based on the true stories of 9/11 survivors.

Viewers ask, too soon for 'WTC'?

By Colby Marques
Collegian Correspondent

The recent movie "World Trade Center" has received criticism from many people who have said that it's too soon to make a movie about September 11. This movie is a tribute to those who lost their lives, and to those who survived the terrorist attack. It is a story about the survival of two men who, despite the odds, managed to stay alive.

Based on the true story of two 9/11 survivors, the film centers around two New York Port Authority police officers, John McLaughlin (Nicolas Cage) and William Jimeno (Michael Pena), who went into the World Trade Center on that tragic day to help rescue the trapped and wounded victims. But upon entering the tower, the building collapses, leaving them trapped and badly injured. At that point it becomes a race against time for the two men as they lay injured, hoping to be rescued.

"It's a work of collective passion, a serious meditation on what happened, and carries within a compassion that heals."
- Filmmaker Oliver Stone

While the men are trapped, they struggle for hours with the desperate hope to stay alive, despite the dreadful odds. Much of the film shows the agonizing anticipation of their two families at home, devastated by the thought that their loved ones could be dead. The film is dispersed with flashbacks of McLaughlin and Jimeno's daily lives prior to that tragic day. This helps the audience get a feel for the horrible reality of what it would be like in such a situation. The story shows the power of love and family as the men's reflections on their loved ones is what keeps their hope alive.

'World Trade Center'
Directed by Oliver Stone
Starring Nicolas Cage, Michael Pena

The film shows the courageous work of the our nation's Marines, police officers, fire fighters and other brave Americans during those fateful days. While both men were trapped at least twenty feet below the rubble, the movie does justice in showing the major challenge it would take to attempt such rescues. Despite knowing that at any moment the wreckage could completely collapse and kill them both, two heroic rescuers in particular stepped up and risked their lives.

This movie gives an accurate portrayal of the events, as well as the emotional devastation during the crisis. This is owed to the first-hand accounts of actual witnesses. Andrea Berloff, the writer of "World Trade Center," got the true story from John McLaughlin himself, along with others who shared their experience with her. Oliver Stone did a fantastic job directing this emotional film, and even added real life clips straight from September 11, 2001.

As we come up on the five year anniversary of the 9/11 disaster, it seems fitting that we all share the emotions and heartbreak felt throughout the world — for all the innocent victims and heroes lost on that day. The film "World Trade Center" was an amazing depiction of how one catastrophic event could bring millions of Americans together.

Football movie 'Invincible' fails to score any thrills

By Jake Monte

"Invincible," from Walt Disney Pictures, is about Vince Papale (Mark Wahlberg), a real life professional football player who played three seasons with the Philadelphia Eagles. The road Papale took didn't involve college football. He started out playing the game with his buddies on a muddy rundown field, and earned the nickname "Rocky" while on the Eagles because of his humble beginnings and success at an open tryout held by Eagles coach Dick Vermeil. In the role, Wahlberg is more comfortable in his own skin than ever, and that's saying a lot.

Early on in the film the Eagles lose to the Bengals and the fans can't stand it. Dick Vermeil (Greg Kinnear), takes over the team and says in a press conference that the tradition of winning is a "tradition he's committed to restoring." When Papale is introduced, along with his "Rocky-esque" life, he is living in a rundown apartment, substitute teaches two days a week, and tends a bar at night.

When his wife splits with the furniture, screenwriter Brad Gann gets us to care about Papale in an attempt to make his glory be that much greater. At the point when Vermeil holds the open tryout, Papale is more interested in the new bartender at work, Janet, played by Elizabeth Banks — who you may remember as the sexually explosive flirt from "The Forty Year Old Virgin."

This rather lengthy prelude to tryouts involves Papale interacting with his father, his buddies at the bar, and playing football with friends. Papale's aptitude for football is setup clearly when, in a huddle, the plan of action is to, "do the one where Vince kind of runs by everyone." It's Rocky all over again, and about a hundred other films we've already seen, but none of it is "roll-your-eyes" bad.

A great deal of the film is Papale at the tryouts. There's very little that is fresh here. It seems Papale will make the cut, go through one season doing acrobatics on the field and plowing through people like a Mack truck. He'll probably turn the team around. He will be invincible right? All of this seems like it would be fun to watch. But, in fact, the misappropriate title "Invincible" is more of a marketing ploy.

At the tryouts Vince looks good when stacked against beer-bellied simpletons who showed up because they had nothing better to do. But can he really compete as an Eagle? In real life, Papale's three seasons amounted to two fumble recoveries and one reception for fifteen yards. So what was he doing? Drinking Gatorade and playing football on the side?

If the movie gave the audience some kind of a vague flight plan, some foreshadowing of where it was going and why the climax is the climax, the film wouldn't feel like a letdown. There's nothing wrong with the story the film wants to tell — Vince's personal life, his journey to the NFL, and one or two games in the NFL. The film might be more of an enjoyable experience knowing it shouldn't be called "Invincible." On the other hand, knowing Papale isn't going to become the football equivalent of the Heavyweight Champion of the World may make the film's buildup seem even more pointless.

'Invincible'
Directed by Ericson C...
Starring Mark Wahlberg
Rated PG
C+

In the area of style, and acting, the film is competent. The slow motion football scenes, the good music, and Mark Wahlberg's casual self-effacing attitude, goes well towards a smooth moving affect. The best line in the film is when Papale hesitates before a tackle, and Vermeil responds harshly on the sideline, "You're sorry? I stuck my neck out for you. You start playing football or you're gone." Since this is the most intense line, you'll immediately realize this film is far too tame. You may find yourself struck by the fact that the film has few glaring flaws, but the end result is that you say, "So what?"

Katie Couric debuts on CBS after 15 years with 'Today'

By Tom Jicha
South Florida Sun-Sentinel

She's tanned, she's rested, she's ready. OK, that's a remnant from the Tricky Dick Nixon era, but it also applies to Katie Couric as she prepares to make history Tuesday as the first solo female anchor for a major broadcast network.

It has been more than three months since she signed off NBC's "Today" to jump to the "CBS Evening News" anchor chair. When she hasn't been out beating the drums to critics and focus groups, she's been recharging her batteries. "I found that sleep is very underrated," said the woman who had to answer a 4 a.m. wakeup call for 15 years. "It also was a great time for me to relax and spend some quality time with my children and just kind of completely unwind."

Now she's going back to work under the most severe scrutiny any anchor has ever faced. Her male counterparts routinely have their work closely evaluated. Couric, 49, faces those assessments as well as extraneous nonsense, such as what she is wearing and how she styles her hair.

She bristles at this inequity. She challenged a writer on the summer press tour to ask Charlie Gibson what he wears. (The writer subsequently accepted the dare, to the amusement of fellow critics and the consternation of Gibson.)

Nevertheless, Couric knows CBS isn't paying her $15 million a year because she reads teleprompters well. In addition to her journalistic skills, the network bought her personality and charisma, which includes how she looks. Couric's evolving hairstyles were a big part of her NBC farewell. Gibson's were not when he left "Good Morning America" to anchor ABC's "World News."

Couric hopes she can wean the audience from the superficial toward the significant. "Obviously there is interest because the person who is in front of the camera, introducing segments and doing interviews, is the mainstay of the newscast. But I think people are more interested in the actual content and substance of what they're hearing."

Even more upsetting to her is the suggestion that she lacks the gravitas — whatever that is — to fill a network anchor chair. "It's almost (assumed that) if you do fun stuff well, you can't be serious," she said. "Because (Today) has such a variety of pieces and you are asked to do a variety of things, sometimes people forget that I have done a lot of serious things."

Perhaps the most serious came on Sept. 11, 2001. "Today" was still on the air when the planes crashed into the World Trade Center. She competently and efficiently anchored NBC's non-stop coverage for several hours. Couric will make her prime-time CBS News debut on Wednesday with a one-hour special tied to the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks. "Five Years Later: How Safe Are We?" will air at 10 p.m. EDT, focusing on what the government is doing to prevent future attacks and how anxiety affects Americans.

Her role as a gender pioneer is "an added honor," she said, but it has been overstated. It's more a product of circumstance than discrimination. "It's really the paucity of occasions this particular job has made itself available. These seats have been occupied for very lengthy periods. They don't become available that often."

The face of the anchor will not be the only new look. "For competitive reasons, we're not going to give away a lot of trade secrets but I think we have some really good ideas," CBS News President Sean McManus said.

"Our goal is to have people not talk about the (new) set, graphics or music, but to talk about the broadcast. But I know everyone's going to look at the set. It's not going to be wildly modernistic or look like a spaceship. It's going to be much more contemporary but it's going to be comfortable. It's going to allow Katie to use different areas, perhaps standing sometimes. It has different areas we can utilize depending on what kind of news we're presenting. It has an area for Katie to do in-person interviews with correspondents or guests. It's modern, it's clean, but it also has a lot of traditional elements."

There will be a prominent place on the show, if not the set, for Bob Schieffer, who is surrendering the anchor desk after doing yeoman duty since Dan Rather left in March 2005. The "CBS Evening News" is the only network show to add viewers during the past year, improving by about 300,000 per night.

"We have a new arrangement with Bob, which will guarantee he will have a regular role," McManus said. "Both Katie and I very much wanted him to do it. He will be a regular commentator from Washington, giving his views on the news of the day."

McManus is confident Couric is up to all the demands of her new job.

"At the end of the day, what's going to make our broadcast really good, and what's going to make Katie Couric not only a good anchor of election coverage or the next national crisis, is not her celebrity but her talents as a reporter and an anchor, which are clearly self-evident after the last 15 years. Her celebrity is drawing an enormous amount of attention to our program. In the end, all that attention could be wasted if we don't put on a show that the American people respect and like."

Katie Couric left her position NBC's Today show three months ago to embark on a new position as a news anchor on "CBS Evening News."

Snakes a box-office dud

of that sentimental crap, let's get back to the snakes!).

But such predictability is only a symptom of the movie's biggest problem. Nearly every Hollywood summer movie is designed to satisfy its audience at the expense of artistic freedom. The plot of "Snakes" was altered in accordance with the suggestions put forth by prospective viewers online. By doing so, the filmmakers have effectively admitted they were willing to sacrifice artistic integrity to give into audiences' demands. It's obvious that the movie is more than willing to cater to every one of them. There is nothing in the film that would challenge the audience, nothing that would cause the viewer to question the actions or intentions of the characters. The movie has a thick polysaccharide coating for easy swallowing and digestion.

Much has been made of the film's so-called guarantee of cult status, given the plot, the title, and Samuel L. Jackson. Indeed, the film consistently throws knowing wink-at its audience, reaffirming it's in on the joke. The much-discussed line, wherein Jackson firmly asserts his loss of patience with the presence of the snakes aboard the plane, seems to be included only to ensure an "R" rating and to generate giggles and high-fives among the movie's pre-manufactured fans. But it is the movie's in-the-know behavior that disqualifies it from the ranks of the Cult Movie Hall of Fame.

True intra-kitsch connoisseurs, the people who count the viewing of "Road House" and "Showgirls" as religious experiences, will no doubt turn up their noses at this film. Its own awareness of being a cult movie classifies it as a wannabe, whereas true entries in the genre were produced with their filmmakers attempting a movie to be enjoyed for its own sake. In a world of actual, earnest truck-stops-and-diners-of movies, "Snakes" adorns itself with pictures of sock hops and vintage Coca-Cola merchandise.

Beneath all the cutting and artificiality, "Snakes on a Plane" actually manages to provide high-quality mindless entertainment something to see while one's cerebrum takes a well-deserved nap. But it's questionable whether the film stands alone as a movie or just the main ingredient in the pop culture phenomenon it has created.

THIS SUMMER IN ... MUSIC

Cash's last strikes perfect melody

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

The release of "American V: A Hundred Highways" was not rushed. It was not rushed so that it would be available right after Cash's death in 2003, or so that it would be released in conjunction with 2005's biographically based movie "Walk the Line." Instead, the release date for this second group of post-death recordings was delayed so that producer Rick Rubin could bring the recordings to perfection — to honor Cash without glorifying his existence. It wasn't released to make billions of dollars. Its purpose was to provide Cash fans with a group of songs that are most representative of Cash's final recording days. The truth is that "American V: A Hundred Highways" finds perfection in its flaws.

When his wife, June Carter-Cash, passed in 2003, Cash kept working to get his mind of feelings of grief, heartbreak, and sadness. He was suffering from several complications of a neurologically degenerative disease. He lost most of his eyesight and was confined to a wheel chair. His lungs were damaged from multiple bouts with pneumonia.

But regardless of these health problems, he continued to record songs. Cash's voice cracks. During most of the songs, it seems as if his voice is too weak to sing. So instead, he just speaks the words of each song in a melodic fashion. He involuntarily inserted pauses to catch his breathe. You can feel him holding back tears. You connect with his frailty as he was succumbing to a number of fatal illnesses. When these tracks were recorded, Cash was at the end of his days.

The album includes the last two songs Cash ever wrote: "I like the 309" and "I Came to Believe." The former conveys a feeling that one must move along and keep living each day, even as death approaches. He wrote "Well I'm not the crying nor the whining kind/ Till I hear the whistle of the 309," showing that he is not afraid of what is to come. The latter song takes a stab at employing the help of others to make it through the next day. He sings, "Lord there must be a sure and easier way/ For it just cannot be that a man should lose hope every day," showing an inability to handle such moments of extreme heartache and pain.

For his cover of Gordon Lightfoot's "If You Could Read My Mind," Cash slows the tempo down. He is forced to take pauses so that he can regain vocal strength. Obviously, he is devastated emotionally and wears this fact right on the surface of the song. The emotional and physical impairment comes out, through, and around, each word of the song. He trembles though each line, but maintains hopeful strength. "I never thought I could act this way/ And I've got to say that I just don't get it," he sings. The pain of losing the one he loves is really too much to take, as the song suggests.

Hope is a major theme for the songs that Cash chose to record. Opening up with "Help Me" (originally recorded by Larry Gatlin) showed how Cash began to rely on assistance of those around him in order to get through difficult times.

"Further On Up the Road," written by Bruce Springsteen, hopes for a time when lovers will be reunited. Similarly "On the Evening Train" puts forth the same theme. This simple Hank Williams's classic is analogous to how all must have felt when June Carter-Cash was buried and gone, much like "The Evening Train." The lyrics "I pray that God will give me courage/ To carry on 'till we meet again/ It's hard to know she's gone forever/ They're carrying her home on the evening train," is a moment of true heartbreak and loss for all.

"Love's Been Good To Me" (written by Rob McQueen) is where one can speculate that the title of the album originated from. This song goes: "I have been a rover/ I have walked alone/ Hiked a hundred highways/ Never found a home." It continues "Still in all I'm happy/ The reason is, you see/ Once in a while along the way/ Love's been good to me." Many people now a days do not treasure the small special moments. Throughout the song, Cash urges listeners to maintain optimism because the universe will present gifts of love and happiness even to those who feel lost most of the time.

As to draw upon his devoutly Christian sentiment, "God's Gonna Cut You Down" is a traditional hymn that shows how one's actions tend to catch up with them over time, much like in Cash's own life. As he sings "You can run on for a long time — Sooner or later God'll cut you down," there is a juxtaposition of powerful clapping and Cash's stumbling voice.

This album reaches perfection without being perfect. Each song immortalizes Cash without making him out as an immortal deity. Each individual recording, as well as the written ode to Cash, that Rubin scribes in the CD jacket, shows what a profound respect Rick Rubin has for Cash as an artist, and a person. No one else could have done this, and no one else should. It is great just the way that it is — and that is a fact.

The Format hits a dead end with 'Dog Problems'

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

On their new album "Dog Problems," The Format soundly boasts (during the song "Inches and Failing") "I love love/ I love being in love/ I don't care what it does to me."

Is that even a plausible statement? No, it's a hopeful statement.

It ignores the trouble that comes at the end of a relationship and concentrates on the honeymoon-stage good-stuff: the park-side picnics, spontaneous hand-made gifts, and stolen kisses. During this song, The Format does not believe in retrospect, just introspect. They take their chances. It is what summer is all about: careless flings with whoever you meet without caring what will happen once school starts again. The Format lives every minute as an individual moment. The release of "Dog Problems" reflects that attitude.

When putting together this album for release, the band had a lot of trouble finding a label for distribution. First, they got dropped from Atlantic Records. Then after being bombarded with major label offers, they decided to release this album on their own Vanity Label. All of the frustration they experienced influenced the song "The Compromise," which compares agreeing with a major label with dancing in pairs. They sing, "So meet me in the middle/ Well c'mon let's make up a dance/ And we'll agree to call it the compromise." It's so true. Compromising, like dancing, is hard.

Each song on the album maintains creative differences, showing The Format's true musical range while maintaining a cohesive album-as-a-whole feel. For example, "I'm Actual" reflects a Beatles-era aesthetic with the "oo-la-las" in the background. On the other hand, "Time Bomb" uses a piano-driven melody and onomatopoeia in its lyrics ("tick tock/ tick tock/ you're not a clock you're a time bomb, baby).

"She Doesn't Get It" is a solid piano-driven pop song about feeling old, bored, and jaded. Lead singer Nate Reuss's lyrics insightfully point out how growing up comes with increasing feelings of discomfort with the younger generation.

However, there is one overriding issue with the album: the arrangements. For the most part, Reuss' voice takes some getting used to. During "Snails," he mumbles the lyrics to the point one must consult the booklet to understand the message the band tries to convey, which is that of making sure to "see the beauty in every inch." But the soft guitar note melody of the song allows the listener to let his marble-mouthed words slide. His voice goes higher than it probably should. "Dead End" gets boring after the lyric "I'm looking for a dead end song" is repeated for what feels like the 80th time.

But one can tell that through this album The Format does not compromise. They are what they are, and what they are is pretty fun.

Say Hellogoodbye to puppy dog love with 'Zombies!'

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

This summer saw the release of Hellogoodbye's first full length album, "Zombies! Aliens! Vampires! Dinosaurs!" It is made up of songs that were released on their MySpace.com Web site. Hellogoodbye, fronted by mastermind Forrest Kline, delivers an album full of puppy dog love songs with delightful keyboard beats and rhyming lyrics.

The songs are about as preteen as one can get. For example, "Touchdown, Turnaround (Don't Give Up On Me)," compares the intensity of love to pee-wee baseball. Songs like "Here (In My Arms)," "Oh It's Love," and "I Saw It On Your Keyboard" border on cheesy, but don't cross the line. There is even an idolization song on the album, "I Saw It On Your Keyboard" goes, "Then I saw it on your keyboard/ And you saw it on my sleeve/ I never knew a heart existed/ Outside of make believe." According to their Web site, this song is actually a shout out to Ozma keyboardist, Star Wick. The large amount of influence of Wick's style of keyboard playing exerted upon Hellogoodbye is definitely apparent on this track.

The album shows more musical restraint than their self titled EP. It is slightly more mature, but still maintains a playful tone. The integration of the keyboards points to influence of Koufax's album "It Had to Do with Love," the musical style of the band Ozma, as well as 80's new wave pop songs. The artwork is much like that of a coloring book.

As a whole the album is about as delectable as humanly possible and makes the listener yearn for younger days. The band has grown up a little bit without getting old. They've gotten smart without losing wit and charm. This album reflects the nostalgic urgency for the days of yore. That feeling is something we can all relate to.

Dashboard does it hard at Radio City

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

Dashboard Confessional rocked fans on August 12 at Radio City Music Hall in New York City.

Dashboard Confessional is back to old tricks again: putting on an emotionally charged performance full of audience participation and new songs paired with old fan favorites. However, for this year's tour, the band Carrabba and Company abandoned small intimate venues for larger scale music halls. Frontman Chris Carrabba took his performance to the next level. He shows all that the guy who, according to many critics, is responsible for the recent insurgence of emo bands can put on a show like any true rock star while still remaining true to those who have been loyal since the solo-acoustic days.

On Aug. 12 at Radio City Music Hall in New York City, Dashboard Confessional had to adapt to the stage famously known as the performance space for the Rockettes, and an old-time venue where double features were played.

Like a true professional, careful consideration went into each and every aspect of the show. The lights flickered analogous to the tempo of each song. As the band played, images broadcasted on a screen which meshed perfectly with the tunes of Carrabba and Company.

Dashboard Confessional began with full band performances of two new tracks — "Heaven Here" and "Rooftops and Invitations" — from their most recent album, "Dusk and Summer." Then, the full band continued their set with an old bitter classic, "The Good Fight," as the entire audience sang out as though they felt the pain of the song.

Next, the band members moved off stage as Carrabba took the spotlight. He strummed the chords of the ageless tune,"Swiss Army Romance," as the audience shared the vocal spotlight. In traditional Carrabba fashion, he inserted the line, "I called her on the phone/ and she touched herself," from the Say Anything song "Wow, I Can Be Sexual Too," showing even the most seemingly depressed kids are filled with lustful thoughts of the one they desire.

Following that emotive interlude, the rest of the band returned to the stage as Carrabba put down his guitar to have a free hand for a microphone. As he walked back and forth across the stage, he sang "The Secret's in the Telling" and "Again I Go Unnoticed," as he communicated an expressive fever unlike any other. His performance during these songs was reminiscent of his stint as the frontman of rock band, "Further Seems Forever," because it was more rock 'n' roll than solo acoustic pop.

Then, he brought it down a notch as he reached into the album "A Brand, A Mission, A Mark, A Scar" for a solo, heartfelt, and quiet performance of "Ghost of a Good Thing." Visually, things stayed quiet on stage as the band performed "Dusk and Summer," but the audience was loud as ever as they sang along to every word.

Old school fans got a treat when Carrabba shouted out to their needs and played a pair of old school songs: "Remember to Breathe," with guest vocals by Max Bemis, and then "Screaming Infidelities."

The set closed out with "So Long, So Long," "Stolen," and "Don't Wait." Then the band left the stage as the whole audience was on the edge of their sets chanting "Dashboard, Dashboard." Soon after, the band came back for a two-song encore that was without surprise: "Vindicated" and "Hands Down."

Throughout the whole set, the crowd did not miss a beat. With raised fists and tissue in hand, fans found salvation from those who had broken their hearts while they sang along with Carrabba's bitterly scathing lyrics. Couples held hands as they sang the words to the more romantic tunes.

It seemed obvious that Carrabba wanted to please both old and new fans. Dashboard Confessional was supported by Australian singer-songwriter Ben Lee and the critically acclaimed underground rock band Say Anything.

Ben Lee and his band performed a set reminiscent of a 1950's rock band feel. The voices of the band were harmonic and blended together in a fun and delightful fashion. Lee showed that he is not just a guy with a guitar, but something more. Charming to both the eyes and the ears, he delivered songs mostly from "Awake is the New Sleep." Say Anything on the other hand, supplied a loud, sexually and emotionally charged set. Frontman Max Bemis swaggered across the stage as he engaged the audience and delivered the lyrics to songs from "... Is a Real Boy," an album largely written by Bemis while he was experiencing an existential crisis, or more specifically, searching for a purpose in life. Although some may believe that Say Anything was more headache-inducing than anything else the lyrics of their songs prove otherwise. They may be screaming, but at least it's for a purpose. Bemis does not scream because he simply can, he screams to address his despair with everything from civil rights to the frenzied purchasing of band merchandise.

Spektor charms 'Hope'

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

"Begin to Hope" is Regina Spektor's major label debut. It is a group of edger piano-driven songs that are a mix between the piano chords of Ben Folds and the vocal styling of Fiona Apple. Her unique vocal ranges, creative and literature driven lyrics, and use of piano chords inflect into charming songs that highlight Spektor's talent and classically trained skills.

Throughout the twelve songs, she asks a lot of "What ifs?" The opening track "Fidelity" inquires to "Suppose I never met you/ Suppose we never fell in love/ Suppose I never ever let you kiss me so sweet and so soft." As she sings, she maintains strength, even though the song is one of vulnerable worry. "Better" hopes to improve upon a situation as it asks, "If I kiss you where it's sore/ Will you feel better, better, better?" "Samson" is a seemingly biblical love story between long-haired Samson and a woman who was pre-Delia. "I loved you first/ Beneath the sheets of paper lies my truth ... and history books forgot about us/ and the bible didn't mention us." It asks to remember those in the past, even if they do not seem as important. Everyone plays a role in one's development, even if it is brief. "On The Radio" is great and catchy as piano chords drift into the foreground of the track.

This album highlights Spektor's sparkplug charm and talent. The first four songs are completely solid and the rest of the songs have a hard time competing with those gems. But all the songs maintain a distinctive repertoire that solidifies Spektor's place at the front of the new wave of unique female singer-songwriters to come on to the scene.

Music festival in West Virginia is 'All Good' for all

lar Karl Denson was one of the special guests. His flute and saxophone playing made my ears perk up right away. A man nearby nudged me, saying "Remember this. This is probably the best jazz flute you will ever hear in your life." I believed him — I had never heard anything like it before.

What's great is that the music doesn't stop when the main stage closes because there is a smaller stage — which happened to be set up right next to our tent. It was nice to enjoy the smaller side shows that not everyone knew about. It wasn't surprising to find a dance party in the camping area where dozens danced till the break of dawn. You can never get away from the party — it's even in your mind.

This was the third festival I've attended, and I'd say each experience has gotten progressively better. Compared to the larger and more mainstream Tennessee festival called Bonnaroo, which I attended in 2004, All Good was a piece of cake. Langerado, a smaller festival I attended in Florida in 2005, didn't offer official camping, which I was glad to have at All Good. The bonding experience that comes with camping is irreplaceable, and even though hotels are nice with their fancy flushing toilets and solid floor, tent camping is an essential part to the festival experience. No matter what festival you choose, with thousands of people coming together for a common love of music — you can't go wrong. It's great to see all the music you love in a fantastic setting and at the same time be exposed to so many new bands that you may not have heard before.

So, if you haven't been to All Good before and you think you can handle number eleven next year (which I do recommend), there are a few things you should keep in mind. First of all, you are not a camel, so bring plenty of water (suggestion: some sort of water-holding backpack). And secondly, expect to run on pure adrenaline for a few days, because sleep for fans who have been to All Good before is for the weak. And finally, get used to smell of your own body odor because no matter how sweet the water faucet "wash station" has to, it just can't get you clean. After that, there's nothing left to do but smile, smile, smile.

Leaving the sands behind

By Dave Master
Collegian Staff

Summer is long gone, and so are our tans. There is nothing we can do to bring them back. Let's just hope that there's enough sand in our pockets and backpacks to last the entire year.

Let me tell you about the sand in my backpack. I sat on an overcrowded beach for the summer and saved the lives of little snot-nosed seven-year-olds who didn't know the difference between a rip tide and high tide. But I'm not complaining. I also had the privilege of sharing the beach with many attractive, well oiled females. Sometimes I was the one who oiled them up. The paycheck at the end of the week was worth it.

I am an ocean lifeguard on the Jersey shore. Long Beach Island, New Jersey, home of the Old Barney lighthouse, is one of the most unique seashores to grace the east coast, next to the haven of Cape Cod, of course. The main boulevard is lined with beach bungalows straight out of a 1950's movie. The bay and the ocean are separated by a strip of land half a mile wide, with picaresque views from sunrise to sunset. Good Humor ice cream trucks still ride the streets of the island for cold relief to beach goers in the hot summer sun.

Leaving the soft sand dunes of the beach and returning to the concrete edifices of University of Massachusetts is a hard transition. No more lounging around in a beach chair, soaking up the rays. It's time to hit the books, and not with a fist. Well, it's time to buy the books first, then comes the hitting.

Let's face it, all you incoming and returning students – it can get pretty cold here at UMass. Sometimes it feels like the winter wind carries needles aimed at defenseless students, piercing the thickest of coats. Keep the board shorts and sandals in the closet, and take out the snow boots, scarves, gloves, long johns, and hats. We won't see another heat wave until next year, and hopefully we won't have to hear the overplayed Motown hit "Heat Wave" on the radio until next year.

The sands of time have run out, leaving another summer behind and its traces in pockets of beach lovers alike. Life's a beach. Get over it. Keep your head up. Here are a few things this fall to help ease the pain of beach withdrawal.

Speaking of the sands of time, rock 'n' roll prophet, Bob Dylan, is releasing his 44th album of his career on Aug. 29, "Modern Times." Other than being the title of a Charlie Chaplin film, "Modern Times" is the last installment of Dylan's outstanding trilogy which includes "Love and Theft" and "Time Out of Mind." Even though "Modern Times" is Dylan's first release in five years, it is his most highly anticipated.

"This is a staggering record by any standard," says Steve Barnett, Chairman of Columbia Records, "and is a major priority for our company, worldwide."

Time stands still with Oasis's release of "Stop the Clocks," scheduled to hit the stores Nov. 21. The album is primarily a greatest hits release, an 18-track complication of songs hand-picked by the band, or as Noel Gallagher puts it, "a dream set list." Some fans were disappointed to hear of a greatest hits release by the band, based on some of Noel's prior press comments — that Oasis was near an end if ever a compilation album was released. Time may continue to stand still as the fate of Britain's Bad Four unfolds.

It's about time that "Lost," the only show on TV where "Survivor" and "Gilligan's Island" smoothly collide, premieres its third season this fall. Maybe some of the questions will be answered so that anxious viewers can finally rest easy. As the Emmy award winner for Outstanding Drama Series in 2005 and Golden Globe award winner for Best Television Drama in 2006, "Lost" has rightfully earned its reputation as the best and most watched series on TV. Things continue to look good for "Lost" this year, already having eight Emmy nominations, including Outstanding Casting for a Drama Series and Outstanding Cinematography for a Single-Camera Series. The mysteries continue Wednesday, Oct. 4, at 9 p.m.

Even though summer is just a memory, it doesn't have to leave our daily thoughts. I will still put a jar of sand on my desk and keep a half used bar of surf wax on my shelf. Occasionally, I'll smell the bar of wax and smile. The sand will stay in my pockets and my backpack. If you see a kid in class with his hands in a backpack for a prolonged period of time, it's me. Have a good school year and if you need any sand, just ask.

Contiki travels enlighten abroad

By Monica Gleberman
Collegian Staff

As long as I could remember I have always been focused on my future. I worked as hard as I could during high school to make it to college. I am now a happy junior here at the University.

I think I constantly set goals for myself that I do not think I will achieve and in the end I surprise myself. I recently set a goal of traveling more during breaks and even over the summer.

As we college students know, it's exceedingly difficult to take time off to travel. We have bills, tuition, parties — basically things that cost money. It's impractical not to work these days.

Last year before I left for the summer, I decided to take a risk and apply for some internships. Many people told me that internships are for juniors and seniors only. At the time I was applying as a sophomore. It just made the idea of getting an internship that much slimmer in my mind.

As formerly stated, I am always striving to set goals that I never seem to believe in. I was concerned that I wouldn't get an internship so as a back-up plan I had a job lined up for the summer as a camp counselor. I had done this job in the past and was not looking forward to doing it again.

However, one phone call changed my summer plans. I received an internship with a travel corporation called, Contiki.

About a year ago I had no plans for spring break. I decided to travel alone, and through my travel agent heard of Contiki.

Contiki is basically a travel company for people ranging in ages from 18 to 35. They have trips all over the world for assorted lengths.

After signing up for a trip you get to meet about 45 strangers that become family. You have a luxury coach that drives you around and takes care of most of your travel needs.

You also get a remarkable, intelli gent, and what I like to call, "travel renaissance man" as a tour manager.

Tour managers know everything from where to go party, to how to jump lines in museums. They are like your secret wingman. You will never want to leave home without one.

Tour managers are one half of a two man team. The other half is the coach driver that has been thoroughly trained. These two people eat with you and sleep in the same accommodations. I love that because it eliminates the "us vs. them" feel.

I recently went on a Western Highlights tour, which travels to western United States. After my tour I kept in touch with everyone on the trip and knew that I had to complete another one over the summer. That's when I heard that Contiki was looking for interns. I applied and received the job.

I got to go to Europe for the first time this summer. Going overseas has been a goal of mine as long as I could remember. The trip changed my life. I got to see places I never thought I would see.

We started in London and for 16 days traveled through Europe. I got to see London, Paris, Venice, Florence, Pisa, Austria, and Switzerland. We ended in Rome, spending about two days in each city.

I got to see the Leaning Tower of Pisa, the Mona Lisa, the Statue of David, and the Louvre among other sights.

Contiki has a unique way of bringing people together from all over the world. This has helped me to fall in love with traveling. The comradery is what makes the travel experience worth it. It's nice to have people to joke with and look out for you.

I plan to go on another Contiki venture to New Zealand at the end of this year. All of my friends have fallen in love with this company as well. They each have life changing experiences and stories to tell.

Being able to go overseas for such a low price is just unbelievable. I gained knowledge, travel experience, life lessons, and 45 family members. What other travel company can offer you these types of experiences?

Contiki isn't just a travel company. They are a life changing group of people that are all about catering to you and showing you what the world has to offer. They want you to love traveling, and they go beyond any expectations you might have. I really couldn't ask for anything more.

Boston exhibits anatomical preservation

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

Death and decay are inevitable aspects of our life on Earth. No matter what you believe spiritually, all of our bodies will decompose in roughly the same way. Bacteria finds its way in, and the rest is history. People have come to grips with this inevitability and life goes on. The idea of bodily preservation was a dream, and until 1977, it wasn't possible.

The Museum of Science in Boston has a new exhibit, Body Worlds 2, where 200 individual human cadavers are preserved and on display. People are encouraged to get right up close to these bodies and get a look of what makes humans tick. Entire bodies are sliced open and absolutely everything is intact. The stomach, lungs, intestines, brains, muscles, and eyes — everything is right there.

Now, how in hell did they do that, you ask?

In early 1945, a young German boy emerged with a rare blood disease that had him checking in and out of hospitals his entire childhood. Gunther von Hagen, as a result, had a very sovereign childhood, and soon these daily encounters with doctors ignited the desire to be a physician himself. After several years of studying at the University of Jena (and a two-year prison sentence served in East Germany for questioning Communism), a bright and independent Gunther emerged. Reports from the medical school dubbed him, "a personality who does not approach tasks systematically. This characteristic and his imaginativeness, which sometimes let him forget about reality, occasionally led to the development of very willful and unusual ways of working." He finished his studies and began teaching at Heidelberg University's Institute of Pathology and Anatomy.

It was here that he invented his stunning success, Plastination. This process uses a special liquid silicon rubber to encase collections of specimens – allowing preservation and an intact model. He spent thirteen years perfecting the formula, complete with many trials and failures. By 1996, twenty million people worldwide had seen his famous anatomical exhibit.

But the beauty of the exhibit is in the simplicity. You do not have to be a physician, nor even fascinated with human anatomy to appreciate the exhibit. Just wandering about and looking at what we consist of is reason enough to appreciate it.

The way the exhibit is presented is as follows: actual human cadavers are posed as models and peppered throughout, while individual organs are displayed on tables, under glass. You can't say that any painting or sculpture has ever had a good or bad day, but with these you can be sure of it. They are you and I.

A Drawer Man stands on the far end, squares of his body stick out, front and back, so on-lookers can see what is inside, in perfect condition. The Ponderer, a man in a sitting position, is cut open to show the nervous system of the human, the brain, skeletal structure, and nerve endings. The Skateboarder, a young male who stands on one hand, shows the muscle formation of an athlete in action. Skeletal structures are separated from the muscle tissues, and the skin is pulled way back – it's probably the most artistic presentation of dead humans on the planet.

The display tables are there for two reasons; to get a very close up look, but to also compare healthy appendages with unhealthy ones. A large, clean pair of lungs sits next to a blackened smokers' set and the pitch-black, shriveled mess that lies beyond it are those of a coalminer. The moral of the story: breathe deep, don't smoke, and be thankful everyday that coal is dug up by someone else. In addition, you can find out strange facts such as how long a brain would be if it was unfurled (16 ft.) or how many muscles and bones you have in your left foot (33, 23). Also, hairs in the nose help to clean the air we breathe as well as warm it.

Such ideas come with new audiences and therefore, a lot of new noise. What you are looking at are actual human bodies, and it is this that sparks a lot of controversy. These models have led lives, have felt love and pain, and are now sliced and diced for our viewing. We are looking at ourselves. This isn't the one-dimensional drawing we are used to seeing in biology books. Here we have the real deal. It's something that you can see in every set of eyes that stare back at you.

The traveling exhibit has received plenty of attention, sure, but not all has been positive. There is one part of the show that portrays the nine-month cycle of birth. The different stages of pregnancy are marked with the actual fetuses that are on display. The first seven weeks of fertilization are marked with the embryos of the corresponding times. One two-month old fetus has its developing skeletal structure dyed red, which can be plainly seen through the translucent skin.

It might be too much for some, but it is life and life is just the way it is. It will be there even if you don't acknowledge it.

The exhibit came to the Museum on July 30 and it's going to stick around until January 7. The Science Museum of Minnesota in St. Paul, Minn. and the Houston Museum of Natural Science in Houston, Tex. are also currently showing the exhibit.

And in case you're wondering, the men are all circumcised.

This summer The Museum of Science in Boston exhibited a controversial display of preserved human bodies.

Fifth Bonnaroo festival rocked Manchester

surprise with his loud, energetic love for belting out lyrics. He screeched and ripped around the stage like a madman, and everyone had the same thought: this is what it we would be like for the next two days. It would be a crazy time full of insanity and bravado, riddled with madness that accompanies large groups with powerful drugs.

Waking up the next afternoon was a shocker for most. Time didn't even exist for most people across the lots and lots of parked cars. Get up, drink something, find a Port-a-Potty, wash your hands (if you were lucky), and then it would begin again. The weekend-long party was in mid-cycle.

The Clap Your Hands Say Yeah concert would be one to remember. Being one of the most-talked-about bands all year, the group had no trouble filling the tent. Alec Ounsworth squeaked and strummed through song after song from their one album. Kids were singing along, and all was good. Then confusion struck once more when all of the strings broke on his guitar. But, this was Bonnaroo and the show must go on. They went on sans a lead guitar, and they prevailed — sounding quieter but with more interest.

Bob Marley will go down in history as one of the most influential people of all time. There is no question of this. A booming smoke stain on America's wall of structure and authority. He was somewhat of a pioneer, but someone who stayed close to earth, trying to show his love as example. But if you are the son of an icon, the fame turns into something else. Take Damien Marley for example. It is impossible for anyone to not take note of his father, and cap a level of talent for his rapping. He could make millions, and he will still be nothing in the eyes of history because of his father. But this didn't seem to slow him down in the least on the second day. It didn't slow down his audience either. The Marley tag is something to be honored, and as Damien walked arm-in-arm with his wife to the stage, accompanied by a Jamaican flag-holding follower, it was easy to see. With his unique style of blending pop melodies and a hip-hop attitude, Marley didn't disappoint a teeming, endless crowd. And, without saying, lungs were burned inside and out from the haze that lingered above the heads of listeners.

Scientology seemed to have popped out of nowhere, out of some lunatic's imagination. With some stroke of luck, L. Ron Hubbard managed to sway random celebrities his way, and all of a sudden there is a lot of bad noise. It has gotten plenty of bad publicity; from Tom Cruise's rants of street drugs, and the infamous South Park episode that tears it apart. The idea is ludicrous, and easy to bash.

But Beck has been in it for some time. He's a veteran of Scientology, starting when he was a young boy. He's no beginner with this alien stuff — he's a pioneer in a way. He was just way ahead of his time. With the release of his newest album, "Guero," the artist would take a walk down a much different path in his musical career. He has seen the lows of depression and the electric insanity of dance and leather. With "Guero," he continues to utilize the Dust Brothers band and capture a Mexican-Spanish theme throughout the record. Being another veteran of festivals, Beck certainly knew what he was doing — and this was clear in the performance. A puppet resembling Beck introduced the show, and from video screens, all the audience could see for a while were puppets of him and his band — dancing, singing, and even walking around Bonnaroo. Beck did a solo of a small Flaming Lips cover while his band ate dinner on stage, and even poked jokingly at Radiohead. Though informal and laidback, his songs were upbeat, bright, and fun, and people reflected it right back on the stage. His music was about being simple, and about keeping things moldable and ever changing. It seemed a beautiful philosophy to follow. Too bad he has to ruin it by believing in that wacko sham.

Soon it was time for Radiohead, the most anticipated performance of the entire weekend. It wasn't five years ago that you could give Radiohead tickets away, let alone sell any, but recently they have built themselves up so widely to eventually be regarded as the best live music performance in the world. Young and old, campers found their way to the main stage.

Radiohead has a reputation for having a die-hard, intellectual following, and this makes them all the more persuasive. But it either grabs you, or it doesn't. Whether seeing Radiohead was a mystery or a life goal for you, it blossomed into a well-crafted experience for all.

Radiohead's set was absolutely solid. It sounded like their album was being played from loudspeakers; it was that tight. They went from single to single, grabbing and sampling from all of their albums. Lights and visuals set the stage for an intense pace.

The performance was draped in color — first a dark blue, which shifted to a sharp copper, then an avid red. They kept up all night, and for some it was heaven on Earth, while others were just there because everyone else was.

After Radiohead's performance, Dr. John, an eccentric Louisianan musician, marched through the streets. It was a reminder that we were all in this for the entirety.

Radiohead and Tom Petty were headlining musicians at Bonnaroo 2006, which featured a total of 108 bands.

Nicknamed "The Night-Tripper," Dr. John is New Orleans' answer to the question, "what would happen if a large, buoyant jazz musician ate a lot of lysergic acid diethylamide and was allowed to roam free?" The Night-Tripper was almost a perfect personification to what people think Bonnaroo might look like; energetic, colorful, wise but crazy with no intent to quit.

The next day, the once loud and buoyant crowd was now full of blurry fatigue. People shuffled in and out a lot quieter than before. The heat shriveled us to the core. And still, we did not quit. Our dream of invincibility was, for the first time, putting its foot on the brake. But we still would push the envelope one more day. A mouth full of hay and a young band from Nashville would start it off.

Be Your Own Pet was just bizarre. Their music was punk, slight and straight. But it's the way that they presented themselves that was off. I thought these kids were getting the instruments tuned, testing microphones, setting the stage for the real band. To my surprise the crowd of impatient youths let roar. The band emerges from out of the protective wing of Sonic Youth, and this is the one reason why they are getting as much publicity as they do. There is an "if Thurston Moore likes them, they've got to be good!" mentality. But this was not the case. Be Your Own Pet sounded just like you're average high school attention-starved kids, playing loud, narrow, mediocre punk. I just couldn't see it.

But wait, we mustn't forget about the corporations. Even in the hazy atmosphere that was Bonnaroo, it was impossible to overlook the constant barrage of advertising. This is what made the Bonnaroo Discothèque the "Bonnaroo Discothèque powered by XBOX 360." It is also what brought the "necessary" Internet Village, provided by Cisco Systems so we could all check our Myspace.com and facebook.com Web sites! (Thank you, Cisco Systems! I almost went a week, God forbid, without it!). But this was the perfect place to advertise; this is what publicists dream about: a 700-acre farm with tens of thousands of drug-crazed kids who are ripe for the picking.

Sonic Youth embraced their large, garish crowd with long, warm, electric arms. Thurston Moore, either a tad intoxicated or just extremely talkative, was very eager to get the night started.

Sonic Youth pulled some of their older songs and peppered them throughout the show, but the focus was mainly concentrated on their new album, "Rather Ripped." Moore musically tore his guitar apart, and at one point began to dangle it in the edge of the stage. The crowd was hooked. For the encore performance, Steve Malkmus (of ...the Jicks) joined the band onstage for one song.

After twenty-five years of some of the most inspiring distortion-sounds and dark, harsh rock, the band still had their glow. Still, it was strange to see the "Youth" with grey hair and worn faces.

And then, it just sort of wrapped up; similar to the end of this article. Dazed and somewhat paranoid, everyone crawled back into their cars and took off. Memories may not stick for all, but what we can all say is that we experienced Bonnaroo and made it our own.

The people we met, the things we saw, the music we heard — that huge field in Tennessee will forever be etched in our histories. It will be a bright red scar on our

Minutemen flatten helpless Raiders

Perfectly executed, UMass coach Don Brown's revamped offense ate up 6:41 on its first offer a stingy defensive stand forced Colgate into a quick three-and-out. Not a bad start to the 2006 season.

"It's been a long offseason for us," said Brown. "It's been a lot of hard work and a lot of trials and tribulations. But obviously, the one standfast scenario has been our character and the players' resolve to come back here and start this thing off on the right foot."

That they did.

The Massachusetts football team smashed Colgate (revenge for a 17-14 defeat at the hands of the Raiders last season that cost the Minutemen a playoff berth), 28-7, at McGuirk Alumni Stadium on Saturday, in front of 8,191 loyal UMass fans who filled the home stands despite the absence of the student body.

The Minutemen did not disappoint in their season opener. They are now 5-0 at home in season openers and took this year's edition convincingly despite losing four of the last five meetings with the Raiders.

UMass' three-headed monster in the backfield – Steve Baylark, Matt Lawrence, and Tim Washington – ran for 180 yards on 38 attempts and ate up time while the Raider defense tired.

Baylark, the Minutemen's 1,000-yard rusher three seasons running, carried the ball 21 times for 85 yards with two touchdowns on the day. His counterparts, Lawrence and Washington, combined for 73 yards on 14 carries.

"It's good [to have Lawrence and Washington] because I get a breather," Baylark said.

"I think we ran the ball pretty well," Brown said. "I think if you ask Steve [Baylark] and Matt [Lawrence] they'll say that we have the ability to do better."

UM defense loses key players to graduation

By Jon Pellant
Collegian Staff

Much like the surface at McGuirk Alumni Stadium, the Massachusetts football team's defense got a facelift this offseason.

The Minutemen boasted the No. 1 scoring defense in the nation during the 2005 season. They allowed only 13.3 points per game. UMass was also third in total yardage defense (261.18 per game) and fifth in passing yardage defense (145.1 per game).

With the graduation of key players Shannon James, Keron Williams, and Serge Tikum, it isn't likely the 2006 Minutemen will repeat the dominance they showed a season ago.

Despite the losses suffered and the changes made, the team is still optimistic that this year's version will be just as good as last year's.

"It's tough losing people who are great players," senior-captain and defensive back James Ihedigbo said. "But we added some guys and made changes. We've moved some guys and I think we'll be fine."

Ihedigbo returns this season to his spot in the defensive backfield at safety. The question entering camp was: who will replace the two-time All-American James?

According to UMass coach Don Brown, the leading candidate is senior Brandon Smith. For much of his three previous seasons Smith has been mainly a backup

Defense primed for the fall

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

(Eds. note: Because of this issue's deadline, four men's soccer games could not be covered. Check out tomorrow's paper for a full recap.)

You've heard it all too many times: defense wins championships. Many coaches and players hold that statement true and you can officially add the 2006 Massachusetts men's soccer team to that long list of believers.

Defender Chris Brown started 20 games as a redshirt freshman in 2005 while leading the team in minutes played with 1,760.

The Minutemen (8-10-2, 4-3-2 Atlantic 10 in 2005) return seven starters and 13 letter winners from last year's team. With that in mind, UMass coach Sam Koch spent the offseason figuring out his team's strengths and weaknesses as he prepares for his 16th season with the program.

"We've got a good, solid core returning," Koch said. "I feel good about the work they did in the spring. Now with the new players that we've added, transfers and incoming freshmen, we're better than we were last spring."

UMass is solid on defense, with junior defender Kenny Cook and sophomore goaltender Zack Simmons both returning.

However, youth will be the theme in 2006.

"Our weaknesses are that we do have a lot of young players that don't know the system well yet," Koch said. "We're going to make young mistakes. Our strengths are that, defensively, we're pretty well organized. The commitment in the defense, it's not quite there yet, but I think it's going to be our strength.

"We have a solid keeper in Zack Simmons," he added. "We have a solid back four. Our defensive center midfield is good. The frontrunners are getting better everyday, and they are beginning to understand the defensive principles that we have to play by. So I feel that is definitely our strength."

The big question for the Minutemen in 2006 will undoubtedly be at the forward positions. The Maroon and White finished last season ranked eighth (out of 14) in the A-10 in goals per game (1.15) and were in a three-way tie for sixth in the conference in total goals (23).

Defense is undoubtedly the Minutemen's strength this season. Cook is UMass' top returning scorer, and will be looked upon to play a huge role as the season progresses. Cook was named to the A-10 Preseason All-Conference Team in July. He tallied 11 points last season, including five goals and one assist. His pair of game-winning goals was the most on the team.

Having a defender as your top returning scorer is cause for concern to some coaches, but with a lot of unanswered questions at the team's forward positions, the Minutemen will use it to their advantage.

"Anybody that scores goals, I don't care where they play," Koch said. "I think it's more of a concern

West Coast swing starts new campaign

By Joshua Friedman
Collegian Staff

(Eds. note: Because of this issue's deadline, four field hockey games could not be covered. Check out tomorrow's section for a full recap.)

The Massachusetts field hockey team opens a new season with eight straight road games, including a West Coast swing starting Aug. 26. Unlike its old playing surface at Garber Field, this team should only get better with age.

Last year, freshmen players accounted for nearly half of the scoring, led by first-year forwards Erin Parker and Katelyn Orlando, who tallied 14 and 12 points, respectively. With a full year of college-level field hockey to build on, the continued growth of the sophomore class will be a key for success this year.

UMass coach Patty Shea — now in her 10th year — will look to bring the Minutewomen (8-13, 4-3 Atlantic 10 in 2005) back to the A-10 Championship. With 73 percent of the scoring squad returning from last season, Shea has plenty of reasons to be optimistic about improvement from her young team.

"At a lot of schools the freshmen don't really play," Shea said. "We expect freshman to come in and learn a lot in a short period of time."

While the class of 2009 played a huge role last season, its lack of collegiate experience was on display as well in seven one-goal losses. Shea believes that is all part of the growing process.

"We need to improve our consistency of play, which when you have a young team is kind of the norm," Shea said. "Our basic skills weren't where we needed to be to play the kind of hockey we wanted to play."

With another year of experience for the underclassmen, the Minutewomen should win more of Senior Kwylan Jaggasar tied for seventh on the team in points last year, tallying two goals and three assists in the 2005 campaign.

Bad break leaves Minutewomen sour

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

(Eds. note: Because of this issue's deadline, three women's soccer games could not be covered. Check out tomorrow's section for a full recap.)

Despite just having lost 2-0 to the Richmond Spiders on Oct. 30 of last fall, UMass coach Jim Rudy – and his Massachusetts women's soccer team – was in high spirits.

Everyone knew that they already met the criteria earlier in the season for the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

Then, the unthinkable happened. The Minutewomen learned they did not actually qualify for the tournament.

"[On the afternoon of the defeat] we found out we weren't in it," Rudy said. "[The conference] changed the course of selection. We thought we had done it because we had always gone on three points for a win and one for a tie and all of a sudden it was a winning percentage deal."

The Maroon and White would have had enough points to qualify with their 5-4 conference record, but were etched out of tournament contention due to their .556 winning percentage.

Adding to the "melancholy" mood of the final-game loss to Richmond was the injury sustained by starting goalkeeper Kristen Walker. Attempting to knock the ball away from an opposing player, Walker got her leg stuck in the field's artificial turf, ultimately tearing her Anterior Cruciate Ligament.

Walker bit the bullet and finished the game (the other goalie, Kristen Rutland, was out due to illness) but allowed two goals she would have otherwise saved.

Rudy went on to explain that they had to use a defender to execute goal kicks, allowing the Spiders to push their whole team forward.

Though he was disappointed with last year's end, Rudy was pleased with what his team showed him throughout the course of the season.

"I think the way we finished the year is we felt like we had made a lot of progress," Rudy said. "[In past years] I don't think we were all on the same page in terms of directions and training habits and stuff like that, but this last year we were. It was a great group.

"Last year went pretty well," Rudy continued. "It was a nice improvement. It was the most enjoyable year I've had out of the last four or five. We've had some tough seasons."

Rudy blamed the poor outcomes of past years on the temporary field – located where the university's new dormitories are being built – that his team was forced to use. The Minutewomen were expecting to use the interim facility for only one year. However, one year quickly turned into four.

"When we were up there, the facility killed us. We couldn't recruit up there," Rudy said. "For four years, we had some good kids, but I think we accepted a lot less, in terms of mentality and ability."

The Minutewomen were finally able to move when a parent generously donated $500,000 to Rudd Field. Rudy credits the facility for giving UMass soccer its best season in recent memory last year.

After a satisfying spring season, Rudy is just as enthusiastic about this upcoming fall.

Junior midfielder/defender Tina Rodriguez started all of the Minutewomen's games last season and helped the team to seven shutouts.

Here's a look at how the Minutewomen break down by position:

Offense

If she remains healthy, junior forward Brit Canfield is expected to lead UMass' offense for the third straight year. She has accumulated 34 points and 15 goals over her first two seasons in addition to displaying outstanding breakaway speed. What has impressed Rudy the most, however, is her uncanny ability to maneuver shots from difficult angles.

"If she comes in at an angle, she's got great ability [with both her] left and right feet to hit the far corners," Rudy said. "That's going to be a big thing for us."

Sophomore forward Vanessa Patry recorded one goal and six assists (eight points) last year and is expecting to make a huge contribution again this season. Rudy

Momentum carries Minutemen into 2006

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

With the regular season just beginning for the Massachusetts men's soccer team, it is time to take a look at the Minuteman squad.

There is plenty of talent returning from a 2005 team that was last seen streaking to an Atlantic 10 Conference Tournament berth, after going unbeaten in its final six games of the regular season with a 4-0-2 record.

The Maroon and White dropped its first round game to Rhode Island, 2-0, cutting its season short, but the Minutemen expect big things this year from the same corps of players.

Junior defender Kenny Cook - last season's team MVP and a 2006 preseason A-10 All-Conference selection - senior midfielders Jason Scudamore and Michael Donnelly, along with redshirt sophomore goaltender Zack Simmons, will lead a young group looking to make a splash in a tight A-10.

In 2005, forward Prince Ofosu led all UMass rookies with six points while leading the overall team in assists with six.

Forwards

The biggest questions for the Minuteman squad lie on the offensive end, where junior Greg Cirillo is the only player with two years of experience under his belt. Joining him up front are sophomores Mike DeSantis, Costa Tsolirides, and Prince Ofosu.

UMass coach Sam Koch stressed that there will be a lot of shifting between the forward and midfield positions for a number of players, including Cirillo and DeSantis.

As far as experience is concerned, Koch is playing the waiting game with this young group.

"Only time will tell," Koch said. "We won't know until we get into real games and see them in action. Once we reach that point we can see if they step up and do well."

Cirillo has shown a nose for the goal late in games. His two career goals were both game-winners, and four of his five career assists led to either game-tying or game-winning scores. As the most experienced of the group, Cirillo will be expected to step up as a leader in the front end.

DeSantis was busy in his rookie season, playing in all 20 games while starting 16. He tallied one goal and one assist.

"There's no question DeSantis has done a great job," Koch said. "He's shown us that here in the preseason as well as last spring."

His only goal came in overtime against Cornell to win the game. The assist came in the win against Richmond during the team's late-season surge.

Tsorilides caught on late for the Minutemen and was a major contributor in the team's six-game tear toward the A-10 tournament. He notched two goals and an assist during that span.

Ofosu returns as one of the team's fastest players. He led all rookies in scoring with a team-high six assists while playing in 16 games and starting in five.

One player to watch for will be DeSantis' younger brother, Mark. Regarded as one of the best public school players last year, he will have a chance to contribute up front as a freshman.

Bryan Hogan from Pennsylvania and Mike Jejna from Arizona are two other newcomers that could see time up front.

Midfielders

The midfield can make or break the team. Mistakes that hurt the team early in the 2005 season were replaced later on by solid play and it showed in the Minutemen's change of fortune and their tournament berth.

UMass returns four starters to the group in Scudamore, Donnelly, and sophomores Michael Connolly and Tony Bassett.

Scudamore will be one of the team leaders as one of only two seniors on the squad along with Donnelly. After returning from an injury in 2004, Scudamore started 15 of 20 games, tallying three assists.

Donnelly, a strong defensive midfielder, notched a goal and an assist, including the opening score in the upset-win against Michigan last year.

Both seniors are struggling with injuries and have seen very limited action so far in the preseason.

"Hopefully we can get them on the field soon," Koch said. "But we've got a lot of young guys stepping up that have done a good job for us."

One of those young guys Koch mentioned is the not-so-young Connolly. Although only a sophomore, Connolly played two years of soccer in South America while studying in Argentina, and brings plenty of experience to the table. He scored a pair of assists last year while playing in 20 games with 17 starts last season.

Bassett, an offensive, attacking midfielder, made five starts last year scoring one goal, a second half score in the win over Michigan.

"Bassett has stepped up and done a good job," Koch said. "I think he gives us more of an attacking flare than we had last year."

He should see much more playing time in his second season with the team.

Some new arrivals that will be vying for time are Colin Campbell of Florida, Ryan Hartgraves of Arizona, Dan Lepone of Pennsylvania, Eddie Petka of Massachusetts, and Sean Maes of Colorado.

With plenty of newcomers to this already-young group, Koch should have his hands full evaluating the new talent, and so far he is pleased with their progress.

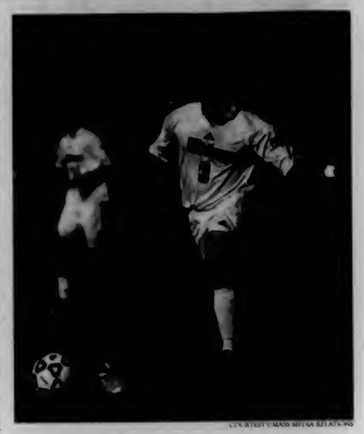
"Overall the whole class has done very well," Koch said. "They will only get better as they go. We have a couple of guys out there right now that have shown they can play with anyone else on our team."

Koch declined to mention any names or point out which couple of guys that might be.

Defenders

Returning on the defensive end are two of the anchors to this Minuteman squad: Cook and redshirt sophomore Chris Brown. The pair started every game for the Maroon and White last season.

Cook is the clear-cut leader of the team. A vocal player, he is constantly keeping the team organized and in position. At 6-foot-5, he is a physical presence as well, and teams will have trouble dealing with him in the backfield.



Midfielder Jason Scudamore finished with three assists last season. He is one of only two seniors on a young Minutemen squad in 2006.

Brown complements Cook well with great speed and leg strength. Regarded as an excellent ball striker, he can clear the ball into the offensive end from anywhere and recovers well when beaten. He led the team in minutes played with 1,670 last season.

Another player that could see action in the back is sophomore David Spatcher, who played in 16 games last season. He made three starts as a freshman and could see more time this season as a defender or as a defensive midfielder.

Goalkeepers

In net, Simmons returns after a breakout freshman year. He has great size for a goalie and is also agile.

He posted a 7-9-2 record last year in 18 starts with games missed due to an ankle injury. He finished with four shutouts, 94 saves, and a 1.43 goals-against average.

Simmons's progress late in the season was evident. He recorded three shutouts in the last five games of the regular season with a 4-0-1 record. He allowed just 0.74 goals per game during that span.

Simmons is new to the position, so he is still learning some of the intricacies of minding the net, but Koch is confident in the young athlete.

"We've talked about the things he needs to work on, and I think you'll see a better Zack Simmons at the end of the year, I'm sure," Koch said. "He's a newer athlete to the position, so he's still learning. He can only get better as the season goes on."

Junior Evan Prybutok will back up Simmons. Prybutok transferred to UMass at the beginning of last season from Burlington County Community College.

The team captain is eager to lead this team. Cook has established himself as the team's leader, but Koch is still looking for other players to step up as well.

"Right now Cook is our captain," Koch said. "If we decide to add to that it won't be until after the preseason."

Walker overcomes ACL tear, returns to team

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

It didn't seem so bad at first. It was a pretty routine play. A short 15 minutes into the final game of last year's fall soccer season, the Richmond Spider offense hit a through-ball that penetrated the Massachusetts defense.

As a Richmond player dribbled it near the Minutewomen's penalty box, UMass goalkeeper, redshirt junior Kristin Walker, made a B-line for the ball in an attempt to break up the play. In her pursuit, however, she stepped on one of a few patches of soft terrain on Richmond's field-turf surface and went down.

"I stuck my leg out and it got stuck in the turf," Walker recalls. "Then my upper-body moved but my leg got kind of twisted."

After being tended to by the team's trainer for about ten minutes, Walker continued the game.

Despite her tremendous grit, Walker allowed two goals that she would have saved on a healthy knee in the 2-0 loss.

"[She] couldn't jump, she couldn't hit goal kicks and, even worse, we couldn't back-pass to her," UMass coach Jim Rudy says.

"After that, Richmond sort of ratcheted it up on us because when you have a defender taking goal kicks, they can push their whole team forward. So the whole game changed."

Once Walker arrived back home and had her knee checked out by a doctor, she found out some surprising news: that sore knee she played almost a full game with was actually a slight misalignment of the Anterior Cruciate Ligament, an injury more commonly (and infamously) known as a torn ACL.

Walker explained that if such a devastating injury had to happen, it couldn't have been at a better time. Since it was the ladies' final game of the season, Walker was able to have surgery over the winter break and spend all of spring and summer recuperating.

Walker sung praises for the medical staff, which helped her every step of the way.

"Our training staff is awesome here," she says. "After class [last semester] I would just go right to rehab and do, basically, two hours a day/five days a week. It was great. I would just go to the training room in Boyden [gymnasium] and it actually went really well."

Walker's ability to suck it up and keep on playing is something that certainly doesn't go unappreciated by Rudy.

"She toughed it out," Rudy comments. "That's a testament to that she's a tough kid. And that's the nice part, because when you go to train goalkeepers you want to be able to have some tough [players]."

As impressed as Rudy has been with Walker, it's everything he expected to see in the New Jersey native since he first met her.

Walker was an all-star at one of coach Rudy's Advanced Girls Soccer Camps about three years ago. Despite showing great promise, she was not recruited hard since there were already two experienced goalies on the varsity squad.

But that didn't stop Walker, who turned down offers from two different prestigious college programs in order to attend UMass.

"We redshirted her the first year because we saw some nice potential," Rudy recalls. "Then, when our senior graduated, she ended up moving up and we put her on scholarship and took the starting position eventually."

Since taking over the starting position as a redshirt freshman, this DePaul Catholic High School graduate has been a goal-saving tear.

In 2004, Walker recorded four shutouts with a sum of 21 saves. She blocked a season-high 10 shots in a tough defeat to Dayton and amassed 88 total saves throughout the course of the season.

Last year, she started all 18 games for the second straight season. She registered seven more career shutouts with a combined 44 blocked shots. She was named to the All-Conference First Team after recording a career-high 17 saves in a double overtime loss to Dartmouth and collecting a total of 120 for the season.

Walker said that her knee feels great but that she'll have to see how it holds up during vigorous workouts. If his star's leg responds well to last January's surgery, Rudy expects to see the same consistent improvement that Walker has shown the past two years.

"She's just going to continue to make that steady progress. She doesn't make 'lightyear jumps,' they're incremental and they're just like, every week it's a little bit better," Rudy says. "She's a very smart kid. She's smart about her goalkeeping. She's the type of kid that can accept the criticism and critiquing, which is good because those who can't usually don't advance."

Rudy credits Walker's success to her spectacular attitude. He described the 21-year old netminder as a very levelheaded and practical individual who has excellent chemistry with her teammates.

"[My teammates] have been awesome," Walker says, adding that they have been especially supportive throughout the course of this injury. "[After learning about the injury] they were almost more upset than I was. They've just been there 100 percent. I wasn't excluded from anything they did."

The support of her teammates is mirrored by Rudy.

"He's been great and that's a big reason why I came here to UMass," Walker says. "He knows a lot about goalkeeping and he's definitely helped out through the years.

"After I found out it was torn I kind of had the choice whether I wanted to get surgery or see if I could play with it torn," she added. "I went and talked to him immediately after I found out... he kind of encouraged me to get the surgery and make sure that it's fixed so I could go 100 percent and wouldn't have to worry about [having more problems] in the future."

Though the knee feels pretty good, Rudy has made sure that Walker has some suitable replacements just in case she is not able to compete.

He has acquired incoming freshman Lauren Luckey from Hendersonville, Tenn., and junior Melissa Jubinville, a recent transfer student from St. Anselm.

Whether Kristin Walker is executing between the posts or cheering from the sidelines, both she and Rudy have high expectations for the fall season.

"Since I was able to kind of sit back and watch during spring practices I think a lot of people upped their games a lot and the skill level is definitely real high," Walker reports. "And our freshmen coming in are going to be big assets to the team."

Kristin Walker (No. 00) suffered an ACL tear in the last game of the Minutewomen's 2005 season. Walker, a redshirt sophomore, returns to the UMass net after an offseason of intense rehabilitation.

UMass' loss to Richmond last fall, and Walker's knee injury, were made even worse when the Minutewomen learned they had not qualified for the Atlantic 10 tournament. The system that determined which teams qualify for the tournament based on the number of points they rack up in a season (three points for a win, one point for a tie) was chucked out the window for a new winning percentage system.

Their 8-9-1 overall record would have clinched them a spot, but under the news conditions, their .556 winning percentage did not meet the necessary criteria.

As bitter as the fall season ended, Rudy is anxious to see what 2006 has in store for his players.

"Last year went pretty well," Rudy mentions. "[It] was a nice improvement. It was the most enjoyable year I've had in the last four or five. We've had some tough seasons. But, I feel like we're coming out of it. I'm being cautiously optimistic."

DeSantis brothers reunite at Rudd Field

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

It's not very often you come across two brothers who played on the same high school and college team, but for Mike and Mark DeSantis, there's nothing unusual about it.

The duo from Stoneham played soccer together for three years at Stoneham High School. Each won a pair of state titles.

Starting in 2006, freshman Mark DeSantis joins his older brother, sophomore Mike DeSantis, in the UMass midfield for what hopes to be a promising season for the Minutemen.

"I'm excited," Mike says on playing with his brother for three more years. "We've always been close, good friends. He deserves to play here. He makes us a better team, and he can definitely help our team win."

"The soccer program at UMass is great," Mark says. "I love it. I love the coaches and the players, but the school is just amazing. And the team, when I was on my visit, I loved these guys. A lot of brothers can't say that they played high school and college soccer together. Hopefully we can continue to play well together, and help our team win."

Mike played in all 20 games as a freshman in 2005. He tallied one goal and one assist last year, and looks to be an even bigger threat as he heads into his sophomore season.

"Mike is a workhorse," UMass coach Sam Koch says. "He's steady. He gives us great defense, helps win balls and just keeps the midfield focused on their defensive responsibilities. He's also very good going forward. He's very good in transition. He helps a lot of people up, and gets himself into good scoring situations. He's going to score some goals for us this year, there's no question. He's just a good two-way player.

"He [Mike] can do things on both sides of the ball. Whether he's attacking or whether he's defending. He can pretty much play from six-yard box to six-yard box. So he's certainly well-rounded."

Mike will play center-midfield in 2006, and Mark will be rotating from forward and left-outside midfield.

"Mark is similar, but is better on the attacking end than the defensive end," Koch says. "Mike is better on the defensive end than the attacking end. So, in a funny way, they sort of complement each other.

"Mark being left-sided gives us a definite threat on the left side of the field. He has the ability to finish, and he's got a great shot. He's going to score some nice goals for us, but again, how soon can we get him into that mix is the only question."

The DeSantis brothers look to answer that question right away. Mark comes into UMass as the all-time leading scorer at Stoneham High School with 130 points on 83 goals and 47 assists. Those numbers made him one of the best public high school players in Massachusetts. With a little help from his big brother, Mark shouldn't have a tough time getting settled.

"He'll give us an offensive spark," Mike says about Mark's role with the team as a freshman. "He's really good offensively. He has good skills and a good shot, so hopefully he'll score a lot of goals this year, which was one of our problems last spring."

"I just want to help these guys win," Mark says. "This is a great team, and I just want to win games. That is our goal, and hopefully I can help them out.

"I'll play whatever the coach wants me to play. That's all I can say. Whatever the coach wants me to do, I'll do it."

While the story seems like one out of a Disney movie, there were a few bumps along the road before these two reunited with each other on the field.

During Mark's college selection process, the duo's father had second thoughts about sending his youngest son to the same school as Mike. While Boston College, Boston University, Syracuse, and Northeastern were all options, Mr. and Mrs. DeSantis realized that UMass was where he belonged.

"At first, my dad really wanted [Mark] to go somewhere else," Mike says. "But he realized that having me there wasn't going to cause any problems, it was going to help him, if anything. They know that we'll both be fine together.

"He always got that feeling that if he ended up with his brother. It wouldn't work out at first. He wanted Mark to do his own thing, but in the end, he kind of persuaded him back into coming here."

"He wanted me to look at other schools," Mark says on his father's initial reaction. "But this is the place where I wanted to be."

Both Mike and Mark have high expectations for this upcoming season. With the goal of returning to the Atlantic 10 tournament on their minds, the Minutemen will certainly benefit from this duo for the remainder of their stay in Amherst.

"Whenever we have to call their house, we only have to call it once," Koch says jokingly on the advantages of having two brothers on the team. "They come from a great family that gives a lot of support to both of them. And I think it's probably a big benefit to their family because they can come here and see both of the kids play.

"As far as advantages for us, they're two good kids, and whether they come from two families or one, the team benefits from having both of them. The fact that they have come from one household, and one set of parents that have done a great job raising them, I feel very fortunate that we have them in our family now.

"They're two different players and two different people. The fact that they're brothers certainly helps. They are both of the better players out of Massachusetts, in my mind, and I think anybody in their right mind would want them in their program."

those one-goal games, in which UMass was 6-7 last season with four of those contests going into overtime.

Another area that shows promise is the crucial goalkeeper position. Junior Becky Letourneau started 18 of 21 games last season and looks to step up her play.

Letourneau was 6-12 last season with a 2.39 goals against average, and a .723 save percentage. Shea sees Letourneau making progress, and believes she has the ability to become a dominant player.

"[Letourneau] feels more comfortable now and will be a leader," Shea said. "She is really starting to understand the intricacies of the position and is poised to have a great year."

With the loss of two senior backfielders in Jaime Bawden and Katelyn Woolfrey, Shea expects senior Kwylan Jaggassar and junior Erin O'Brien to take leadership roles in the backfield.

The play of O'Brien as a sophomore last season was particularly impressive, starting in all 21 games and earning Shea's praise.

"Erin has become a great leader on and off the field for us so she will anchor the backfield at sweeper," Shea said.

Jaggassar, who also started all 21 games last season, will play a similar leadership role to O'Brien this season. Jaggassar tallied two goals and three assists while serving as a key member of the team's penalty corner unit in the 2005 campaign.

Jaggassar has plenty of international experience as a three-year starter of the Trinidad & Tobago National Team.

Rounding out the defensive unit are juniors Paula Verma and Kristina DoRosario, sophomore Mary Shea, and freshman Ann DeSanctis. While DoRosario is primarily a midfielder, she displays a level of positional versatility that is one of the team's main strengths.

Exemplifying that versatility is Mary Shea, a key contributor from last year's freshman class. While Shea only started two games last season, she appeared in all 21 contests, tallying two game-winning goals. She has the ability to play all three positions, and will be called upon to step up her play to an even higher level this year.

The midfield will add two talented freshmen, Cher King and Nancy Wagenbrenner. Additionally, sophomore Brigitte Leonard and juniors Kara Murphy, Nicole Phelan, and DoRosario will complete this versatile group.

Shea will do a fair amount of mixing and matching to put her players in the best position to succeed. Wagenbrenner was recently a member of the Zehlendorf 88 team in Berlin, Germany, and showed strong leadership ability for that group. She could be a critical addition to both the midfield and forward positions.

"She brings speed, skills, and a game sense to the program," Shea said.

The forward line will be led by the lone senior, Gina Sanders. Fully recovered from knee surgery, expectations are high for Sanders, who took part in many of UMass' scoring threats last season.

Other than Sanders and junior Rachael Mervine, the forward line will feature four sophomores, including Erin Parker and Katelyn Orlando.

This forward group looks to be a real strength for the Minutewomen, granted that the class of 2009 continues to improve following an exciting first season.

The upperclassman will play just as critical of a role as their younger counterparts.

"Our junior and senior classes are playing at a level of maturity and sophistication that is much higher than when we won six championships in a row," Shea said.

The 2006 field hockey team has a favorable schedule this season. Five of seven crucial A-10 games will be played at home.

"Home field advantage in the A-10 is huge," Shea said. "Being able to play on the field we practice on, and having that comfort zone of playing at home is definitely big."

Furthermore, the travel schedule is less taxing than past years, with only three overnight trips. The Minutewomen kickoff the season with a three-game, seven-day trip to Palo Alto and Berkeley.

Sophomore Erin Parker was named to the Atlantic 10 All-Rookie Team in 2005. She led UMass with 14 points on five goals and four assists.

Junior Erin O'Brien started all 21 games last season and scored two goals off of penalty shots in back-to-back contests.

New turf draws praise from Minutemen

Finally, the sun was out. After a week or so of unmerciful midsummer rain, the skies had finally cleared. Just in time for UMass football.

On Aug. 15, the guys in pads and helmets took to the McGuirk Alumni Stadium for the first practice on the new turf.

Rob Greenfield

"Our players really liked it," head man Don Brown said. "It's fast, it's consistent and I know we are going to appreciate it after those rainy evenings in New England when we used to go out and be in the swamp."

Tall, strong men wearing maroon, black, white, and yellow (walking wounded) practice jerseys took to the green artificial turf.

Out by the 50-yard line, big linemen sweated through their jerseys on this hot day and running backs poured water over their heads to cool off after a quick shot of fluid to keep from dehydrating.

Camp is hard for all football players. But you won't hear complaints from anyone wearing a UMass jersey. They had a brand new present underneath their feet.

"The turf is great," wide receiver Brandon London offered. "Guys have to get used to it early. We're slipping a little bit because we're not used to this type of surface. I think that in the mud, you catch the ball and sometimes you can slip and fall. With the turf you can catch it and go."

Brown paced across the new field while his legion of 90 went to work.

Assistant coaches screamed and disciplined while pads clashed and running backs darted through holes in the practice defenses.

There was a lot of energy on this day. Everyone seemed to want to be there, including myself and the media entourage, who were getting a look at this revamped team for the first time.

It was also our first chance to see the hyped gem that went under construction in the middle of the summer. The 100 yards of green is shaped like the root of a VW bug, peaking in the middle and descending towards the sidelines for draining purposes.

As anyone who went to McGuirk stadium on a rainy day last year knows, the grass did not take kindly to the wet season, and terrain more capable of handling the precipitous months is a welcome sight.

Now it's different. It's new. And it's easier on the eyes.

"The new turf is awesome," chimed linebacker Brad Anderson. "You can cut on the field real easy. It's a smooth playing surface."

"We love the turf," added DB James Ihedigbo. "It's a dream come true for us. We won't get beat over the top this year."

Liam Coen, returning from a freshman breakout season, practiced some drops during the first day on the new grass and liked what he saw.

"It's relieving to be able to want to come to home field because it's actually a good field," Coen said. "Not just because it's your home field."

Preseason All-America punter Christan Koegel stood at the 50-yard line, booting balls across the short end of the field to fellow kicker Chris Koepplin. Long, high spirals floated as high as the press box in a tight spiral that even Coen would be proud of.

As it turns out, kickers have feelings about the new rubber too.

"It's like having Christmas all over again," Koegel beamed. "It's 100 percent better than the other field. It's going to help me 100 percent. If you have a lot of rain on this it's not as bad."

Media day was proof of that. It poured all over UMass before the 10 a.m. practice start time, but the heavy stuff stopped around start time. The sun came out and the rain disappeared into the ground without a trace.

Comparing this rubber tundra to a high holy day might be a little extreme, but everyone seems to be smiling about it – even the linemen.

"[The turf] makes us feel faster," senior captain/all-conference center Alex Miller joked. "I don't know if we are faster but it's definitely an upgrade from last year."

As a UMass photographer, propped on a levitation device (like the ones used by telephone pole repairmen), struggled to get the coaches and players aligned properly for the massive photo at the end of the day, a colleague of mine chimed in.

"The team photo is the hardest part of the year for this team," he quipped.

I know Brown wishes that were true.

Minutewomen show early promise in '06

By Joe Mellone

The 2005 season for the Massachusetts field hockey team yielded mixed yet promising results.

After a tough start that saw the team drop four consecutive games, a late surge of momentum saw the team qualify for its second consecutive appearance in the Atlantic 10 championship game. There they fell to Richmond.

The graduation of key senior starters left many holes UMass coach Patty Shea needs to fill. However, the influx of a strong freshmen class along with the development of the team's upperclassmen has Shea optimistic.

As is true in any team sport, a strong defense is paramount to success.

The backbone of any good defense is its goalkeeper. Junior Becky Letourneau is returning for her second season as the team's starter.

Letourneau shared time in net as a freshman. With the progress she made that year, it was clear Letourneau possessed the skills to start. Letourneau started 18 of the team's 21 games including both of the team's A-10 tournament appearances. Her continued progression is vital to the team's success.

Freshman Sarah Williams looks to challenge Letourneau in net while providing a solid backup.

The Minutewomen defense saw the graduation of two four-year starters. However, senior Kwylan Jaggassar and junior Erin O'Brien look to step in as leaders on defense.

As a freshman, O'Brien showed great promise coming off the bench. Last season she solidified her place as a starter, starting every game. Her instincts on the defensive side of the ball are remarkable, illustrated by her team-high three defensive saves. O'Brien contributed offensively as well, scoring two goals.

Experience is an attribute crucial to the success of a team. Jaggassar provides the backfield with great experience and leadership. Not only are her defensive skills exemplary, she has been a great asset for the team's offense. She scored two goals of her own and assisted in three others last season.

However talented this pair may be, if the spots vacated by graduating seniors are not filled, the team will not experience a great deal of success.

Sophomore Paula Verma needs to step up on the right side of the backfield. As a freshman, she saw limited playing time but her competitive drive along with her talent should lead to her overall advancement as a player.

Freshman Ann DeSanctis looks to break the team's lineup as well.

Every team needs a jack-of-all-trades, someone that can just do it all.

The Minutewomen have a few. Mary Shea is one of them. The sophomore scored nine points last year and saw time in every game. Although her offensive skills are anything but lacking, her defensive prowess adds to her versatility, which makes her invaluable.

The same could be said for DoRosario. The junior started every game in the team's midfield last season.

The ability and willingness to do it all seems to be a reoccurring trend amongst the team's midfielders, and the same is true for sophomore Brigitte Leonard. A solid two-way player, Leonard looks to build on a strong freshman campaign. She notched one point on an assist last season.

Juniors Kara Murphy and Nicole Phelan both look to continue the rapid development they displayed last season. Murphy's offensive skills are unquestioned but her true value to the Maroon and White comes through her instincts. Her ability to anticipate plays from the midfield allows her to avoid mistakes and exploit those of her opponents. Her eight points placed her amongst the team's leaders.

Phelan is a critical component of the team's corner sets. Her finishing skills and offensive instincts are what she will have to rely on in order to augment her offensive output from last season. She scored two goals and saw action in every game.

A huge signing for the program was that of Nancy Wagenbrenner. The freshman is a German national who has played high-level field hockey in Germany since 2004. She led her under-18 team to a National outdoor Championship in the 2004-05 season.

Adding to the midfield depth is Cher King of Barbados. A freshman, King's offensive talents provide Shea with another weapon from the midfield. In 2005 King was named MVP of the Barbados Indoor Hockey Classic. King looks to make an immediate impact for the Minutewomen.

The team's frontline is a rather young group. However, its talent compensates for its youth.

The lone senior Gina Sanders, is looking forward to her first healthy season in Amherst. She appeared in all 21 of the team's games last year netting seven points. Look for that total to rise now that she is completely fit.

The consummate goal scorer, junior Racheal Mervine is a weapon for the Minutewoman offensive attack. Her one-on-one talents and ability to create scoring chances make her a nightmare for opposing defenders.

Katelyn Orlando arrived on the scene last season and wasted no time establishing herself as a force on the UMass frontline. Starting all 21 games for the Minutewomen, Katelyn scored five goals, handed out two assists and was named to the A-10 All-Rookie Team. Orlando looks to establish herself as a top player in the conference.

describes her as a creative player with great field vision and excellent goal-scoring potential.

One offensive star no longer in the UMass equation is Vanessa Lima. After two seasons with the Minutewomen, the hometown prodigy decided to take a step back from Division I soccer. According to Rudy, Lima will attend Salem State this year.

Rudy made it very clear that he expects the scoring load to be shared amongst his entire offense this season.

"We might have somebody just step [and make an impact]," Rudy explained. "I think the goals are just going to come from a variety of directions."

MIDFIELD

The Minutewomen's midfield is going to be mildly different with the loss of three big components. Lindsey Bellini and Tiffany Hamill were lost to graduation and Caitlin Footit has opted to go to a Division III school in San Diego.

The flanker situation is something Rudy is going to need some time to figure out, with one exception: senior Nadia Villarroel. The forensic science major will control the left flank like she has in years past. Rudy said her experience and intensity are two of her best attributes and is excited to see what she has in store for the new season.

"When she gets cranked up she is a wild woman out there, running up and down the flank like a stallion, driving the other team nuts," Rudy said.

Villarroel scored two goals for four points last season.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior Nadia Villarroel played in 19 games last season and started nine times while notching two goals for four points.

Rudy is also anxious to see great play from junior Jenny Roehrig. She started all 18 games last year, racking up three goals and two assists for eight points, and scoring the lone goal in the 1-0 win over Holy Cross on September 16.

DEFENSE

Rudy is not sure whether he will be using a back-three or back-four scheme. He is certain, however, that he will see great things from some of his veteran defenders, juniors Kaelyn Caldwell and Tina Rodriguez, and senior Stephanie Barrett. He's already made plans for the trio to man the left, center, and right sides of the defense, respectively.

There to help out in UMass' defense will be sophomore Melissa Toulouse. The Arlington, Virginia native recorded one assist for one point last year.

GOALKEEPERS

The question over who will start between the posts is still up in the air. Last year's starter, Walker, had knee surgery in December and just started running again about two weeks ago. Rudy said that if the senior's knee responds well to the demands of workouts she will be the first-string goalie.

Just in case, however, the coach has made two more recruitments that he is excited about. One is a soft-handed incoming freshman named Lauren Luckey; the other is Melissa Juvenville, a transfer that used to play ice hockey at Northeastern University.

With Walker back in net, UM defenders set for improvement

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

A season ago, the Massachusetts women's soccer team had little trouble preventing the opposing team from scoring. This year should be no different, as returning goalkeeper Kristin Walker will be even more experienced.

Walker was an all-conference goalkeeper in her 2005 campaign, in which she allowed under a goal per contest. In addition to Walker's return, the team has increased its depth with junior transfer Melissa Jubinville and incoming freshman Lauren Luckey, a highly recruited goalkeeper from Tennessee who led her high school team to the No. 1 ranking in the United States.

Luckey's 5-foot-10 frame, soft hands, and ability in the air has UMass coach Jim Rudy excited, not just about the present, but the future as well.

Sticking with the theme of defense, the Minutewomen will be at least six deep in defensemen. Returning from last year's team is senior Stephanie Barrett and juniors Kaelyn Caldwell and Tina Rodriguez.

The three veterans will be supported by a variety of players who are versatile – they can play midfield in addition to playing defense. Freshmen Meghan Gould, Jackie Desjardins, Katie Ruggles, redshirt freshman transfer Amy Ballew, and sophomore Melissa Toulouse could all see time on defense.

Imperative to the success of this squad will be the offensive attack, particularly from the forwards. To reach the team goals this year, especially making the Atlantic 10 playoffs, the offense will have to raise its game and play up to the level the defense has. To accomplish this, Rudy will be counting on some newcomers to find ways to score.

Freshmen Cristina Adams and Sydney Stoll will be in charge with attacking on offense, along with sophomore returnee Vanessa Patry and the leading scorer from a season ago, junior Britt Canfield. Rudy is excited about the energy that the new arrivals will bring to the squad this year.

"Adams is a small bundle of attacking energy," Rudy said. "She's creative and skillful with the ball and is always around the goal and can score. Stoll is a very dynamic attacking player. She loves to go one-on-one at defenses and she will also defend after losing the ball, which is a great trait for frontrunners."

The health of leading-scorer Britt Canfield also has Rudy convinced that the offense will improve this time around.

"[Canfield] was slowed much of the season and we never quite received consistency at finishing from four to five others," Rudy said.

Also in line to contribute on offense is Ruggles and senior Elizabeth Weinsten.

At midfield, Rudy has an abundance of players at his disposal. In terms of players with a lot of experience, Rudy has senior captain Nadia Villarroel and juniors Jenny Roehrig and Christina Nunes.

"Villarroel is healthy this year and is expected to rule the left flank – last year she was half speed," Rudy said. "Roehrig and Nunes made impressive jumps in their level of play at midfield."

Play at midfield could have a serious youth movement with four freshmen that could see time in Gould, Ruggles, Ballew, and Desjardins. An important addition to this year's team will be the many players who are able to play all over the field, giving Rudy much versatility.

"Ruggles plays off the left side as wing, midfielder, or defender," Rudy said. "Ballew can play midfield or defense and has deceptive skills and finishing ability. Desjardins, a late addition to the roster, will compete as midfielder or defender."

With improved health, young talent, flexibility, and a lot of depth, it will be up to the offense to bring this team to another level.

Young roster and inexperience gives UMass a clean slate

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Correspondent

As a new beat writer, the task of researching a team's previous year can be challenging. But Massachusetts field hockey coach Patty Shea is making that task a little easier for this reporter.

"Every season is a new beginning, a new slate," Shea said. "We have just 14 days to get everyone up to speed. For the freshmen, it's really baptism under fire."

Shea has yet to determine her starting roster for the upcoming season.

"The starters aren't set," Shea said. "[The players] better have made the proper choices over the summer. The real work is done when no one is watching."

Despite a clean slate for the Minutewomen, the lopsided defeat to the Richmond Spiders in last season's Atlantic 10 championship game can't be too far in the rearview mirror. The 7-1 loss appeared as a sudden defensive collapse, but not according to Shea.

"One of the misnomers about that game … was we were prepared to play Richmond, but Richmond was more prepared to play us," Shea said. "The score didn't indicate what our play was."

And Shea is not laying the blame on her backfield or her goalie for surrendering seven goals in that game, an almost guaranteed ticket for defeat in a sport where goals are scored at a premium.

"When we have the ball, we're all on attack, when we don't have the ball we're all on defense," Shea said.

Here is the position-by-position breakdown of the 2006 Massachusetts field hockey team, a team Shea hopes will be a cohesive unit.

FORWARDS

Last year's forwards were a young bunch, and will be again this year.

"They were no longer freshmen towards the end of the year," Shea said. "Their production picked up as the season went along as they acclimated from the grass playing surface in high school to the astroturf surface in college."

With just 37 goals last season and having been out shot 283-268, Shea is also looking for her forwards to take more shots on goal this year.

"Shots take the goalkeeper by surprise," Shea said. "The players can't be worried about always taking the perfect shot, but have to look to capitalize on rebounds."

Returning this season will be sophomore forward Erin Parker, who in her first year led the Minutewomen with 14 points on five goals and four assists.

Also returning is sophomore Katelyn Orlando, who put the ball in the back of the net five times and tallied two assists.

Helping the two youngsters out will be senior forward Gina Sanders, who had three goals and one assist the previous year, and junior Rachel Mervine who contributed two goals and two assists.

Not to be outdone is sophomore Mary Shea, who in her first season scored four times and had one helper.

"Mary Shea is our most versatile player and can play every position," Shea said. "She came in as a forward and now wants to be a field hockey player."

Adding to the potential onslaught of goals this year will be freshmen Christine Rodgers, Amy Novak, and Nancy Wagenbrenner.

Rogers scored 20 goals and helped with seven as a senior at Lunenburg High School.

As a senior last year at Annandale High School in Virginia, Novak scored 15 times and assisted in six goals.

Wagenbrenner will split time between attack and midfield this year. Shea is hoping Wagenbrenner's experience playing indoors at the national level in Germany will translate into success at the collegiate level where games are played outdoors.

"Nancy is a natural indoor player. Stick skills are vital where the indoor game is faster," Shea said.

MIDFIELDERS

According to Shea, the midfielders have a large responsibility on the field.

"Their primary job is to distribute and be playmakers," Shea said. "Defensively, they have to be field generals. They're in the eye of the tornado, and have to make sense of all that stuff spinning around you. They have to be able to go on both offense and defense."

And just who are the players calling the eye of the storm their home this season? Joining Wagenbrenner will be a crew with plenty of experience, including juniors Nicole Phelan who had two goals last year and Kara Murphy, who helped on the offensive attack last year with two goals and four assists.

Also returning will be junior Kristen Dorasario and sophomore Brigitte Leonard. Each contributed one assist last season.

Coming on board this year will be freshmen midfielder Cher King, who netted 10 goals at the National Sports Council Indoor Tournament in her native country of Barbados.

Making sense of the storm will have to be done without Patricia Borneo however, who last year as a senior led the midfielders with three goals, and led the team with seven assists.

BACKFIELDERS

The backfield this year will be without a familiar face, Jamie Bawden, one of the few departing players from last year's squad, whom Shea described as a leader by example.

"[Bawden] was very confident in her skills," Shea said. "Her international experience brought a lot to the field. She was open to adapting her game and was our most consistent player."

If all that wasn't enough, Bawden contributed to the offensive attack with four goals and three assists of her own, production Shea is looking to get from her backfield this year.

"It is up to the people in the back to win possession and think offensively," she said. "The backfield is where the offense begins."

Shea hopes to get that message across to her backfield this year, which returns senior Kwylan Jaggarsar, who had two goals and three assists last year. Junior backfielder Erin O'Brien scored twice as well.

The backfield will not be without inexperience though, as junior Paula Verma only started four games last year. Freshman Ann DeCantis also joins the backfield this year. DeCantis had 14 goals and 16 assists as a senior at Bellaire (Ky.) High School last year.

GOALKEEPERS

Last year was not the season junior goalkeeper Becky Letourneau was looking to have. As a sophomore in 2005, Letourneau allowed 44 goals in 19 games, an average of over two goals per game.

But Shea has confidence her goalie will be able to keep the lights on the opponent's side of the scoreboard inactive this year.

"[Letourneau] was spectacular in the game against Temple," Shea said. "She was a sophomore, but really a freshman last season."

Shea also believes that having someone to challenge Becky will also prove to be beneficial by forcing her to play at a more consistent level. That challenge will be coming from freshman goalkeeper Sarah Williams, who at Cheyenne Mountain High School in Colorado set a school record with 375 saves and nearly a 90 percent career save percentage.

These goalies will be well prepared coming into all the games this season.

"You want the goalkeepers to be crushed and worked hard during practice. Game day should strictly be mental," Shea said. "All the work is done during practice."

In the end, this position-by-position breakdown may turn out to be useless as looking back at last season is.

"The players have to understand the game and don't look at it positionally," Shea said. "They're expected to be creative and play with confidence in the framework of our priorities."

Only time will tell if that creativity can find its way to each position for the Maroon and White this season.

UMass relies on solid defense

for the other teams. They have to worry about him. They have to know when he's coming forward, when he's going to be in the attack. Now they have, not only our frontrunners they have to worry about, but they also have to worry about a guy that can come out of the back. So I think it's more of a concern for the other teams, than a concern for us."

Simmons is another solid defensive piece that the Minutemen will have to rely on down the stretch. In one of the biggest stories of 2005, Simmons walked on to the team, only to become one of the top goaltenders in the conference. Simmons posted a 1.43 goals-against average in 18 games last year. He also posted four shutouts, and his 94 saves ranked 18th in the nation by season's finish.

The Minutemen enter their 2006 campaign with momentum on their side. UMass made a late-season rally in 2005, posting a 4-0-2 record in its final six games of the regular season. With that, the Maroon and White secured the sixth and final spot in the A-10 Tournament, only to be knocked out in the first round by A-10 champion, Rhode Island.

"It's a new season," Koch said of building upon last year's late-season success. "It's a new team, and last year is last year. The returning players have to make sure that the younger players understand, in order for us to have the success that we had at the end of last season. They have to do the little things that make the difference, as far as being unselfish in attacking situations, and getting back defensively. It's a team game, and we all need to work together.

"Our weakness will be, like last year, we didn't score a lot of goals, and we've picked that up," Koch added. "I think we have some guys that in the second half of the season who are going to do it. Just how soon do we get to that stage is going to be the question. But I think by the time we get to the conference games, we're going to be in good shape."

UMass plays four of its last five regular season games at home, and if 2005 gives any indication of how that will play out, the Minutemen may be in good shape come the A-10 tournament.

The Maroon and White had a 5-2-2 record at Rudd Field last year, and it will need similar success in 2006.

The Minutemen want to get back to the A-10 tournament for the second time in the last four seasons. And although they weren't given much respect in the preseason coaches' poll, Koch is determined to make his 10th post-season appearance in his 16-year tenure at UMass.

"The coaches voted us finishing seventh, which is one place out of the tournament," Koch said. "But we definitely have higher expectations than that, and we're going to have to disappoint a few people to make sure that our expectations come through. That's our plan."

Redshirt sophomore goalkeeper Zack Simmons finished the 2005 season ranked 18th in the nation in saves with 94.

Cook named captain for upcoming season

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

Kenny Cook, defender and captain of the Massachusetts men's soccer team, was named to the Atlantic 10 Preseason All-Conference Team this past offseason, and frankly, he couldn't care less.

"It's the preseason, so it doesn't really mean anything in terms of this year," Cook said. "What it does mean is teams recognize you and try to key in on you."

The junior defender and last year's team MVP, Cook was happy to receive the honor, the third A-10 award of his career, but remained grounded, knowing the team comes first.

UMass coach Sam Koch echoed Cook's comments, downplaying the announcement.

"It doesn't tell us anything we didn't already know about him," Koch said. "We're pleased he received the honor, but it's where the team is at the end of the season that matters. Anything in the preseason won't matter at the end of the year."

The all-conference teams are created through voting by the conference's head coaches, including Koch.

"There's no doubt he's a leader on and off the field for the team," Koch said. "He helps solidify the team on the field."

Koch's faith in Cook's leadership is so strong that he has named Cook the team captain for the upcoming season, but said he does not feel any added pressure in holding the position.

"We've got a young group of guys this year, but I've been around two years now and I've got a good idea of what we're trying to do," Cook said. "We've got a lot of leaders on the team. [Senior midfielder Jason] Scudamore is great up front, and [sophomore defender] Chris Brown is in the backfield with me. We've got plenty of guys who can step up, so it's not just on my shoulders."

Last year Cook was second on the team in scoring with 11 points. In 20 starts, he notched five goals, including a pair of game-winners, and an assist. Although playing primarily from the back, Cook scored the majority of his goals on set pieces where he played up as a forward, demonstrating his versatility on the field.

"Coach Koch gives me the freedom to play as a forward in a lot of our set plays so I'll probably do more of that this year," Cook said. However, with players like Tony Bassett, an offensive midfielder with strong scoring abilities, coming up the ranks, Cook may spend more time in the back keeping the team in position.

"We'll be looking for goals from a lot of guys this year. I think we have a lot of guys who can put the ball in the back of the net," Cook said. "My role is not only to score goals, but as a defenseman I try to communicate and keep the team organized. With me and Brown in the backfield, that's a large part of my game."

The team Cook will try to keep organized is a relatively young one. Midfielders Scudamore and Michael Donnelly are the only seniors on the team, and both are sidelined by injuries for an undetermined amount of time.

But this team was young last year as well, when the Minutemen came from nowhere to go unbeaten in their last six games and earn an A-10 tournament berth. To Cook, that means this year those young players are a little older, and a little more experienced.

"We are a young team in terms of having a lot of freshmen and sophomores on the team," Cook explained. "But we have a lot of sophomores who have a lot of game experience from last year. So we may be young, but we're still experienced."

As the team's leader and captain, Cook expects that experience to be enough to bring UMass back to the A-10 tournament.

Talented freshman class helps Minutewomen's depth

By Eli Rosenbaum
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team is young, but it doesn't lack experience from its head coach, Jim Rudy, who is now in his 19th year at the helm.

Rudy ranks fourth in NCAA Division I history with 287 lifetime wins. He has led UMass to nine NCAA postseason appearances in his 18 years with the program.

Despite finishing 8-9-1 last year and losing six seniors, as well as two players to other schools, Rudy remains extremely optimistic about the upcoming season for a variety of reasons.

"We have a very good incoming class this year, maybe our best," Rudy said. "Time will tell. This class will give us some serious depth. Competition for playing time will be stiff as there is little difference between our No. 1 and No. 18 players."

The Minutewomen had trouble finding ways to score. They were in mostly every game, dropping seven of their nine losses by just a single goal.

The two captains last year, Amy Maffucci and Lindsey Bellini, were lost to graduation, but Rudy is confident that the new senior captains will steer the team in a positive direction.

"Nadia Villarroel and Steph Barrett are our new captains and led us all spring," Rudy said. "The remainder of the group is very responsible and our team's training, focus, and attitude was the best in a long time. Our returnees look very good as well. They reported in good shape and it's obvious they did their technical ad fitness work this summer."

A great sign for this upcoming year is the superb play during the "non-traditional" season, said Rudy. The team went 9-0-1 during the winter/spring season under a new style of offense revolving around the returning veterans and the talented group of newcomers.

The team gained valuable experience by winning an indoor tournament, defeating a talented Japanese touring team, and registering four shutouts. Rudy is confident that his team's scoring issues will be fixed in 2006.

The top returning scorer, junior Britt Canfield, is now healthy after being slowed with injury in 2005. In addition to that, the incoming class of freshman and transfers gives UMass the depth that Rudy has been seeking.

"We have lots of versatility in this team," Rudy said. "We will have depth at keeping for once with three. Five can play in the front, five to six in wide positions, five to six centrally in midfield, and six in the back."

With a deep roster, youthful exuberance, a new fitting style of play, and improved health, the Minutewomen have high expectations for the upcoming season.

"Our goal is to improve on our 2005 record, have winning records in both conference and non-conference play, and ultimately qualify for the Atlantic 10 playoffs," Rudy said. "The key to our success is staying healthy and keeping a positive team and individual chemistry when playing time becomes an issue."

"I thought Liam played pretty well," Brown stated. "But if you ask him I think there would be a couple of things that he would take back."

The interceptions?

"There were two mistakes I'd like to take back," Coen said. "The first [interception] was tipped and the [Colgate defender] made a nice play. The second [interception] was a miscommunication and something that we can't have if we want to continue on this road of success."

While the two interceptions weren't pretty – the first gave Colgate excellent field position and the second was an obvious blunder – the UMass defense bailed Coen out and had the upper hand on the Raiders for the full 60 minutes.

Two baffling scenarios encompassed the Minutemen's defensive effort on Saturday.

The first came on Colgate's third series of the first half. The Raiders began the drive on their own 12 yard-line and marched down the field. They converted a crucial third-down pass over the middle for an 18-yard gain to prolong the drive, and running back Jordan Scott (21 carries for 86 yards) mixed in a 20-yard run.

Colgate had momentum and the ball as it set up for a 1st-and-10 on the UMass 23 yard-line.

1st Down: pass from QB Mike Saraceno to WR Kenny Parker for a two-yard loss.

2nd Down: Saraceno to Parker for a three-yard loss.

3rd Down: sack by James Ihedigbo on a weak-side blitz for an eight-yard loss.

It was a 13-yard back peddle in three plays and it put the Raiders out of field-goal range. They were forced to punt.

The second sequence came on Colgate's first drive of the second half that started on the eight yard-line after Coen threw the more costly of his two interceptions.

Colgate's Kody Williams picked off a Coen spiral at UMass' 41 yard-line and ran it back 33 yards to inside the 10.

1st and Goal from the 8 yard-line: Scott runs up the middle for no gain.

2nd and Goal from the 8: the Raiders go from the shotgun formation and snap the ball over the QB's head; the ball is recovered by Colgate at the 19 yard-line.

3rd and Goal from the 19: Saraceno is sacked for a seven-yard loss.

4th and Goal from the 26: Colgate's field goal try blocked by James Ihedigbo.

Eighteen yards lost. No points. And another victory for the UMass defense.

"When our backs were to the wall and [Coen] made a mistake, we were right there to bail him out," middle linebacker Charles Walker said. "[Coen] made a mistake. Everyone makes mistakes. That is what [the defense] is here for. We're a team. We're one unit."

Entering this season, the defense was in question due to the losses of R.J. Cobbs and, primarily, playmaking safety Shannon James. But Saturday's defense looked sharp and buckled down when it needed to. An encouraging sign for Brown.

"That goes to show you how talented our team is," Walker continued. "We had a lot of talented guys leave last year, but Brain Ellis [one interception, two tackles] had that big interception today. So that goes to show you our depth and the quality of players we have."

and special team's player.

"If I had to single out one defensive performer the last two practices that is exceeding my expectations, it's him," Brown said at media day on Aug. 15. "He's been there [in the secondary] so it's not like we're training a new guy."

Last season after the Richmond game on Sept. 1, Smith was awarded Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Week honors. In that game he recorded five tackles and two interceptions.

Three players are set to see significant time at cornerback for the Minutemen.

Brandon Freeman and sophomore Sean Smalls – who will split time – will join senior Tracy Belton.

"Sean Smails is picking up at the corner position," Brown said. "He's an extremely talented young man. He's taken another step since the spring."

As a true freshman in 2005, Smalls saw action in nine games and made eight stops.

In just his second year in Brown's system, Smalls is still learning.

"It's hard sometimes knowing all the stuff [Brown] puts in, but it's all things you need to know," he said.

Both defensive end positions remained a question during camp.

Replacing a playmaker like Williams isn't easy for any team. Last season he was fourth on the team in tackles and added four sacks.

Junior David Burris moves over to replace Williams this season. Undersized at 6 feet, 242 pounds, Burris will rely on quickness rather than speed to penetrate the opposing offensive line.

"He doesn't look the part of a defensive end," Brown said. "But when you put the game tape on, he's like a lawn mower. You just pull the cord and he starts playing and he never makes mistakes. He plays the game hard all the time with great passion."

Brown tried a number of different combinations during camp looking for a right fit at the other end position.

"We've even toyed with John Hatcheil who is probably three-tenths of a second faster this season," Brown said.

The coach must have liked what Hatchell did in camp. Against Colgate, the team's strongest player – he holds the UMass record by bench-pressing 520 lbs. – lined up at defensive end.

"That's still a work in progress and is the one piece we've got to sort out from a personnel standpoint," Brown said.

More than anything, Tikum's leadership will be missed at the middle linebacker position. The two-year team captain has traded his helmet for a headset, joining Brown's coaching staff as an assistant linebackers/defensive specialties coach.

Last season, Brown started grooming Tikum's replacement – Charles Walker – but ended the year by redshirting him after three games. After fully recovering from knee surgery in 2005, Walker is poised to finally take over the middle.

"He plays at a very high level," Brown said. "You watch the tape and in the pass-game it's like a safety playing middle linebacker, and in the run-game he's like a middle linebacker. We really feel strongly about his play."

UM flashes different look on Opening Day

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

September is here and UMass is starting up. Break out your academic calendars and bring your brains out of hibernation. Program The Hangar into your phone again, get the student ID ready for the luxurious UMass dining halls, and prepare for another season on the gridiron.

UMass football is back.

The Minutemen are fresh off several weeks of practice on the shiny, green artificial giant that was installed over the summer. Like the field, the team has a new look this season. You might have to check your programs a couple of times to remember who's who.

If you followed football at UMass last year, names like Shannon James and R.J. Cobbs came up frequently in newspapers and rung through loud speakers. They were important actors in a suffocating UMass defense that ranked first in scoring defense, and a balanced offensive attack.

This year there is no James or Cobbs. Both were lost to the NFL. But the holes will be filled by capable replacements and UMass coach Don Brown is poised to keep his defense one of the best in the land.

Liam Coen – the boy wonder who replaced Tim Day last year at quarterback – is healthy and ready to go, with familiar and foreign targets to throw to at wide receiver.

Punter Christian Koegel was named to the Second Team All-America on the defensive side, and will remain a valuable asset for the defense-oriented Brown, who surely cherishes good field position.

The Minutemen are one of the powerhouses in Division I-AA again this season but have some obstacles in their own division to overcome.

The Sports Network picked New Hampshire to finish first in the Atlantic 10 North and with quarterback Ricky Santos (3797 yards, 39 touchdowns, 505 rushing yards in 2005) and wide-out David Ball (87 receptions, 1551 yards, 24 TD in 2005) returning to the UNH offense, the Wildcats will compete in most games.

KOJI AZUMA/COLLEGIAN

Linebacker Jason Hatchell (No. 43) had nine tackles and defensive back Sean Smalls (No. 16) had three tackles in UM's 28-7 win over the Raiders Saturday.

Here's what UMass will look like this season, on both sides of the ball.

OFFENSE

QUARTERBACK

Coen is the main man this year. Everyone knows who No. 12 is and there will be no flying under the radar. That being said, Brown couldn't be happier with the young QB's progress early in camp.

"Liam has had a very solid spring followed up with an excellent spring game," Brown said. "He's come in and he's had a good camp. He's still a youngster, and has work to do as well.

"I like the way he carries himself. I know his teammates trust him and I know he'll be ready to play."

Coen completed 63.9 percent of his passes last year – second among all freshmen in the nation – won the A-10 Rookie of the Week award three times while throwing for 2,175 yards, sixth-most in UMass history for a single season.

Needless to say, everyone is anticipating where Coen and the offense can go from there.

"We're looking great. We're looking fast," Coen said at media Day in August. "The offense is looking very positive right now. We have a lot of confidence. The offensive line is doing a great job and the wide receivers look great. The sky's the limit to where we can go right now."

Not only has Coen solidified his own position, but Brown has brought in some reinforcements to back up the second-year QB. Joe Sanford and Scott Woodward "are in competition for the No. 2 spot," said Brown.

WIDE RECEIVER

Since defense is on Brown's mind from Day One, the program might be in somewhat of an identity crisis. These returning wideouts are the main culprit for this confusion.

Senior Brandon London and juniors J.J. Moore and Rasheed Rancher represent an athletic and talented receiving corps that Coen can utilize. Brown might have a powerhouse offense this season to go along with his usual shut-'em-down defense.

But there are lingering questions.

Moore will play in his first game since an ankle fracture in early October last year sidelined him for the rest of the season. Rehabbing it over the summer paid dividends and he has made a full recovery, but the trust in his body and his speed might be a little harder to get back.

"When you break a leg you aren't just going to jump back in after you are hurt and start bouncing around with the same disregard for your body," Brown offered. "It takes a little time to build the confidence that you are going to be OK again. I think it took him pretty much all spring to do that. He showed a couple of good flashes in the spring game that made me feel like he has moved on, and I can honestly say now I really feel like he's moved on."

Rancher, as a redshirt sophomore in 2005, emerged as a reliable target for Coen. He finished last season with 26 catches for 425 yards and three TDs, good for third on the team in catches and second in receiving yards. With a year of experience under his belt, Rancher should be primed for another productive season.

London has improved every year that he's donned the UMass uniform. As a freshman in 2003 he caught four passes, in 2004 he caught 34 passes, and last year he jumped to a staggering 60 receptions. London finished seventh in the A-10 in receptions per game (5.5) in 2005 and was named to the A-10 Third Team.

With those three guys roaming the sidelines, Coen has plenty of options when he drops back.

TAILBACK

Steve Baylark is shooting for a fourth straight season with 1,000 yards gained. There are only four other players who have done that in Division I-A history. And Baylark is just the third player in I-AA to gain 1,000 yards in each of his first three seasons. Barring injury, it should be another record-breaking season for Baylark, especially with senior center Alex Miller anchoring the offensive line.

"Our team is definitely coming around," Baylark said. "We have a great offensive line and a great quarterback to lead us, as well as great receivers. Our running back corps is definitely a weapon that we want to establish on the field."

Brown helped Baylark by bringing in three capable backs, including two I-A transfers in Matt Lawrence (from Connecticut, who suffered an ankle injury on his first carry of the year last season) and Tim Washington, a Syracuse transfer who played three years for the Orange before coming to UMass.

Washington has just one year of eligibility but Brown feels his versatility will pay dividends. Tony Nelson, a highly touted recruit from last season, redshirted the 2005 campaign and is ready to take some handoffs this year.

OFFENSIVE LINE

Miller, named a captain for 2006, was named to Pre-season All-America Second Team for offense. The 6-foot-2, 300 pound force will provide ample protection from intruding pass rushers and give Baylark the holes that he needs for another stellar season.

"The big boys in the front promised me 2,000 yards this year," Baylark said about his O-line. "So we are just going to take it step by step, and see how we do. [The lineman] have been doing a great job for me the past couple years and hopefully they will get me 2,000 like they said."

"He's without a doubt one of the best if not the best center in I-AA football," Brown said of his anchor man.

"He's really bought into the captain's role. His teammates are important to him. I couldn't be happier with his play and the intangibles he brings to the table."

DEFENSE

SECONDARY

No more Shannon James picking off passes on deep routes. But in James's wake, Brandon Smith has emerged as the likely candidate to take his place at strong safety.

"Brandon Smith played a lot of minutes for us at strong safety and dog safety, he's playing free safety in place of Shannon James," Brown stated.

James Ihedigbo returns to the UMass secondary as one of the leading pass rushers from the safety position last season. Ihedigbo had 7.5 sacks in 2005 with 12 tackles for a loss of 60 total yards.

"Blitzing is one of my strengths and I enjoy doing it," Ihedigbo said. "We're excited and looking forward to getting after it."

The cornerback position is the most experienced on the field. Senior Tracy Belton, junior Brandon Freeman, and sophomore Sean Smalls all have prior experience, while sophomores Brian Ellis and Michael Meggett will both see time in different defensive packages.

DEFENSIVE LINE

Senior John Hatchell and junior David Burris will man the front lines for the UMass defense this season, and things will be easier for the secondary and the linebackers with those two guys up front.

Hatchell finished last season with 36 tackles – 5.5 of which came behind line of scrimmage. Burris had equally impressive numbers at the right defensive end position. He finished the 2005 campaign with 49 tackles.

"We moved him over to Keron Williams's position because we think he's that kind of a playmaker that will give us that kind of intangible quality," Brown continued. "He's a student of the game. It's good because I keep hearing myself say the same things. He plays the game hard all the time with great passion. I think that rubs off on his teammates as well. He's going to be one of the leaders up front and he needs to be a playmaker up front."

Senior Jason Leonard returns as a starter and junior Patrick Powell and Darnel Delaire will compete for a starting end position.

LINEBACKERS

Jason Hatchell was named to the A-10 First Team at linebacker after a stellar 2005 season where he had a career-best 107 tackles.

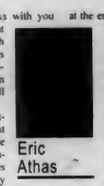
"We have so many capable linebackers," Brown said. "With the return of Hatchell, Brad Anderson, Cesar Rosario, and George Byrd, we are in a good position. Now we can add back Charles Walker, who is fully recovered, and newcomers Anthony Rouzier and Josh Jennings. We feel our linebacker corps is one of the better positions on our team as a whole."

SPECIAL TEAMS

UMass has one of the best punters in Division I-AA football. Christian Koegel will be a nightmare for opposing teams looking for good field position. Koegel is UMass' all-time leading punter heading into this season. He has averaged 40.95 yards per punt in his career and was named A-10 Special Teams Player of the Year in his junior season in 2005.

Koegel finished third in the nation in punt average with a 43.0 yards per punt average, and UMass led the country in net punting at 38.35 yards per punt.

Games to remember, and games to forget



Eric Athas

It kind of just sticks with you in your thoughts. That one play, that one flash in a game that makes it memorable – whether you like it or not. In 2005, UMass football had some doozies.

There was the eight-turnover near-win against Colgate. Albany's three safeties. The game-winning kick against James Madison at a mucky McGuirk Stadium. The meltdown at Hofstra. The botched snap at Army. And of course, New Hampshire quarterback Ricky Santos and his four touchdown passes to receiver David Ball.

Makes you wonder what 2006 has in store.

Maybe four safeties against Albany? Maybe? Okay, that one's impossible. And the mud at McGuirk? That's also not going to happen.

But every season will have its moments, and nobody will have to tell you when they occur – you'll know. The crowd will be deafening, or completely hushed. The players will be jumping with bliss, or face-down on the ground.

In 2006, these sharp moments will make you remember the unforgettable games of the year.

1. @ New Hampshire, Nov. 4, 12 p.m.

There's no question: This game will bring with it banter, hype, and a search for retribution. The latest episode of this rivalry will be one to watch. Right now there's no telling what the overall records of these two teams will be when they meet, but I promise you, playoffs will be at stake.

In 2005, it was the best offense in the Atlantic 10 (UNH) against the best defense (UMass). This year's contest won't need a script. UNH has arguably two of the most dangerous weapons in I-AA football (Santos and Ball). Ball has a chance to break some of Jerry Rice's college records!

And UMass: it wants blood. The Wildcats edged the Minutemen 34-28 in '05, and the loss ended up being one of the deciding factors for both teams. UMass missed a playoff berth, and UNH was the No.1 seed. Oh yeah, and the last time the Minutemen played football at New Hampshire's Cowell Stadium, RB Steve Baylark cashed in, rushing for 192 yards as they handled the Wildcats 38-21.

2. Hofstra, Nov. 18, 12 p.m.

Don't know what happened at Hofstra on November 19, 2005? Don't ask a UMass football player. Look it up or something. Or just keep reading, whatever. It was the final game of the regular season. Hofstra had nothing to lose, and UMass everything. And they did. The game was the explanation point at the end of the Pride's season, and the triple backslash at the end of the Minutemen's. It was a physical brawl, sending UMass quarterback Liam Coen to the sidelines with a concussion. In the end, the Pride came out on top, 21-10.

This season's matchup will be just as physical, except this time in Amherst, not Hempstead. Chances are this game could be a fight for a playoff berth, since it is the final contest of the season.

3. Rhode Island, Oct. 21, 1 p.m.

Okay, so the Rams don't play fun-to-watch football. And they didn't make the playoffs last season. But this contest will be one of the first tests at home for the Minutemen. With the A-10's best rushing offense in 2006, and the Offensive Rookie of the Year in the backfield, UMass will have to beef up its run defense for this one.

Look for the Hatchel Bros. to play a big role. For the Rams last year, true freshman Joe Casey became the cornerstone of URI's run-all offense. He ran for 148 yards against UMass last year – not too shabby for a true freshman taking on the top-ranked defense. Oh yeah, and this year's contest is homecoming, but let's face it, nobody really cares about that at UMass.

4. @ Navy, Sept. 9, 1:30 p.m.

Got a car? Not too frazzled about the gas prices? This Saturday's contest against Navy will be an experience if anything. The Midshipmen made themseives a legitimate I-A football team last season, posting an 8-4 record and winning the Poinsettia Bowl against Colorado State.

The Minutemen showed that they could compete at the IA level, coming extremely close to upsetting an up-and-coming Army team last season. So it will be interesting to see whether or not UMass can make some noise against Navy.

5. Stony Brook, Sept. 23, 1 p.m.

It was on Nov. 12 of last season when UMass battled with Army – fighting, struggling, but barely falling short of a win and a playoff berth. On that same day, New Hampshire played a home game against Iona – a small program that plays the likes of La Salle, Saint Peters, and Marist. Needless to say, UNH won 56-0. So what does this have to do with Stony Brook?

If you're a fan that enjoys probable wins that have blowout potential, this one's for you. UMass will have its hands full against Navy, but will get some cushion a few weeks later against Stony Brook, a Division II team.

Classrooms may replace Frat Row

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

The land along one side of North Pleasant Street, where students once looked to for frat parties and keggers, will most likely be replaced by a classroom-office building, University of Massachusetts officials said.

The five pieces of property, formally known as Frat Row, will probably be turned into a small classroom building, according to Joyce Hatch, Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance.

The houses currently sitting on that land will be destroyed after an agreement between UMass and Alpha Tau Gamma Inc., the company which owns the property, is finalized.

If and when that deal is set in stone, the five buildings will be demolished, and a new building will go up at some point in the near future.

"In the long run, it's a good site for a smallish classroom-office building," said Hatch.

According to Hatch, the agreement between the two parties states that ATG must dissemble the five houses located at 375, 387, 389, 395 and 401 North Pleasant St. The deal states ATG must seed and grade the land.

Hatch said even a grassy strip of land will improve the image of UMass before people enter onto campus.

"It'll just be graded, and we'll maintain it," said Hatch. "It'll just enhance the entryway into campus."

Prior to the recent agreement, the Department of Capitol Asset Management, which did the negotiating with ATG on UMass' behalf, asked the University to make a rough future plan of what would happen to the land if the deal did go through, said Hatch.

She said plans are obscure because the deal has not been finalized, but it is likely that a small Social and Behavioral Sciences or Liberal Arts building will replace Frat Row.

"What was the Continuing Ed building is being renovated for the Communications Disorders department," said Hatch. "So we'll have another academic department situated down the street too."

Gordon Hall, which is home to the Legal Studies department, is also in the vicinity of the land.

While the construction of this new building is not going to happen anytime soon, it adds to a long list of New Dirt projects already underway. Yesterday's demolition of the Marshall Annex will make way for a new $92.7 million science building.

Hatch said that the Frat Row land will "certainly not" be used to accommodate a science building.

Kerry to speak at UMass Friday

By Meghan Murphy
Collegian Staff

U.S. Sen. John F. Kerry will speak at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center auditorium this Friday, September 8, focusing on the power of grassroots campaigning and the importance of student voting.

Massachusetts Victory '06, is bringing the senator to campus to speak to students about grassroots campaigning at the university level.

Communications Director Cyndi Roy of Massachusetts Victory '06, the coordinated campaign arm of the Democratic Party, said that UMass was chosen for Sen. Kerry's visit because the University is allowing students to vote on campus this year in the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union.

"For the first time, students will be able to vote and have their voices be heard," said Roy.

Sen. Kerry's visit to UMass will kick off a campaign at colleges across the state designed to inform students about the importance of grassroots organization and why they should invest in this campaign, according to Roy.

"You spend your days in class and walking around campus and at the end of the day, you hope when you leave you'll get a good job, be able to buy a home, and live in a safe community," said Roy. "But you don't have to wait until you graduate to reach these goals. By organizing and campaigning now, you'll have a hand in making sure that these people are in place who can help you reach your goals."

The Massachusetts Victory '06 Web site highlights what the group feels the state is lacking, stating that "after 16 years of Republican rule, Massachusetts needs real leadership." Education tops the list, and the Web site states that "Massachusetts ranks 49th in the nation in terms of support for public higher education."

"The goal of Massachusetts Victory '06 is to ensure that Democrats down the ballot are elected," said Communications Director Cyndi Roy of Massachusetts Victory '06.

Sen. Kerry will focus on the importance of involvement in grassroots campaigning to help elect the people who can improve students' futures, according to Roy.

There will also be a training session for students who have been recruited as "campus coordinators" at UMass immediately following Sen. Kerry's speech. The campus coordinators "will be trained on how to reach their fellow peers on how to get involved in this campaign," said Roy.

Professor to serve on FDIC

By Ryan Richardson
Collegian Staff

As college costs rise, students are becoming more familiar with loans and the banks that make them.

As chair of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, Sheila Bair who's also a professor at the Isenberg School of Management at the University of Massachusetts, plans to help educate people with low incomes, like students, into using banks for their favor.

Helping to bring low income individuals into the economic mainstream through banking education isn't the only thing on Bair's agenda.

The UMass professor will lead the FDIC through many issues including the premium increases to shore up reserve deposits and deciding whether or not to allow large companies like Wal-Mart and Home Depot to open lending companies.

Bair's nomination in Apr. 2006 wasn't easy. For three months, Bair's name and resume was placed under a microscope as her resume, one that includes prior experience on both Wall Street and the government, were passed around Senate and House subcommittees. The nominations process was nothing new for Bair, having gone through it on three prior occasions.

"It's a long, delicate process. There's an FBI background check, and you file extensive financial reports," Bair said. "Once all that is done, there's a confirmation hearing from committee."

For Bair, the process is worth it.

"I strongly believe in government and public service," she said. "We have a whole flight of issues where this agency, as I as chair can make a real difference."

In that way, the job isn't a far cry from what she was doing at the University, helping people to understand the financial world around them and hopefully arming them with the tools to take advantage of it — it's simply on a much wider scale.

The parallels don't stop there; both academia and public service involve a lot of work that goes on behind the scenes.

"The work of an academic is very insular," Bair said. "I found it was four to five hours to prepare for a one hour class. It does take a lot of time to do a meaningful job."

The FDIC is also not the most prominent government agency, and a lot of its importance goes on behind banks and financial institutions, to most people the FDIC is just a few letters on the door of a bank.

There are obvious differences in the work, however.

"Academic life sets its own pace, unlike this job," Bair said.

As chairman, Bair is constantly talking to other people about policy, testifying in front of congressional committees, and keeping tabs on what the market is doing. Of course, drawing comparisons is superficial with two such divergent positions. That isn't to say that one job is ample preparation for the other — the two require different aspects and abilities, and throughout her career Bair has demonstrated both.

"She has a great background with deep knowledge," Thomas O'Brien, former dean of the School of Management, said in May. Bair's absence leaves a gap in the Isenberg faculty but as it stands now it looks as if it will only last for the rest of Bair's five-year term.

"I so enjoyed working with the students and am looking forward to coming back," Bair said. "We plan to return; I love New England."

Annex destroyed for new science building

Marshall Annex, a 10,275 square foot building located near the Worcester Dining Commons at the University of Massachusetts, was demolished at 6 a.m. Wednesday.

The annex, which dates back to the mid 1940s, was brought to the University from the Westover Air Force Base in Chicopee, according to Wednesday's press release.

The annex functioned as additional laboratory space for Marshall Hall, which was demolished in the late 1990s when its facilities were deemed outdated for scientific research.

"The annex was functioning until a couple of years ago. Most recently it was being used as studio space by the art students," said Patrick Callahan, UMass News Office spokesman.

According to Jim Hunt of UMass Facilities and Campus Planning, the space was occupied until the end of the Spring 2006 semester.

Extra measures will be taken when removing the debris from the site, potentially including asbestos and lead paint, "because it's the law and because they are hazardous materials," said Callahan.

Professional companies have been hired to remove the debris from the site, according to Hunt.

The removal of debris is expected to take one or two days.

Once the debris is cleared, the construction of a new Integrated Science Building will begin. The anticipated cost of the new building is $92.7 million. The groundbreaking ceremony for the new construction project will take place on Friday at 1:30 p.m.

"Depending on the scope of the project, the date keeps changing, but right now, the completion of the building is scheduled for the spring of 2009," said Hunt.

Colleges grapple with increase in student suicides

By David Caruso
Associated Press

NEW YORK—A depressed Hunter College student who swallowed handfuls of Tylenol, then saved her own life by calling 911, was in for a surprise when she returned to her dorm room after the ordeal. The lock had been changed.

She was being expelled from the dorm, the school informed her, because she violated her housing contract by attempting suicide. The 19-year-old was allowed to retrieve her belongings as a security guard stood watch.

Policies barring potentially suicidal students from dorms have popped up across the country in recent years as colleges have struggled to deal with an estimated 1,100 suicides a year. But some of those rules have come under legal attack.

Hunter College announced last month that it was abandoning its 3-year-old suicide policy as part of a settlement with the student. The student, who was allowed to continue attending class, claimed in a lawsuit that her 2004 ouster from the dorms violated federal law protecting disabled people from discrimination.

The school, part of the City University of New York system, also agreed to pay her $65,000.

Hunter spokeswoman Meredith Halpern said the college may still consider temporarily removing troubled students from its residence halls, but such evictions will no longer be automatic.

College officials say such expulsions are not punitive; Halpern said Hunter's policy was aimed at protecting students' privacy and shielding them from schoolmates' prying eyes. At George Washington University in the nation's capital, spokeswoman Tracy Schario said the idea is to give suicidal students a break from the stresses of university life and encourage them to seek help.

But some activists suspect such evictions are an attempt by colleges to avoid legal liability if someone commits suicide in the dorms.

Up until recently, the prevailing legal theory had long been that adult students were responsible for their own behavior, and that colleges could not be held liable. But that philosophy was undermined by a pair of court rulings involving the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Ferrum College in Virginia.

In both cases, judges ruled prior to out-of-court settlements that colleges might have a duty to prevent a suicide if the risk was foreseeable. The cases prompted some schools to be more aggressive about sending troubled students home.

Karen Bower, an attorney with the Bazelon Center for Mental Health Law, which helped litigate the Hunter College case, said she hopes the settlement will prompt other schools to rethink their policies.

"The real danger of these policies is that they discourage students from getting the help that they really need," Bower said. Students might be scared from speaking out about suicidal thoughts if they believe it would mean eviction, she said.

The chances that a student might be expelled from a dorm simply for talking about suicide with a counselor are considered slim. Conversations with mental health professionals are generally confidential and protected by privacy laws.

But universities can hear about a student's troubles and take action if he has been talking with friends or classmates, or does something that leads to a middle-of-the-night hospitalization, which might involve campus security or a housing official.

Elsewhere around the country, George Washington University is being sued by a former student who was barred from campus and threatened with expulsion after checking himself into a hospital for depression. The student, Jordan Nott, said he never tried to kill himself but had been thinking about it because of the suicide of a close friend, also a George Washington student.

The Bazelon Center is also representing a student at a Connecticut boarding school who was placed on a mandatory leave after seeking treatment for depression.

George Washington's Schario said the school's treatment of Nott was not an attempt to limit legal liability, but "to protect a life." She added that Nott's case was an unusual one. More than 200 students seek help for depression or suicidal thoughts each year at George Washington, and a majority are not asked to leave.

"It is always a case-by-case assessment of what is best for that particular student," Schario said.

She acknowledged, however, that the university's current practice of using its disciplinary system to handle some students with psychological problems "does appear insensitive" and said other procedures were being considered.

Joanna Locke of the Jed Foundation, a program aimed at preventing college suicides, said schools should have flexibility. Some schools, she said, may feel a need to send a student home if they cannot offer proper treatment, or if the student has become disruptive.

"There is no right answer, except that [the decision] should be made carefully, and the decision should be made kindly," she said.

Man held in the grizzly slaying of mother, daughter

By Glenn Adams
Associated Press

NEWRY, Maine—Julie Bullard and her daughter tried to put tragedy behind them when they moved from California to Maine to run a bed and breakfast. It was to be a fresh start after her daughter's husband died in a car accident.

Now, both are dead, and a guest in the inn was charged Tuesday with killing them and two others in Maine's biggest homicide case in more than a decade.

Three victims of the weekend carnage at the 130-year-old converted farmhouse were dismembered. State Police Chief Col. Craig Poulin called it "a crime of horrific proportions."

Police said Christian Nielsen, 31, who had worked as a cook at another inn in neighboring Bethel, did not resist when he was arrested on four murder charges.

Poulin said the investigation was too new to comment on a motive, but added, "We believe no one else was involved and there are no additional victims."

Nielsen, who had been living at the Black Bear Bed & Breakfast for a couple of months, told police that his first victim on Friday was James Whitehurst, 50, of Batesville, Ark., whose remains were burned and discarded in the nearby town of Upton, authorities said.

Inn owner Julie Bullard, 65, was killed Sunday, police said. The following day, her daughter, Selby, and friend Cynthia Beatson, 43, were also killed when they arrived at the inn unexpectedly, a state police affidavit said. All three women were dismembered.

Autopsies were being conducted on the three women Wednesday, said Jim Ferland, administrator of the state medical examiner's office. He said police were still at the scene with Whitehurst's remains.

State police were alerted to the carnage Monday evening by Nielsen's father and stepmother who arrived at inn to find a woman's body and blood outside. Nielsen's father told troopers that he thought his son had committed the killing, according to prosecutors.

Nielsen, questioned by detectives Monday night, admitted killing all four people, the affidavit said. He then led a detective to Upton, where Nielsen said he had disposed of Whitehurst's body, the document said.

Whitehurst, described as a handyman who was helping out Julie Bullard, had been staying in the inn, a white clapboard farmhouse with a red metal roof, while he was in the area.

Julie Bullard had purchased the building, which had been converted into a bed and breakfast with a pool and tennis court, after moving to Maine two years ago. She had operated a bed and breakfast in San Francisco that she sold prior to coming to the area, a magnet for skiers and other outdoor enthusiasts.

"Her daughter, Selby, had just lost her husband in a car crash and I think in some ways she and Selby were doing something together, getting a fresh start," said Robin Zinchuk, executive director of the Bethel Area Chamber of Commerce.

Julie Bullard decided in February to close the Black Bear, Zinchuk said, and there was a "For Sale" sign out front. Selby Bullard had recently been working part-time with Beatson at Apple Tree Realty Inc.

As news of the murders spread Tuesday, people in the community were shocked. Newry is near Maine's border with New Hampshire and about 75 miles northwest of Portland.

"The whole thing is surreal. It's a shock to this small community," said Nancy White, co-owner of the Sudbury Inn, where Nielsen worked. White described him as a reliable employee, a good cook and "soft-spoken, quiet individual."

Police stressed that the string of killings, unusual in a state with a low crime rate, was over. Nielsen knew at least two of the victims — Whitehurst and the older Bullard — and probably knew all four, Poulin said.

Nielsen, who formerly lived and worked in Farmington in western Maine, had a history of driving offenses that included an arrest for drunken driving, but nothing more serious, Farmington police said. His license was revoked a year ago, said Farmington Lt. Jack Peck.

Christian Nielsen, above, was charged in the biggest homicide case in Maine history.

Nielsen was ordered held without bail. He appeared in court Tuesday wearing an orange jumpsuit and bulletproof vest. Nielsen uttered only two words in court: "I am," when the judge asked if he was present. He appeared calm and smiled as he was brought into and left the courtroom.

Professor evaluates search for human remains at WTC site

By Oliver Bowers
Brown Daily Herald (Brown U)

PROVIDENCE, R.I.—Brown University professor of anthropology Richard Gould is no stranger to disaster scenes. As founder and director of a volunteer forensic recovery group, Gould has previously worked to identify human remains at the Station nightclub in West Warwick, R.I., where a 2003 fire killed 100 people. It was because of this reputation that Gould was recently called upon by relatives of victims of the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks in New York City to evaluate continued efforts to locate and identify human remains at a building near the World Trade Center site.

Following a complicated approval process, Gould was allowed on Aug. 8 to examine the forensic archaeology efforts taking place at the Deutsche Bank building, which is located a short distance from ground zero and was damaged significantly on Sept. 11. His goal was to review the quality of the recovery efforts in light of reports earlier this year that the excavation process was substandard.

In a report filed to the Office of the Chief Medical Examiner in New York City, Gould wrote that the work being done is the "best possible under the circumstances" and is generating a 90 to 95 percent level of recovery. The report was leaked to the press on Aug. 25 and made public by the OCME shortly thereafter.

Gould's report was the first eyewitness description of the effort from a third party and the first public report on the quality of the work being done.

"In effect, what I saw during this site visit was a sustained, controlled recovery effort that has hit its stride and should be continued as long as it is safe to do so," Gould wrote in the report.

Gould's trip to the Deutsche Bank site came at the request of Sally Regenhard, chair of the Skyscraper Safety Campaign, an organization of victims' relatives. The organization expressed concerns after several media outlets reported in April that ex-firefighters and construction workers may have used rakes and shovels to comb the debris instead of a systematic method overseen by archaeologists.

Gould also said he hopes the report will be the first step in dealing with what Regenhard referred to as an "information void." No news was released to the families on the quality of the recovery since April, Gould said. In his report, Gould suggested that "some of the misunderstandings during the Deutsche Bank Building recovery operations could have been avoided by timely bulletins from the OCME about the excellent work taking place there once it began."

Though he made the trip to the Deutsche Bank site alone, Gould's prior experience near ground zero was part of an effort by Forensic Archaeology Recovery, a volunteer organization formed in 2002 to help "local authorities locate, record, and recover human remains ... at mass-fatality disaster scenes," according to its Web site. FAR's first effort at forensic archaeology was on Barclay Street, which is located a few blocks away from ground zero. FAR also helped identify remains after the Station nightclub fire.

Despite backing from victims' relatives, getting permission to inspect the recovery effort was not easy, Gould said.

"We had to elbow our way in," he said. "Prying open the doors of power is difficult in New York City."

Gould was initially denied access to the site by the OCME. However, following a July 15 demonstration from a number of groups, including the Skyscraper Safety Campaign, and a letter from Gould to the office of New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, Gould was given permission to inspect the site.

In order to receive access to the site, Gould had to undergo a series of tests — including X-rays and blood tests — and complete courses to prepare him for the hazardous conditions faced by workers, including an Occupational Safety and Health Administration asbestos awareness course. He also needed to obtain his own equipment, including a respirator. Gould was able to use contacts at the University and FAR to complete all of these requirements and more in just 48 hours.

Just scheduling a respirator medical can take several weeks, noted Steve Morin, director of environmental safety and a member of the FAR team. "A lot of people who aren't connected to a school like Brown would have a hard time" meeting the requirements Gould did so quickly, Morin added.

Senate investigates botched 9/11 loans

By Frank Bass
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—The government failed to ensure that recipients of terrorism-recovery loans were actually hurt by the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, allowing banks to spread more than $3.7 billion in aid to whomever they wanted, Senate investigators concluded Wednesday.

The Senate Small Business and Entrepreneurship Committee sharply criticized the Bush administration's primary terrorism relief loan program, saying it was so loosely managed that "conceivably every small business in the country became eligible to participate."

The findings substantiate an Associated Press investigation last year that found government-backed Sept. 11 recovery loans went to small companies that weren't hurt by the attacks and didn't even know they were getting help designated for terror victims.

Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, who leads the Senate committee, said her investigation found no evidence that small companies that received the low-cost Supplemental Terrorist Activity Relief loans had tried to deceive the government.

Instead, she said, the problems stemmed from the Small Business Administration and the private lenders who approved the loans.

Bankers who could lend more money at less cost under the program had an incentive to push the loans, especially after SBA officials told lenders they wouldn't be second-guessed for making STAR loans, she said.

"The lack of clear guidelines allowed lenders to justify making a STAR loan to almost any borrower," the committee report said.

Nearly 3 of every 4 loans made under the program contained either insufficient or questionable documentation to show recipients were actually hurt by the Sept. 11 attacks, Snowe's committee found.

Michael Stamler, an SBA spokesman, said the agency didn't believe it "pushed lenders to abuse the program. ... However, we believe most of the report's findings are valid." The guaranteed loan program was designed by Congress to help small businesses "adversely affected" by the Sept. 11 attacks on New York and Washington.

AP reported last year that recipients of the STAR loans ranged from more than 100 Dunkin' Donuts and Subway franchises to a motorcycle shop in Utah. Ultimately, barely 10 percent of all Sept. 11 direct and guaranteed recovery loans actually went to companies in the Washington and New York areas, AP found.

The Senate report Wednesday follows an investigation late last year by the SBA's own internal watchdog, which found that lenders frequently gave money to companies that weren't hurt by the attacks and didn't document why the loans were related to the Sept. 11 attacks.

Barreto, described the agency's oversight as "far from flawless".

Nick Nikolic (right) a construction worker for Slatery-Skanska, which is cleaning and repairing the tunnel at Ground Zero.

The quick turnaround was essential because victims' families thought the process was being delayed unnecessarily, Gould said.

Gould stressed there were a lot of people at Brown who helped him complete the requirements. Morin helped arrange some of the necessary training and lent Gould his respirator. A number of administrative offices at the University also provided assistance, including the Office of the Provost and Jeanne Hebert, director of the Office of Insurance and Risk, Gould said. He added that Michael Gaughan, vice president and general counsel, and several other members of the general counsel's office reviewed and approved a waiver to secure compensation for workers within the 48 hours.

Bus manager defends company after crash

By Adam Goldman
Associated Press

NEW YORK—A popular Chinatown bus company defended its practices the day after one of its drivers was cited for speeding in a Massachusetts accident that injured 34 passengers and his replacement was taken off the streets because he couldn't speak English.

Fung Wah Bus Transportation general manager Pei Lin Liang said Wednesday that his drivers undergo training before hitting the road and are instructed to drive carefully.

"Drivers are safe," Liang said at his company's downtown Manhattan office. "I tell drivers, 'Slowly, safety first.'"

One of Fung Wah's buses headed from New York to Boston tipped over Tuesday afternoon while rounding an interstate off-ramp in Auburn, Mass. The bus was carrying 57 people. Most of the injured suffered scrapes and bruises.

The driver, Chuandai Chen, 44, of Brooklyn, was cited for speeding, Massachusetts State Police said. The replacement driver and his bus had to be taken out of service because he had a false log book and didn't speak English, both federal violations, Trooper Thomas Ryan said.

Liang said company officials do not pressure drivers to get from one city to another more quickly. He said Chen had to take an alternate route because of an accident and was unfamiliar with the area.

But Fung Wah's drivers have a history of speeding, the U.S. Department of Transportation said.

"Speeding is their No. 1 challenge," DOT spokesman Ian Grossman said. "They need to work to curb their drivers' behavior."

Grossman said the federal transportation department has watched Fung Wah and reviewed its operations annually for the past three years.

"Fung Wah remains high on our priority list to be flagged because of their history with speeding and moving violations," he said.

Despite Tuesday's accident, Grossman said Fung Wah, roughly meaning "Chinese Wind," has tried to address its problems.

"Overall they've responded very well over the years," he said.

Massachusetts regulators on Wednesday ordered Liang to attend a hearing in Boston next week as part of the crash investigation.

Liang was asked in a letter to provide the company's safety policies, a written description of the company's driver training program, a copy of the preventive maintenance procedures, the names of people or companies that fix the buses and a copy of the employee handbook.

The two-page letter from the Department of Telecommunications & Energy's transportation division reminded Liang his company's operating license could be suspended or revoked for failure to comply with department rules or law.

Last August, a Fung Wah bus bound for New York caught fire in Meriden, Conn., and 45 passengers were evacuated moments before flames engulfed it.

New York Sen. Charles Schumer has been critical of the low-fare buses, pointing to federal data showing Fung Wah had a poor driver safety score compared with the national average.

"Yesterday's accident was yet another wake-up call," Schumer said.

The Chinatown-to-Chinatown buses, which are called tour buses and whose seats cost $15 each way, are cheap alternatives to trains and more expensive bus lines such as Greyhound.

Tuesday's accident didn't deter people from using the popular service. Dozens of people lined the sidewalk Wednesday, waiting to board one of Fung Wah's 20 buses.

Kristina Schwab, 22, of New York, said she was a little nervous about taking the 3 p.m. bus to Boston but practical considerations ruled.

"It's still a good deal," she said.

Back at it again

Chris Eckel

Welcome (back) to UMass, the place where you can smoke for free, find cheap beers, dine inexpensively, but need to take a second mortgage out to pay for your textbooks. For those of you who have been paying more attention to the SPF requirements than the news, the gossip at the end of the summer (besides the ongoing manhunt for Suri Cruise) is the foiled terrorist plot to detonate liquid explosives on several flights leaving from London's Heathrow Airport.

Although the details are sketchy thus far, apparently some good police work resulted in the arrest of a bushel of terrorists. However, even though I took off from Heathrow the day before it happened, and should have been a little more personally invested in the drama, I didn't find the most interesting part of the story to be that of how they were caught. Instead, I found President Bush's wordplay a little more interesting.

No, he didn't use the word "shit" again. Instead, he reminded his not entirely loyal subjects that the plot should serve as a "stark reminder" that the United States was "at war with Islamic fascists." I'm going to leave the word fascist out of this conversation, but I admit, I am a bit confused about Bush admitting we were at war with someone.

The United States Constitution enables the President, as Commander in Chief, to send American troops into a conflict. However, under the War Powers Resolution of 1973, only Congress can declare war — the President cannot. As of today, the U.S. Congress has not declared war on any of the 1,000 plus days since we invaded Iraq.

This lack of a declaration of war has worked to the benefit of Bush and his royal court of advisors on several levels. For one, it has allowed for the continual detainment of those captured on the battlefield with complete disregard for the Geneva Convention, which sets standards for prisoners of war. Of course, according to Bush, these people are not "prisoners of war," but rather, "enemy combatants."

Another proviso of the War Powers Resolution is that "the President shall provide such other information as the Congress may request in the fulfillment of its constitutional responsibilities with respect to committing the Nation to war and to the use of United States Armed Forces abroad." Bush has on several occasions flat-out told Congress that he was withholding information for reasons of "national security."

Of course, Bush isn't nearly intelligent enough to have earned a law degree, but that is no excuse for allowing him to continually break international and domestic laws. Breaking the laws is nothing new to Bush; he remains the only man in United States' history to be elected to the office of President with a criminal record. It seems like only two things have changed since 1976, when he got a DUI in Maine.

First, Bush has grown a few more gray hairs. Secondly, instead of drunkenly driving the Volvo station wagon from a Labor Day Weekend BBQ, Bush is drunk with power and driving the United States off the side of an international relations cliff.

So, as is proven by his loss of driving privileges in Maine, Bush might not be able to skirt the law single-handedly, but his fine team of advisors has proven quite adept at negotiating tricky legal situations such as the 2000 or 2004 election, the wiretaps on American citizens or whichever other dubious actions with which you are most familiar.

The conflict in Iraq, and with pretty much whomever else Bush feels like going after, is simply the most recent example. A conflict usually lasts about three hours: the time between you spilling applesauce on the bully at lunch and you getting your teeth knocked out on the playground after school. Saddam Hussein spilled a little chocolate milk and a little applesauce, and instead of challenging him to a fight, Bush has found others to do his dirty work for him.

This little conflict has lasted three years, which means it has surpassed conflict, quarrel, argument, fight and brawl. We are officially at war, and not just with Iraq, but with much of the world.

Finally, it would appear that Bush has awoken to that reality. However, simply stating that the country is at war is not sufficent; legal procedures must be followed in order to officially condone the actions of American troops who are waging war. When and if that is done, it remains to be seen whether or not Bush will continue to abuse all manner of laws regarding war, or whether he realizes that, in addition to sending troops all over the globe, by subverting and ignoring the law, he is waging war on the Constitution and on the American people.

America the beautiful

James Mathews

Since the morning of September 11, nearly five years past, we have looked at the world with open eyes. From our five-college hamlet in the hills, we have seen a global political landscape caught in the winds of a thousand storms of change, and for the most part, we do not like what we have seen.

We look abroad, and we see a world inflamed by a fanatic religious crusade against the free and prosperous nations of the West. We look to the east, and we see that very crusade emboldened and embroiled by a useless and impossible war, waged indefinitely in a historical hotbed of violence by ours, the most powerful nation of all.

We look within our own borders, and find that all meaningful discourse on these matters is stifled by an all-too influential news media, set on promoting fear and provoking antagonism in search of higher ratings and readership. We look at ourselves with a critical eye, as is habit to the scholarly and academic, but the more we look, the more we are displeased.

We begin to see ours as a nation of corrupted politicians and an intellectually handicapped citizenry. We see brutish businessmen closely in league with an all-too powerful federal government. We see a completely commercialized American landscape, scattered with strip malls and dotted with televisions, and we begin to lose our faith. We begin to doubt, we begin to detest, and like those hot-headed youths who stood in our shoes in a similar time of transition some forty years ago, we begin to denounce our nation itself. Here, however, we make a great mistake.

Through all our enumerations of folly, through all our criticisms of government and peers, through all our tired shakes of the head and our skeptic sighs at sight of the morning's news, we fail to see the truth about our country.

Through all our enumerations of folly, through all our criticisms of government and peers, through all our tired shakes of the head and our skeptic sighs at sight of the morning's news, we fail to see the truth about our country. We fail to see the invaluable truth of the United States of America. It is a truth not to be forgotten: that in the face of all aforementioned complaints, ours is, without contest, the greatest country ever devised, and the finest nation that the world has ever seen.

It is as true now as it was 230 years ago, when the best minds of the original 13 colonies declared their independence from Britain in a document that marked not only the birth of the United States, but of the modern political era. It is as true today as it was when the core ideas of an intellectual age that produced John Locke's treatises on government, Adam Smith's theory of free-market economies and Isaac Newton's theory of gravitation were compiled into the United States Constitution, once commemorated as "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man."

It is true today, because beyond its surface, infected as it may be by vile political and intellectual disease, ours is a nation built on the ideal that mankind is capable of creating for himself a thriving world, where freedoms are secured, vast individual achievement is possible, and justice is meted out by and for the people.

It was a lofty dream, but in an unconquered land removed by an ocean from the rest of the western world, where a stunningly lush and fertile landscape embodied in nature the endless prospects of a brand-new civilization, nothing was impossible. For nearly 200 years, our once-small nation grew to fill its massive borders, flourished into the driving force of an increasingly global economy, generated a historically unparalleled prosperity, and remained to the rest of the world a beacon of hope, a land of potential, and a Mecca for the finest minds and talents. The American dream of a bright and achievable future was, until the very recent past, a dream not only to Americans, but to the world at large.

In our time, increasingly lost as that dream may be in the chaos of a modernizing world, we, the academia, should be wary of forgetting its core in our scramble to face, with lucid minds, the confusion of current events. History, at its forefront in America in the year 2006, has been the story of a slow march towards a better world, marked by footprints of giants and pulled by the gravity of a few great nations and empires.

Today, that gravity belongs to us, and the future is ours to forge. To forget the true American dream is to squander that chance, and with it the work of countless men and women who in their greatness made that dream a possibility. To forget our ideal is to go back on a promise made long ago, a promise intrinsic in every word of our country's constitution: the promise of a new world of wisdom, of freedom, and of justice.

Winning the war of ideas

Andrew Freeman

It has been an eventful summer. Not in this country — America's summer was mostly placid, with more worries about heat waves and baseball than politics and survival. Around the world, a different story is unfolding.

Israel fights a two-front war against terrorists in Lebanon and Palestine. Iraq remains a chaotic mess. Britain and Canada have uncovered and foiled major terrorist plots that would have killed thousands of people if successful.

A war is going on, a war for the hearts and minds of billions. This war is not about terrorism: terrorism is just one of many ways the war manifests itself. This war is not a clash of civilizations, not a battle between religions, nations or individuals. This war is about the rise of fundamentalist Islam.

We can pretend this does not concern us, we can argue that it has nothing to do with us. Many of us are unaffected by the war — its burden falls on our soldiers and reservists, or on the citizens of other nations. With the horrific exception of September 11, the United States is mostly untouched by Islamic terrorism. While this is unquestionably a good thing, it allows us to forget about the broader conflict, and this conflict has become exceedingly broad.

Today, violent Islamic fundamentalism exists throughout the Muslim world. From Jemaah Islamiyah, the perpetrator of nightclub bombings in Indonesia, to Hamas, the terrorist group now in control of the Palestinian government, these groups are growing in power and authority. Significantly, their goals and orientations differ. Hezbollah seeks an Islamic state in Lebanon, and its primary target is Israel, not the United States, while Al Qaeda seeks to take over the Islamic world and focuses its efforts on the United States, according to an August 13 opinion in the Boston Globe.

Perhaps most distressing is the rise of militant Islam in the west. Last summer England saw that in the July 7 suicide bombings, killing 52 people and injuring thousands, the perpetrators were British citizens. Muslim cleric Omar Brooks marked the anniversary of this attack by praising the suicide bombers and joking that September 11 "changed the lives" of the people inside the buildings, according to the London Times. In June, a terrorist cell in Ontario, Canada was arrested before it could carry out its attacks. It is only a matter of time before American Muslims carry out an attack.

How do we confront the specter of militant Islamic fundamentalism? The current president has sought to do so with military action, and imposing democracy in Iraq and Afghanistan. This strategy has backfired — nation building was never given the attention or resources it required, and the two countries we occupy are stronger bastions of terrorism than democracy. Military force alone will not win this conflict. Opponents of these invasions urge our withdrawal.

This war is not about terrorism: terrorism is just one of many ways the war manifests itself. This war is not a clash of civilizations, not a battle between religions, nations or individuals. This war is about the rise of fundamentalist Islam.

Unfortunately, leaving Iraq, or Afghanistan, will not diminish the anger felt towards us. New battlefields will emerge, and the attacks will continue. Should our country retreat from any dealings with Muslim nations, the fundamentalists will turn their guns upon other nations and peoples. At present, a Jihadist could fight in Chechnya, the Philippines, Palestine, Kashmir, Iraq and Afghanistan, among others. Moreover, that Jihadist would hardly forgive the United States for its occupation of Iraq or support of Israel, even if such policies were revoked.

We are in a war of ideas. The fundamentalist argument is clear and concise: they have their unwavering true version of Islam, and it demands the Muslim world must be purified of depraved western influences and restored to its former grandeur. The United States has not articulated an effective counter argument, perhaps out of the belief that the fundamentalists lack popular support. We cannot dismiss the fundamentalist argument, because it is credible and even appealing to many Muslims.

Two years ago, when the 9/11 Commission released its report, it recommended the following: "We should offer an example of moral leadership in the world, committed to treat people humanely, abide by the rule of law, and be generous and caring to our neighbors." This is the message we must send to the Muslim world and to Muslims in the West, and this must be followed by action.

There are a number of concrete steps that can be taken to defeat Islamic terrorism. Because torture is antithetical to any moral leadership we might convey, torture as government policy must be terminated, and the sites where it has occurred must be shut down.

The experiment in Iraq has failed, and a phased withdrawal should occur, so our forces can be redirected to other conflicts, like the one in Afghanistan. Should military intervention occur in the future, it must be supported with troops, money and dedicated nation-building. Overall, we need to present a better vision for the world than that of Osama bin Laden or his ilk, and hope that Muslims adopt it.

Complacency will kill you

Michael Dennis

According to Webster's Dictionary, the word "priceless" describes an object as "having a value beyond any price." The same source defines "value" as the "monetary worth of something." Not to knock on Webster, but if I'm to understand correctly, an object that is priceless has a monetary worth beyond any price? Come again? (Somebody get MasterCard on the phone, pronto.)

Surely, we all know the relative value of things (i.e. a Mercedes is worth more than a lizard), but how much do we really know about what our dollars mean to us?

In our economy, we'd like to think that we have total freedom, but we don't. The problem isn't so much a lack of opportunity, but rather that this opportunity is controlled by a few rich white men. Granted, the economy isn't necessarily the one-headed monster that we see on the surface. There is an underbelly of both legit and not-so-legit secondhand dealings going on, in which the dollar is either maximized or minimized to our advantage or disadvantage.

A fantastic example of the maximization of money is one of my favorite pastimes — the flea market. In this world of cheap fun, thrifty individuals buy and sell at their leisure, functioning relatively independently of the everyday economic experience. For mere pocket change, you can get an obscure computer part for which you would otherwise pay a moderately steep amount. I did just that a few weeks ago, when I snagged a lightly-used sound card for my PC for 40 cents. So, is the actual value of such an item the $40 or so that it would cost at Best Buy, or is it the 40 cent fee that was incurred in rescuing it from a trash bin?

Despite such events as the flea market, too many situations do exist where one's financial emotions can be manipulated for capital gain. Imagine for a moment that you're an individual who knows little about our economy, but you understand the concept that in order to acquire an item you must pay a monetary fee. One day, you and your proud-to-bean-American pal (because, after all, at least he knows he's free) decide to watch a movie at home. You go to the local public library, and rent a DVD for free, $0. You then go to the grocery store and purchase a two-liter bottle of cola and a three-pack of microwave popcorn for $3. Not a bad fee for a quiet night of entertainment.

So, is the actual value of such an item the $40 or so that it would cost at Best Buy, or is it the 40 cent fee that was incurred in rescuing it from a trash bin?

The next night, you decide to go out and see the newest blockbuster flick. You purchase two movie tickets for $20. Thirsty? Two small sodas is six dollars, one large popcorn is five dollars. Total cost is $31; borderline homicidal at the injustice of it all? Priceless.

The veritable laundry list of rip-off stops isn't limited to the movies. It includes such vaunted institutions as baseball stadiums (where a 20oz bottle of Coke will cost you at least $4), to a familiar place for our demographic — the college convenience store.

Where else could you be lucky enough to pay so much for the privilege of consuming that rare exotic delicacy of toasted rice cereal? It's as though college campuses are a bizarro world of snacks in which we're taught that a flimsy tuna sandwich really is worth the hefty price tag that's slapped onto it (sorry, Blue Wall), only to enter the real world of grocery stores and discover that, hey, you can buy four cans of tuna and two loaves of bread for the cost of that one sorry sandwich.

Are we not incredulous at this obvious chain of rip-offs because we're accustomed to it, or is it because we're concerned about more vital social issues? I'd have to agree with the former, if for no other reason than I've been in stores where I've stood in line for 20 minutes while Mrs. Thrifty Yankee has the cashier ring up each and every last one of her "10 cents off your purchase of 10 or more six-packs of car batteries" coupons.

Let's face it — there are more pressing issues to be concerned about than overpaying for a bag of popcorn. Quite frankly though, I think the issue is one of universal complacency. It's not that most of us are too concerned about world hunger or nuclear proliferation to pay attention to the price of a soda at the movies — it's that we have no more than a passing interest in anything that doesn't completely screw us over all at once.

What we're saying is: sure, you can cheat us out of a few dollars, even if it adds up to a giant amount over time, but as long as it's gradual, we'll take it. Activism may seem foolish when it's practiced on behalf of such a seemingly small issue, but as long as you're adamant about something, you'll stay interested and aware.

One day you may even muster the courage to tell the soda guy at the ballpark where he can stick his four dollar Coke, and you'll be a richer person for it — mind, body, and wallet. Now that's priceless.

Warped Tour overcomes the oppressive Fitchburg heat

New Jersey pop band The Early November played to one of the largest crowds, seen below, at this year's Warped Tour which came to Fitchburg this past summer.

BY TIM MCCALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Warped Tour started as an outlet for the punk rockers and extreme game athletes to come and watch their favorite bands and performers, but over the course of the past twelve years, the tour has changed.

The number of athletes has dwindled dramatically, and the music's punk rock attitude has evolved into teenage heartbreak. The ticket prices have gone from $20 to nearly $50 at some of the venues.

But none of this has stopped the crowds coming back for more. This past August, 15,000 people showed up to the Massachusetts date, making it one of the successful dates of the entire tour.

The 100 degree heat (115 with the heat index) also made it one of the hottest of the year. But the bands and fans alike pressed on.

One hundred ten bands played to crowds of all different sizes. The Early November played to one of the largest crowds of the afternoon.

"We've done this tour four different times and today was definitely one of the hottest days we've ever faced," said the band's bassist Sergio Anello.

The band got the crowd wound up playing new songs from their triple disc album "The Mother, the Mechanic and the Path" with a mix of older songs from their previous album. Fans seemed as if they forgot all about the heat as they crowd surfed and danced during the band set.

Following The Early November, I Am the Avalanche played the Smartpunk stage, a stage for smaller bands still working up the ranks for the chance to play either of the main stages. I Am The Avalanche simply rocked in the truest rock 'n roll sense on stage, with lead singer Vinny Caruana switching back and forth from solely singing to playing guitar. While I Am The Avalanche is no means a punk rock band, the band definitely carried a feeling of angst into their set and the crowd loved them for it.

Another highlight of the day was The Killing Moon. Simply put, they are a hybrid band combining ska and hardcore. But don't worry — it wasn't the kind of hardcore where you can't hear the lyrics because the singer is just screaming into the microphone. Since the band is from Maine and this was their closest tour date to their home state, most of the crowd for their set was from Maine, which gave the performance a homecoming kind of feel.

Saves The Day, another New Jersey band, upstaged most if not all the bands of the day by playing two different sets for 35 minutes apiece. The first set was an electric one and consisted of mostly new material from their latest album "Sound The Alarm." The second set was all acoustic versions of the band's older material, all performed upon request from the fans.

"At first we signed on to just play one set a day, but then our label asked us if we were willing to play to on their stage as well to promote it, [and] we happily agreed. Playing two sets has been a blast," said lead singer and guitarist Chris Conley.

The band Senses Fail also played two sets, but their sets were not as wildly received and enthusiastic as Saves the Day.

One of the most surprising events of the day was the performance by Joan Jett and the Blackhearts. Jett, who is old of enough to remember what real punk rock was and also to be the mother of the Olsen twins, was a headliner of this year's tour. Despite her age, fans watched her set and sang along to classic songs such as "I Love Rock N Roll."

Alternative to most of the bands that played, the tour did feature a couple of bands that a quick glance did not belong. One of these bands was Valient Thorr, who looked more like Jim Carrey at the MTV Movie Awards in 1999, and played '80s metal. The band kept warning the crowd about the end of the world being near and to not to listen to anyone, an odd message since the band kept on preaching song after song.

Another oddball on the tour was mewithoutYou. This band is actually a Christian group, but once one sees their live show it becomes obvious why they are on the tour. The band performed to one of the smallest crowds of the day, but they did not notice while playing their hearts out and bringing the most danceable rock 'n roll of the entire tour. At times they didn't announce they were switching and just went from song to song to keep the atmosphere thriving. Frontman Aaron Weiss and drummer Richard Mazzotta have a stage presence similar to the band TRex.

By the end of mewithYou's set, the crowd was nearly gone, the sun was setting and there were just a couple more bands left to play, signaling that the end of this year's Warped Tour was near.

Dealing with fashion and faith

BY SHEILA B. LALWANI
MILWAUKEE JOURNAL SENTINEL

MILWAUKEE—Estelle Rumsey cringed at the thought of her daughter, Sabrina, wearing a tank top to school. Sabrina Rumsey, 15, a sophomore at Homestead High School, protested.

Tanks are in, she said.

"The kids don't know what modesty is," said Estelle Rumsey, of Mequon, Wis. "You should see what kids are wearing."

"It's the style," her daughter countered.

They compromised: tank tops with a jacket.

The tussle between the Rumseys illustrates the challenges teens and parents face over back-to-school shopping. With the start of school at hand, some parents and teens say they are looking harder than ever for that rare find: clothing that is chic, appropriate and affordable.

"She is pretty covered up," Estelle Rumsey said of her daughter. "Her midriff doesn't show."

Back-to-school clothing is a big business. According to a study from the Washington, D.C.-based National Retail Federation, families with school-age children are projected to spend $17.6 billion on back-to-school shopping, with the typical family spending an average of $228.14 on clothes.

Parents have long voiced frustration over rising skirt lengths, plunging necklines and tight jeans. They insist that provocative clothing undermines the learning environment. Public schools detail their dress code policies in handbooks, but the level of enforcement varies from school to school, often leaving dress to the prerogative of the students and their parents.

"Certainly, it could be a distraction," said Peter Kloosterman, a professor of education at Indiana University-Bloomington. "You've got some students who are going to be very distracted and other students who couldn't care less."

Think long skirts, Laura Marek's parents said before she departed for Brookfield Square mall with her friends. She and her friends went from store to store searching for clothes for their first day at Kettle Moraine High School. She didn't buy anything tight. But it's difficult finding something that appeals to both her and to her parents, and that fits in with the budget, she said.

"They don't want clothes that look spray-painted on me," Marek said. "The skirts I do wear are knee-length."

But the age-old debate over school clothing is not simply a generational affair. Increasingly, it is a matter of religious dictate. In recent years, dozens of Web sites selling trendy but modest clothes have cropped up, and conservative Christians, Muslims and orthodox Jews are logging on. Artizara.com, for example, is a San Diego-based online store that sells modest clothing with a twist. Tunics and full-body evening gowns are the hottest items these days, co-founder Asra Razzaque said.

"We believe there is so much beauty in modesty," Razzaque said.

Gabrielle Krawczyk, 14, of Milwaukee attends a youth group at the World Harvest Church, where dressing modestly is part of being chaste. It can be tough to find clothing, but she refuses to compromise. Krawczyk, a freshman, regularly wears baggy shirts and pants.

Absolutely no short skirts, she said.

"That's what the Bible tells us," Krawczyk said. "You don't wear really, really short skirts."

Some teens are caught between being modest and wanting to fit in with their peers. Dress the way you want to be treated, Ashley Sullivan's parents advised her. Sullivan, 14, shopped at boutiques before settling on a few items for school.

"It's hard sometimes," she said. "Wearing the leggings ... it (the skirt) looks cute without the leggings."

Other youths have developed their own middle ground between fashion and faith. For Maram Farrah, 16, that includes tank tops at Wet Seal, mini dresses a la Charlotte Russe and skirts from New York & Company.

Farrah is an orthodox Muslim and shows only her face. She layers, coupling revealing clothing with longer pieces. On a recent evening, Farrah sported a brown hijab with a matching top and pants. A friend wore a mini-dress and long pants that covered her legs. "If you find a really cute black tank, you can wear it with a T-shirt underneath," she said. "God is not saying, 'Don't look nice.'"

The Quran, the Muslim holy book, requires Muslim men and women to be modest in their attire.

Their fashion habits are a negotiation of two cultures, said John Voll, professor of Islamic history and associate director of the Prince Alwaleed bin Talal Center for Muslim-Christian Understanding at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C.

"In general, the context is that American Muslim teenagers are, in fact, very much that: They are American Muslim teenagers," Voll said. "I would see the layering as a statement of a dressing identity that is distinct and separates them from the sloppy teenagers and the average run-of-the-mill traditional Islamists."

Gabrielle Krawczyk, 14, of Milwaukee seeks to get approval from her religion and her mother on back to school fashions.

Inspirational Arab writer, Mahfouz dead at 94

BY CARLIN ROMANO
THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER

When Naguib Mahfouz became the first Arab writer to win the Nobel prize for literature in 1988, his countryman Yusef Idris, a lesser-known Egyptian novelist short-listed at times for the prize, groaned as if someone had dropped him on the point of a pyramid.

"He was a safer choice than me," complained Idris. "The explanation is political. They think I'm anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic. And they think that Naguib Mahfouz is pro-Israel ... Mahfouz is a supporter of any kind of peace with Israel.... There is no Arabic writer in the entire Arabic world who holds the same political position as Mahfouz."

Idris misunderstood the politics of the Swedish Academy — it remained as leftish and anti-Zionist then as it is today. But he was right that Mahfouz, who died last week at age 94, stood out in the Arab literary and intellectual world, more so in recent times than in the late '80s. Even though he claimed as early as 1989, when I spent two days with him in Cairo, that he couldn't see and hear very much any more, Mahfouz lacked ideological blinders to the end.

The academy didn't give Mahfouz the prize for his tony classical Arabic, despite crediting his work in its official proclamation with aiding the "development of the literary language in Arabic-speaking cultural circles."

Academy members, as they frequently do with authors in languages they haven't mastered, read him only in translation, particularly the English translations that colloquialize some of his diction. That fact made Mahfouz squeal with laughter whenever he told the tale. The academy declared that Mahfouz won for creating "an Arabian narrative art that applies to all mankind."

Yes, precisely. Call it the academy's way of acknowledging that Mahfouz, a Cairene so devoted to his tumultuous city that at 78 he'd spent exactly six days outside Egypt — three in Yugoslavia and three in Yemen — lived and wrote as a cosmopolitan who never let ideology keep him from depicting Egypt's realities and hypocrisies.

Teased about his lack of travel, he jabbed back: "All that we do as writers and philosophers is the study of human nature. And it is one, in any place."

Some dubbed him, at the time of his Nobel, the Dickens or Balzac of Cairo. Add, for tonal reasons, the Naipaul of the Nile, haughty one moment and hopeful the next about Egypt's clash between tradition and modernity, but always soaking up yesterday's news.

His 1,500-page "Cairo Trilogy, a multigenerational depiction of the city's middle-class from post-World War I to the early '50s, resembles the 19th-century European novel in form. He once said that it treats "the struggle between great and burdensome traditions on the one hand, and freedom in its various political and intellectual forms on the other."

But Mahfouz's works also offer orgies on Nile houseboats, corrupt officials, cynical politics, nascent feminism, covert Westernization, and a cinematic style reflective of a man who wrote about 30 film scripts and at one time directed Egypt's State Cinema Organization.

"Palace Walk, as the first volume is titled in English, launches a "Bildungsroman about Kemal, a sensitive young intellectual who resembles young Mahfouz. Like Kemal, Mahfouz experienced a deep religious crisis in his adolescence and an unrequited love affair with a girl from a higher social class.

Long an Egyptian civil servant, Mahfouz married his wife, Atyat, when he was in his early 40s and she in her late teens. Their two daughters, Fatma and Om-Kalthoum, both graduated from the American University of Cairo. Asked once by a translator, Roger Allen, why he wrote so much, Mahfouz replied with his signature, spry sense of humor, "Because I have two daughters, and they need high-heeled shoes."

Any wonder that after his Nobel, Mahfouz, enjoying an international publication boom greater than usual even for a laureate, charmed Jackie Kennedy, then a Doubleday editor, into buying rights to 14 of his books in one shot from his previous publisher, the American University of Cairo Press?

At his home away from home, the Ali Baba Cafe off Cairo's massive Tahrir Square, this frail man in dark sunglasses, with an old-fashioned hearing aid, would sit at his matchbox table every day, below a drawing of himself in the same spot, and puff his Kent cigarettes amid the whirring fans and unused chessboards. He'd sip his Turkish coffee and wait for pals to share the latest scuttlebutt.

Mahfouz's ecumenical attitudes grew from parents who he said permitted him to think for himself at an early age, as well as from his philosophy studies at the University of Cairo, where he took his degree in 1934. He admired the Egyptian thinker Taha Husayn, who stood for "reason over tradition" and revolt against Egypt's hidebound culture of the 1920s, and writer Salam Musa, who he said taught him "to believe in science, socialism and tolerance" — three commitments sadly slipping in today's Islamified Middle East except when the first promises weapons.

For much of his career, Mahfouz exemplified Egyptian openness to European culture, to the work of thinkers such as Darwin, Marx and Freud, while also espousing a Sufi-influenced belief in democracy.

Idris was right that Mahfouz supported Anwar El-Sadat's peace initiative toward Israel, which led Syria to regret his Nobel prize, but Mahfouz also criticized Israeli policy and its handling of the Palestinian intifadahs many times during his life. What Mahfouz didn't do, despite long working as a columnist for Al-Ahram, Cairo's government-owned and intermittently anti-Semitic main newspaper, was attack Jews "as Jews in his books. Occasionally, he even referred to them positively.

With similar courage, Mahfouz attacked former Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser's one-party regime, fundamentalists for their suppression of Western art, and even Sadat, who banned his writing during a 1973 purge of intellec-

Braff waiting for his big break in Toronto

By Terry Lawson
Detroit Free Press

Zach Braff loves film festivals, which is why he will be taking a break from work on his final season of "Scrubs" to head to Ontario this week for the Toronto International Film Festival. The 31st annual edition of the festival will open Thursday and run through Sept. 16.

Braff describes himself as "movie mad," but unlike the thousands of visitors, seeing some of the fest's 352 films is his second priority. His first order of business at North America's largest and most prestigious film festival will be introducing "The Last Kiss," which will have its premiere as one of the festival's 21 special gala presentations before opening in major markets on Sept. 15.

"It was great" for the film to be chosen, says Braff, who stars in "The Last Kiss" as a young man whose impending marriage to the perfect woman, played by Jacinda Barrett, is threatened by an act of self-sabotage.

"You couldn't have a better showcase. When you make a movie that's apart from the usual sort of Hollywood film, you always worry if it's going to find an audience, even if you feel really good about the work you've done. Festival audiences are there because they love movies, and they usually prefer films that wander off the regular path."

"Who knows what would have happened to 'Garden State' if we hadn't shown it at Sundance," says Braff of the independent movie that he directed, wrote and starred in. It was the breakout hit of the 2004 Sundance Film Festival, and the film, made for $2.5 million (much of that put up by Quicken Loans chairman Dan Gilbert, whom Braff refers to affectionately as his "Detroit sugar daddy"), went on to gross $25 million in North America.

"I like to think it would have found an audience anyway, but there's a lot of great films made every year that people never get a chance to see. Getting a launch at a festival can be an incredible boost if audiences respond to it. Festival goers tend to prefer films that are original and different."

To be completely accurate, "The Last Kiss" is not technically original. It is based on an Italian film released in North America under the same title, and was itself first shown in North America at the 2001 Toronto festival. But director Tony Goldwyn and screenwriter Paul Haggis, who wrote back-to-back Best Picture Oscar winners in "Million Dollar Baby" and "Crash," have made such substantial alterations to the story — and especially the character played by Braff (a callous playboy in the Italian film, now a middle-class and generally likable fellow) — that it not only stands on its own, but is that rare remake that betters the original.

"They had Haggis on this film before, you know, he was 'Haggis,'" says Braff. "Million Dollar Baby' hadn't been released yet. After 'Garden State' was a success, all of a sudden I've got this pile of scripts to read. I was really excited, because obviously I wasn't getting sent the good stuff before. But then when I started to read stuff, it was almost all the same kind of formulaic romantic comedies you see every day. In fact, you may have seen some of them already, because they did get made. I thought, 'Man, everybody's missing the point.'"

"I think 'Garden State' struck a chord not because I was the greatest director or writer, but because it was honest and different. So I just decided I wasn't going to make another movie just for the sake of making another movie. I was going to wait until something came around that really said something about the sort of people I know. And I read 'Last Kiss,' and I thought this is it.

"All I worried about is that the studio would want to change the ending, to make it more conventional. And that could have ruined it. But they didn't, they were brave enough to leave it be.

Braff does have one thing in common with the 250,000 people who attend some or all of the festival every year. After he's done "everything I can possibly do" for "The Last Kiss," he's hoping to see a few movies. He counts himself as one of the festivalgoers who seek out independent and foreign films that may have a hard time finding U.S. distribution, though he says he's always "eager to see new films by directors or writers I really like."

And per usual, the Toronto fest looks to be star-studded. Already confirmed to attend in connection with their festival films are Ferrell and Thompson; Kenneth Branagh ("The Magic Flute"); Jennifer Lopez and her husband, Marc Anthony ("El Cantante "); Hugh Jackman and Rach el Weisz ("The Fountain"); Pierce Brosnan and Liam Neeson ("Seraphim Falls"); Reese Witherspoon ("Penelope"), and Russell Crowe, who stars in "A Good Year."

For the past decade, the Toronto festival has been seen by the film industry as the first stop on the road to Academy Award nominations, and all the films listed above are considered to be in contention.

Other Toronto films whose titles have been mentioned in the same sentence as Oscar include "All the King's Men," a new version of the Robert Penn Warren novel starring Sean Penn as a corrupt southern politician; a documentary about child-abusing Catholic priests, "Deliver Us From Evil" and, in the foreign language category, "After the Wedding," from Denmark's Susanne Bier.

Not coincidentally, "After the Wedding" is on Braff's want-to-see list, for personal and professional reasons. His next film as a writer-director is an American-set adaptation of Bier's 2002 drama "Open Hearts."

"'Open Hearts' is a great film that most people never got to see," says Braff. "You won't find the video at Blockbuster, either. Thank God for festivals."

"Scrubs" star Zach Braff stars in his new movie 'The Last Kiss' which was written by "Million Dollar Baby" screenwriter Paul Haggis.

Keith doesn't burn 'Bridges' with album

By Wade Tatangelo
McClatchy Newspapers

Toby Keith throws the biggest party in country music.

Keith is most famous for the rabble-rousing patriotic anthem "Courtesy of the Red, White, and Blue (The Angry American)." The most controversial tune of 2002, it crossed over from No. 1 on Billboard's Top Country Album chart to reach No. 25 on the Hot 100 pop survey and made Keith a megastar.

The semi-pro football player turned singer/songwriter also excels with saloon songs, scoring major hits with titles like "I Love This Bar," "Whiskey Girl" and "Get Drunk and Be Somebody," which is from his latest album "White Trash with Money."

But Keith will display a gentler side of his oversized personality when he stars in "Broken Bridges," a dramatic film being released by Paramount Pictures on Friday. The movie finds the real-life country music titan playing a faded star who returns home to find his high school sweetheart (Kelly Preston) and a daughter (Lindsey Haun) whom he never knew existed. Keith is confident the movie will appeal to his fan base despite its subdued subject matter.

"Military people and Southern people and country people from all over, there's a certain thread that runs through, and it's about liking to have the heart strings tugged at and this movie does that," Keith said in a recent phone interview.

"Broken Bridges" also features appearances by Willie Nelson and Burt Reynolds. Although Keith is often lumped together with right-wing Republicans, he maintains a friendship with Nelson, one of popular music's most outspoken liberals.

A concert favorite of Keith's is the humorous narrative "Weed with Willie," in which he sings "Don't knock it 'til you tried it, I tried it my friend, and I'll never smoke weed with Willie again."

"I learned that a long time ago," Keith replied with a laugh when asked if he avoided Nelson's trailer during filming in Georgia. "But I think Burt (Reynolds) slipped over to Willie's trailer."

All joking aside, Keith was quick to praise Nelson, the man who joined him on the hit "Beer for My Horses."

See KEITH on page 8

"Willie is a very unique human being," Keith said. "He's got the sweetest heart in the world and never says an unkind thing about anybody. Willie is just a hippie. He's as comfortable playing with me as playing with The Dead. It was my choice to have him in the movie."

Keith also gushed about Haun, who plays his daughter on screen and in real life is touring with him in between making an album on his record label Show Dog Nashville. In concert, Haun will sing with Keith on her new single "Broken" and "Broken Bridges," both of which are included on the soundtrack album, which came out last week.

"She's dynamite," Keith said. "She's the only name people won't recognize when they see the movie credits but she's great. People should go to see the movie just for her, in my opinion."

The "Broken Bridges" soundtrack, which Keith co-produced and released on his label, is an album that marks somewhat of a change for the country star. The disc kicks off with the title track, a tender duet between Keith and Haun, whose vocals recall the crystalline beauty of Allison Krauss. Keith also sings with Nelson, on the hymn "Uncloudy Day." "Zig Zag Stop" is a bluesy rocker that could pass for a ZZ Top number. The only tune that plays into Keith's cartoonish good ol' boy image is "Big Bull Rider," but the twist is that the song is a bona fide rocker boasting guitars that are likely too brash for country radio. Keith denied that he was consciously trying to play down his over-the-top image by taking his music in different directions.

"I write about 15 songs a year and the best 12 go on the CD and that's my album," Keith said. "There's no proper protocol to writing songs. Just try to write great songs and at the end of the year record the cream of the crop."

The "Broken Bridges" soundtrack also includes cuts by relatively unknown artists like bluegrass picker/vocalist Sonya Isaacs and singer/songwriter Fred Eaglesmith. Is there a chance someone like veteran indie artist Eaglesmith could find a home at Show Dog Nashville?

"I've got to get up and get myself established," Keith said. "As soon as that's done, absolutely."

Show Dog, which Keith started after departing from Dreamworks, is off to a terrific start with Keith's "White Trash with Money" reaching No. 2 on Billboard's Top Country Albums and being certified gold for 500,00 sales. At press time, the album remained at No. 11 on the chart nearly five months since it was released. Keith's song-writing partner Scotty Emerick is signed to the label as well, and he has a track on the "Broken Bridges" album. In addition to Keith, Haun and Emerick, the label is also home to the duo Rushlow Harris.

Keith said he's interested in putting out an album by Glen Campbell and Jimmy Webb.

"We've got a lot of different things going on," Keith said. "The key word is freedom. Now I don't have to get permission from nobody. I'm in the studio cutting 'Get Drunk and Be Somebody' and say I want it to be the first single off the album, then it is — I don't have to ask anybody."

Despite his overwhelming success, many people will never forgive Keith for bashing the Dixie Chicks and singing a lyric like "We'll put a boot in your ass, it's the American way." That said, no conversation, interview or story about Keith is complete without discussing the troops overseas. For starters, his song "American Soldier" is one of the favorites among the young men and women stationed in Iraq, according to an informal poll recently released by Rolling Stone magazine.

"Every spring I try and go for 17 days," Keith said. "We've been shot at, mortared at and had to get up in the middle of the night to go to a shelter."

Keith revealed that the "biggest reality check" took place during a flight from Afghanistan to Kuwait. On board next to their gear was a coffin containing the remains of a fallen soldier, Lt. Eric McCray.

"I said to myself that until the day I die I will never forget his name," Keith said. "He was the same soldier who had been at our show two nights before and there he was deceased."

Mahfouz had long successful career

tuals. With remarkable generosity, Mahfouz gave most of his Nobel money to charities such as one for victims of kidney disease.

After an apparent follower of Sheikh Abdul-Rahman, the blind cleric behind the first World Trade Center attack, stabbed Mahfouz in the neck in 1994, he never quite recovered his previous strength, but neither did he succumb to the reflex hatreds that infect so much of the Middle East.

"They gave Mahfouz the prize," Idris said in that interview long ago, "so they would not have to give another prize to an Arab writer for 25 years."

No, that wasn't the reason either, though it's 18 years and counting. One trusts that when the academy, despite being the world's most overrated literary prize giver, gets its hands on translations of another Arab writer as humane, honest and devoted to truth as Mahfouz, it will honor him or her, too.

Company targests predators, scammers

By Matt Slagle
Associated Press

AUSTIN, Texas (AP)—Online computer gamers who spend countless hours slaying monsters and battling other virtual foes are now facing more worldly threats, including online predators and scammers who want to swipe their game accounts.

"City of Heroes" maker NCsoft Corp. on Tuesday announced a program to warn its customers about real-world risks in the virtual universe of its games.

"It's a public environment where everyone can see and hear what's going on," said Robert Garriott, chief executive of NCsoft North America. "The single biggest mistake people make is, they meet people online, and once they start communicating, they slip up."

Though its "PlaySmart" initiative is still in the early phase, the company hopes to include some basic guidelines in its packaging by the end of the year.

Among the suggestions: Parents should not only monitor and play the games with their children, but also should be aware of the potential for social interaction that can include voice chat and text-message exchanges.

Today's online games allow for an instant, free flow of dialogue between thousands of players simultaneously. The tasks set forth in such games, such as killing dragons or traipsing dank dungeons, often require coordinated teamwork.

Though the true names and identities of players are disguised as avatars ranging from animals to sorcerers, there's nothing to prevent players from probing for personal information.

NCsoft's guidelines will be printed on small cards with the games as well as on NCsoft's Web site.

Other basic rules would seem to apply to life in general: never give out credit card information, never offer personal information to other players, and never give passwords or account information to friends so they can play on the account.

Garriott said one of the leading sources of customer complaints is when players lend account usernames and passwords to friends.

In such instances, accounts can be stolen outright or pilfered of virtual goods such as rare weapons or armor that the true owner spent months or years accumulating.

The effort comes as millions worldwide play such games every day. According to a recent study by Parks Associates of Dallas, revenue from online games is expected to grow from about $1.1 billion last year to $4.4 billion by 2010.

Ron Teixeira, executive director of the National Cyber Security Alliance, called NCsoft's program a good first step.

"Parents may think games are games," Teixeira said. "They think it's pretty innocent and nothing bad can happen, but the reality is that children virtually are somewhere else and interacting with people that may not be good."

Video games also are rated for content by the Entertainment Software Rating Board, a non-profit industry group.

that drive you crazy when you have to deal with the uniqueness of their offense.

"[Option teams are] very difficult teams to play. The less I see of them the better."

A key for the Minutemen will be their patience. With a quarterback who can run, the option can be a very difficult play to defend. Linebackers and the secondary have specific assignments that when broken down can spell disaster.

"Each corner will probably have two or three plays which they can impact," Brown said. "They have to make sure they're patient, and when their opportunity arises they're on their responsibilities."

Brown and Johnson are no strangers to each other. The two faced off when Brown was the Minutemen's defensive coordinator and Johnson the head coach of Georgia Southern.

In 1998 the two were on opposite sidelines for the I-AA national championship game which UMass won 55-43. They met again the following season in the quarterfinals, where Johnson's team came out on top.

"It was great because I saw one of his quotes when I said [Navy is similar to Georgia Southern] but they have their own strengths and he said, 'He's just saying we're not as fast as we were at Georgia Southern,'" Brown said with a laugh.

Although their performance against the Black Knights is an encouragement, the Maroon and White haven't beaten a I-A opponent in 22 years. The last time they did was back in 1984 against Ball State. In that game the Minutemen came out on top 26-10 but are oh-for-seven since.

Last weekend may give UMass some confidence entering Saturday. Richmond, Montana State and Portland State all took down division

In UMass' win over Colgate last week, sophomore Liam Coen threw for 117 yards and two touchdowns.

I-A opponents. The most shocking may have been Montana State defeating Colorado 19-10.

"I will say this, we're not afraid," Brown said. "We'll be ready to go and we'll have a good game plan. If we execute, we'll have a shot to win."

that whole experience," Rudy said. "But she has come out of that. She was on today. She had a nice game."

Senior co-captain Stephanie Barrett assisted both goals.

Redshirt junior Kristin Walker was once again between the posts and Rudy is pleased with how she has been manning the position on only one healthy leg.

Walker tore her ACL in the final game of the 2005 season, which required surgery in January.

Her knee seems to have responded to the surgery very well and her performances are improving each week, which have put Rudy's mind at ease.

She played the whole 90 minutes, making five saves and allowing one goal.

"She wasn't at fault with the goal," Rudy said. "We missed an offsides trap and one of [Iona's players] got in all alone and she had to come out and she took the angle and the player robbed her ... It was just one of those things."

The ball sailed over Walker's head into the goal to make it 3-1.

A true testament to her knee's stability came during a scary moment in the second half of the game.

Walker came out of position and captured a loose ball when she was steamrolled by Iona's Laura McCoy, knocking Walker to the ground.

When it was clear the goalie was unscathed by the hit, Rudy became convinced that Walker's knee would respond well to the demands of the season.

Rudy is now looking ahead to the game on Thursday against Hartford where his Minutewomen look to capture their third consecutive victory.

The first-game loss, against the Wildcats on Aug. 26, left Rudy in a somber mood.

He commented that despite a solid start, things worsened for the Minutewomen as the game wore on.

"[The game was] disappointing," Rudy said. "We missed some good chances. We hit the top of the crossbar once, we hit balls wide on one-on-ones with the keeper ... we had some very, very good chances."

One of the day's few bright spots, however, was the performance of Canfield.

The junior forward showed fine hustle in a busy game that included two shots on goal, one of which was a one-on-one with the New Hampshire goalie that she hooked wide right.

One uplifting detail was that Walker was healthy enough to compete.

Despite Walker undergoing surgery last January and rehabilitation throughout the spring and summer, Rudy wasn't sure how her knee would respond to the demands of competitive play.

The season's first game, however, convinced him that Walker's knee will respond well to live action and her performances will keep improving over time.

"There was one shot [that] ordinarily she would have gotten to, and held it," Rudy commented. "But I think she's having a little bit of a problem getting some elevation with [the knee brace she is required to wear]. It's going to take time. That's part of the deal."

Another casualty for the Maroon and White was that of Patry. The sophomore left the game in the 56th minute due to severe sinus problems that were disrupting her awareness and ability on the field. She was put on antibiotics to help relieve her symptoms.

The Minutewomen's second-game victory against the No. 27 Ranked Boston University Terriers four days later proved a more enjoyable game for Rudy.

"I was a bit worried coming in because we had dropped that game to UNH. The players looked at [the game tape] and said, 'Man, we really could have scored five or six goals if we were sharp with our finishing,'" Rudy said. "But the end result was phenomenal."

The win, the first over BU in 27 years, was an upset in which almost every starter made an important contribution.

BU drew first blood in the 12th minute when Emily Pallotta headed a corner-kick, off the foot of teammate Marisha Schumacher-Hodge, into the top-right corner.

UMass, however, answered back in less than a minute.

Having responded well to the prescribed antibiotics, Patry was in the game at forward and scored UMass' first goal on the season.

In the 13th minute she knocked a corner kick into the top left corner past Terriers' keeper, Stephanie Dreyer.

The unassisted goal tied the game 1-1.

Aside from this quick counter-punch from UMass, Rudy explained, BU otherwise dominated the first half pretty heavily.

"They were the better team in the first half," Rudy said.

With less than eight minutes to go before halftime, however, the Minutewomen netted another tally to take the lead, 2-1, in the 38th.

Junior Christina Nunes pocketed the go-ahead goal when she volleyed a free kick from classmate Jenny Roehrig into the top-right corner.

UMass did not have to wait long for an insurance policy.

In the 52nd minute, freshman Sydney Stoll scored UMass' third goal to put the game away.

Canfield and Villarroel were both credited with assists for the goal.

mistake, or when they did give up a shot, Zack [Simmons] just made sure that he took care of everything else. Zack made some big saves."

UMass opened the season with a 2-0 win over Maine at Rudd Field thanks to goals from sophomores Tony Bassett and Prince Ofosu just 18 minutes into the game. Simmons tallied his fifth career shut-out in the win, while only having to make one save all game.

The Minutemen then traveled to Nickerson Field to take on the Terriers just two days later. UMass took a 1-0 lead on a goal by freshman forward Bryan Hogan in the 77th minute. That lead did not last too long, however.

Boston University tied the game just one minute later, sending the game to overtime, and eventually ending in a draw.

"It's tough to get one, and then have them come back that quick to tie it up," Koch said after its 1-1 tie to Boston University. "But I think a tie was a good result for us."

"[At the half], I told them it was our game to take," Koch added. "Do you want it or not? So either we go after it, or we let them have it. You make the decision."

"I think we could have stolen the win," Hogan said. "But things happen, and we got unlucky in the back after we scored. We're definitely happy because [BU] is a good team."

Navy was the next opponent for UMass, and it did not take long for the Minutemen to get back on the winning track. Sophomores Mike DeSantis and Tony Bassett scored both goals for UMass in its 2-0 victory over Navy in the first game of the Anders Classic.

The game was postponed until Saturday due to inclement weather from Tropical Storm Ernesto. That caused UMass to play on back-to-back days — something that isn't the norm in college soccer.

That did not faze the Minutemen. They went on to defeat UMBC by a score of 1-0, thanks to Brown's first career collegiate goal in the 48th minute of play.

Brown fired a shot into the top-left corner on a free kick that gave UMass its third win of the season.

"It was exciting," Brown said. "I've been playing for two years, and it's always fun to get your first goal and help the team win. I had a few goals in high school, and I scored in the spring against BU, but that's not regular season, so I haven't scored too many goals."

The Minutemen are still learning. It's still a young team. But so far, it's been all smiles for the Maroon and White in 2006.

"They're good kids," Koch said. "They've worked hard, and they've stepped up when we've needed them to. It's been very pleasing."

your offenses and defenses and you get ready to go.

"[Practice] was very competitive," he added. "We put in probably five defenses, our fast break, and probably 10 or 15 plays. We were really able to implement the style of play that we want to run. And we were able to carry it over in the Bahamas and do it in the games."

The competition down there wasn't the greatest, however. In five games, the Minutemen outscored the opposing teams by an average of 61.4 points.

But that's beside the point. Bonner, Brower, Forbes, and Mayben played in uniform for the first time with their teammates, and these five games gave Ford and the coaching staff a chance to see who plays well together.

"Playing five games was very beneficial," Ford said. "We tried so many different combinations. I tried every combination you can possibly think of. We played Chris Lowe and Tiki Mayben together. We had Gary Forbes at the point. Sometimes we had guys out there that were 6-foot-7 or bigger.

"We had a group out there where we had Gary Forbes and Etienne Brower at the 4 and 5, and now we were 6-foot-7 or smaller but very fast and very, very quick. We tried different combinations, and going back and watching it and breaking it down on film, we will really find out a lot more. It was great to look at guys playing different combinations and different positions."

Now UMass has more than 10 players that, according to Ford, can "really, really play." And 10 days of grinding and working, along with a trip into the sunshine, gave Ford an early glimpse into next season, and who will be on the court with the game on the line.

Senior Brandon Thomas averaged 19 points per game over five games, the second-highest scoring total on the team.

"You know how it is when you are a Division I-AA player," offered Steve Baylark, who was recruited at the Division I-A level. "You always think you can play at the [Division I-A] level. For the guys who thought they could be at that level, this is a time to prove to everybody there, and the coaches, that we're no different from them. We get dressed the same way they do."

This will be the first-ever meeting between the two programs. Navy head man Paul Johnson coached against UMass coach Don Brown when Brown roamed the UMass sidelines as its defensive coordinator in 1999. But that is as familiar as these two teams will get before Saturday's matchup.

"We're always trying to beat a Division I-A school just to turn some heads," Baylark said. "We were close last year against Army. We almost got a win against them."

Army won that game 34-27. Coen threw for 213 yards on 21-for-34 passing. He was picked three times, however, and with a hostile road environment, Coen will face the ultimate test on Saturday.

"The game is going to be a little faster," Coen said. "They're not going to slow down. They're going to be going 100 percent for every play throughout the whole game. You really have to be on the ball with your decisions and making your decisions faster than you might have to usually. You have to make your decisions on time so that the defender doesn't have a better chance to break."

Coen, a replacement for an injured Tim Day at QB last season, hesitated when asked if playing against Navy was an opportunity to prove himself against I-A players.

"I think there's something deep down that makes you want to play at a different level because you wanted to go to a I-A school," Coen said.

The I-AA label comes with an inferiority complex. And the Minutemen are out to prove everyone wrong this weekend.

"Everybody here thinks they're going to the NFL," Brown quipped. "And everybody here thinks they should've gone to Division I-A. You want your guys to have a little bit of a chip on their shoulder."

"Hopefully we can show that we can hang with these guys this year," Baylark said. "We have a lot of talent that I think could play at the I-A level."

So it's into the fire on Saturday. Navy's home crowds reach numbers that dwarf McGuirk stadium. And the Midshipmen fans probably see "W" on the schedule when UMass comes to town.

No matter, says Baylark.

"You always want to play in front of a big crowd, even though it's not our crowd," he said. "It's still exciting to play in a big stadium and just the idea of playing at that level is a huge event. It's a huge motivation to be playing at a stadium like that."

But when the Saturday crowd gets loud and Coen's audibles get harder and harder to hear from the backfield, Baylark might have to revamp his statement.

Minutewomen drop three on West Coast

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts field hockey team (1-3) went out for a test drive, beginning its season with four games on the road.

UMass hit a speed bump out in California before coming home to the Bay State to record its first win of the year.

In a trio of games characterized by inconsistency and missed opportunities, the Minutewomen dropped their first three games of the season to Stanford (2-3), California (4-2), and Pacific (3-2).

After dropping the first game of the year to Stanford, 2-1, the team was shutout by the Golden Bears, 3-0. The Maroon and White enjoyed the next day off, then lost to Pacific 5-2 on Aug. 29.

The team scored four unanswered goals against the Crimson (0-2), picking up an impressive 4-1 victory on Labor Day to avoid a 0-4 start. UMass will look to grab its second win of the year when it plays Fairfield next Wednesday at 4 p.m.

"We need to be more disciplined and stay within the game plan," UMass coach Patty Shea said following the loss to Pacific. "If we try to play individually, we'll be a weaker team. They have to remember how hard it is to get here and work a little harder."

UMass dominated play for the first 10 minutes against Harvard, but for all its dominance, the Minutewomen would find themselves in a familiar role of having to come back in games.

Harvard forced a turnover deep in the UMass zone and scored off junior goalkeeper Becky Letourneau to take a 1-0 lead with 12 minutes remaining in the half.

Junior midfielder Nicole Phelan didn't wait for the second half to get the comeback started, as she weaved through Harvard defenders and fed a pass to senior forward Gina Sanders.

Sophomore forward Lauren Gillespie took a pass from Sanders and slid the ball past Harvard's goalkeeper to tie the game with only a minute remaining in the first half.

The second half belonged to the Maroon and White. Just five minutes in, the team took its first lead of the season, as Sanders chipped the ball in the net for her first of the season.

The lead was widened to two goals when sophomore forward Katelyn Orlando took a shot at point blank — which was saved — but sophomore forward Mary Shea was in position to stuff home the rebound.

Lauren Gillespie would score her second of the game after junior defender Erin O'Brien fed a long pass from the top of the circle that Gillespie dove to tip in on the right side of the net, which put the game out of reach for Harvard.

"The biggest difference in today's game was that we stuck to our game plan and simplified things," Shea said. "We attacked the way we wanted to attack. We found open spaces on the field better, which opened up our passing."

UMass played in what was technically a home game against the Pacific Tigers at Maxwell Family field, home of the California Golden Bears. Despite out-shooting Pacific 16-13 and having a 6-4 edge in penalty corners at the end of the day, the scoreboard ultimately told a different story.

"We did dominate a lot of play [in the first half], but we just needed to finish," Shea said. "We need to get it out of our heads that we only have to dominate certain stretches of the game."

Even though UMass was able to dominate, it was Pacific that ran out to a 2-0 lead on its first two shots of the game against Letourneau.

But the Maroon and White was not ready to start packing early for the East coast.

After Pacific netted two early, the Minutewomen had a flurry of shots on goal, but weren't able to finish the job, their offensive pressure was finally rewarded when Gillespie's shot was saved, but sophomore forward Erin Parker was there to put in the rebound to cut the lead in half.

The Minutewomen had the momentum heading into halftime, out-shooting the Tigers 11-6 and having a 3-1 edge in penalty corners.

The momentum carried into the second half, but Pacific duplicated its early first-half success and capitalized on goal-scoring opportunities with two goals to make it 4-1.

UMass came back to make it a 4-2 game at the 15-minute mark of the second half when freshman midfielder Cher King sent in a pass to Gillespie, who was then able to slide the ball over the goalkeeper for her first goal of the year.

UMass almost made it 4-3 when Shea went in alone and beat Pacific's goalkeeper, but her shot was blocked from out of nowhere by Pacific defender Elle Busch. They would never get any closer, and a minute later Pacific tallied an insurance goal, sealing a 5-2 victory.

The Minutewomen played their second game of the year against the defending North Pacific Conference Champion Golden Bears in Berkeley, the site of the game against Pacific. The final outcome would be the same as well.

The Maroon and White were able to stifle an offense that averaged over three goals last season for most of the first half, only allowing it one shot in the first 15 minutes of play.

"We played a much better game than yesterday," Shea said. "We controlled the tempo of the first 20 minutes."

The stalemate was broken when California's all-time single-season scoring leader Valentina Godfrid fired a shot into traffic that found its way into the back of the net to make it 1-0. Godfrid would strike again just minutes later on a breakaway shot that beat Letourneau to give the Bears a 2-0 lead.

"You have to let the ball not get to [Godfrid], and that begins with the pressure upfield," Shea said.

The Minutewomen had a chance to get back into the game in the second half with three straight penalty corners, but failed to generate any activity on the scoreboard.

"We executed, but failed to capitalize on the penalty corners," Shea said.

California put the game out of reach when they scored for the third time, handing UMass its second loss of the season.

Despite the 3-0 loss, Shea thought her team played better than in their first contest of the season.

"We improved our possession, passing, and intercepting the ball defensively," Shea said.

UMass opened its season against Stanford and struggled to get its feet wet. Stanford dominated the first 35 minutes of play, lighting up the scoreboard up twice in the first half.

UMass was only able to muster two shots the entire first half, and had only four shots the entire game.

"We had unfortunate errors, and instead of being patient, we played into their hands and their pressure," Shea said. "We were a little too timid and shy."

Stanford kept the pressure up well into the second half, but Letourneau kept her team in the game with some big saves. With just under three minutes left in regulation, senior defender Kwylan Jaggasaar fired a shot that was saved by Stanford's goalkeeper, but Phelan was in position to direct the rebound home, cutting Stanford's lead in half.

UMass had a chance to tie the game with 30 seconds left when Orlando broke down the left side and tried a centering pass from the striking circle, but no one was in position to do anything with it, and Stanford hung on to the 2-1 victory.

"We had a few less unfortunate errors and Stanford didn't get as many loose balls in the second half," Shea said. "We were definitely prepared to play Stanford, but we just didn't control the things we could control."

Mauresmo and Federer advance to next round of U.S. Open

By Ben Walker
Associated Press

NEW YORK—Top seeds Roger Federer and Amelie Mauresmo sped into the next round of the U.S. Open, exactly the kind of wins they wanted Wednesday in a tournament that's rapidly become a test of endurance.

Coming off a tough three-setter against Serena Williams, Mauresmo had little trouble against No. 12 Dinara Safina. It took only 62 minutes to finish off a 6-2, 6-3 victory and move into the semifinals.

"It's great the way it went," Mauresmo said. "Not spend too much time on the court."

Federer also won in straight sets, beating Marc Gicquel 6-3, 7-6 (2), 6-3 to reach the quarterfinals. He started fast, winning every point in the first three games.

Federer will play No. 5 James Blake, who defeated No. 12 Tomas Berdych 6-4, 6-3, 6-1. Blake saved all 15 break points he faced.

Second-seeded Justine Henin-Hardenne needed help from a trainer during her 6-4, 6-4 victory over No. 10 Lindsay Davenport in a matchup of former Open champions. Henin-Hardenne felt a twinge in her back, got a rubdown between sets and then lost five straight points.

"I hope it's going to get better," said Henin-Hardenne, who plays Jelena Jankovic in the semis.

A day after rain prevented all but one match from being completed, the sun came out and every player except Jankovic was in action. The delays and postponements have compressed the playing time for many, setting up back-to-back matches.

And, the schedule is taking its toll. Several men have cramped up and many women have heavily wrapped their legs, trying to stave off injuries.

"Recovery is not so great," No. 7 Nikolay Davydenko said after beating Andy Murray.

Second-seeded Rafael Nadal, No. 9 Andy Roddick and No. 15 Lleyton Hewitt played on the men's side.

On the women's side, No. 3 Maria Sharapova faced No. 27 Tatiana Golovin, with the winner playing Mauresmo.

Mauresmo won the Australian Open and Wimbledon and is trying to become the first woman to take three Grand Slam events in the same year since Williams in 2002.

Davydenko and the No. 17 Murray got in three sets Tuesday before play was suspended. They started up around 11 a.m. Wednesday and Davydenko won six straight games for a 6-1, 5-7, 6-3, 6-0 victory that put him into the quarterfinals.

"I normally sleep late and wake up late," Murray said. "So it was a bit different for me going to sleep at 10 and getting up early."

At 19, Murray enjoyed quite a season, beating Roddick at Wimbledon and last month ending Federer's 55-match North American winning streak.

But when his match against Davydenko resumed, Murray had three double-faults in the first game and could not find his touch.

"Yesterday was a different match," Davydenko said. "Today was completely different."

Tommy Haas reached the quarterfinals, beating frequent practice partner Marat Safin 4-6, 6-3, 2-6, 6-2, 7-6 (5) in a match that took more than three hours. Haas played five sets in his previous match, and will face Davydenko on Thursday.

"I get to play another match tomorrow after a long match. You can't do anything about Mother Nature, that's just the way it is," he said.

Unlike at most tournaments, men play best-of-five-sets matches throughout Grand Slams, benefiting from the days of rest built into a two-week schedule.

Former Open champions Roddick and Hewitt matched up in the quarterfinals, and they know each other well. They've played eight times previously, and Hewitt holds a 6-2 career edge, including 3-0 in Grand Slam matches.

"Both of us are in the same boat in a lot of ways," Hewitt said. "We both know what to expect from one another's games. We've played enough times. We've played enough big matches, as well. At the end of the day, it's going to be who can execute well on Wednesday, and who does that best is going to win."

Amale Mauresmo is trying to become the first woman to win three Grand Slam events in the same year since Serena Williams in 2002. Mauresmo defeated Dinara Safina 6-2, 6-3, en route to the semifinals.

UMass takes on Navy in Annapolis

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Last Nov. 12, the Massachusetts football team was in the midst of a stretch run crucial to their Atlantic 10 playoff aspirations.

That day the Minutemen (1-0) took on division I-A Army in West Point. UMass lost the close game and their final regular season game the following week at Hofstra, and ultimately missed the division I-AA postseason.

This season the Minutemen play their annual I-A match up Saturday when they travel to Annapolis, Md. to take on Navy (1-0).

UMass coach Don Brown — and some of his players — say that although this is still big game, there is more of a relaxed feel to it than against Army a year ago.

"Obviously there is less of an impact because it's early in the year," Brown said. "I think our guys look at it as an opportunity to see how good they are. I don't have a problem with it."

Senior running back Steve Baylark and sophomore quarterback Liam Coen agreed with Brown that there is a different feel to this game.

"Last year we were at the point where we needed a win to get into the playoffs," Baylark explained. "After this game is over, it's just back to business and take it one game at a time."

"It feels a lot better," Coen said. "I think playing [Army] that deep in the season hurt us for Hofstra just because we were so emotionally and physically drained. It's good to have this game early in the season."

Although this game doesn't have as much riding on it as Army did in 2005, Brown and his players said it still means something.

"No doubt we're going to go out and try to win. We're not going to just flop this game," Baylark said.

The Midshipmen's main strength on offense is their rushing attack. Last week in their win over East Carolina, they racked up 403 yards on the ground compared with just six through the air.

Quarterback Brian Hampton led the team with 149 rushing yards. One thing that can drive a defense crazy is a quarterback who can run. Brown stressed that his team needs to keep to their assignments and wait for their opportunities to arise.

"Even when you make a mistake, go right back to your keys and trust your keys and they'll take you to the ball," he said. "One of the negatives is when you get away from your keys. Then you start losing faith. That's where all the negative plays — from the defensive perspective — result."

Navy coach Paul Johnson utilizes Hampton's legs as often as he can. While Hampton carried the ball 34 times against ECU, he only threw the ball six times.

"They have all the different phases of the option," Brown said. "They're going to have counters and misdirection and the play actions off of it. You really have all the things in place

Sophomore quarterback Liam Coen is 0-1 in his career against Division I-A teams. Against Army last season, he went 21-for-34 for 213 yards and three interceptions.

Minutemen set to make history on the road

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Ronald Reagan was the president.

Bruce Springsteen debuted his "Born in the USA" album.

Bill Buckner hadn't been demonized.

The Boston Celtics were World Champions.

And the Massachusetts football team beat its Division I-A opponent, Ball State, 26-10, on Sep. 1.

That was the last time the Minutemen defeated a Division I-A opponent.

Since then it's been nothing but L's.

Boston College, Army, Kansas State, North Carolina State, Marshall, Toledo, and Ball State have all lined up against UMass in the last 22 years, and all of those I-A teams were victorious.

The Minutemen prepared all spring and summer for their rematch with Colgate (which dashed the Minutemen's playoff hopes with a 17-14 upset last season) and UMass exacted its fury on the Raiders in its home opener at McGuirk Stadium, a thunderous 28-7 victory to start the 2006 season.

Now it's Navy, this year's I-A bulldog. And the Minutemen have just one week until show time.

"When you look at our schedule, you highlight this [game]," UMass quarterback Liam Coen said. "It's a big game. Right now, the anticipation is more execution, just trying to get our stuff down. We'll start worrying about the hype on Thursday and Friday when we start getting into it, when it gets closer to game time."

Coen need not worry about hype. This will be the biggest test of the regular season for the warriors in Maroon and White. The Minutemen will head into the Lion's Den on Saturday to face the Midshipmen and a 30,000-plus home crowd.

But you don't have to tell that to anyone donning a UMass jersey.

UM takes three of four

BY DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Nobody said youth was a bad thing. It's just something that the Massachusetts men's soccer team has plenty of — and it's working.

UMass (3-0-1) has won three out of its first four contests this season. As a result, the Minutemen are off to their best start since they opened the season 4-0-1 in 1997.

The Maroon and White opened up the 2006 campaign with wins over Maine (0-5), Navy (2-2), and UMBC (1-2-1), while ending in a tie to Boston University (3-0-1), 1-1, in the second game of the year.

UMass is back in action on Friday as it begins a five-game home-stand against Siena (0-1-1) at 4 p.m. at Rudd Field.

All is well for the Minutemen thus far, but there is still plenty of work to be done.

"To play on the road down there, and get the results we got with a young team, I couldn't ask for a better trip," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "It's certainly a lot better than getting off to a bad start. You just have to keep everything in perspective. We've got a lot of work to do. We have a lot of things we need to keep working on. We're getting good results, while we're still not playing as well as we need to, in order to get to the conference games. But to learn as we go, and win, is great."

Other than the lone stalemate to the Terriers, the Minutemen have shut out every team they have faced this season. Both defense and goaltending can be credited for the strong defensive stand in 2006.

"We've had outstanding goalkeeping," Koch said on his team's defensive performance last weekend. "Kenny Cook was tremendous in the air, and Chris Brown was great cleaning up the middle. The defense played very well. And when they did make a

Sophomore midfielder Tony Bassett has scored a team-high two goals in four games for the Minutemen this season.

Men's basketball schedule released

The 2006 Massachusetts men's basketball schedule was released upon the conclusion of the Minutemen's trip to the Bahamas from Aug. 18-23.

UMass coach Travis Ford has added his alma mater, Kentucky, to the non-conference schedule, as well as Louisville, a team coached by his mentor, Rick Pitino. Both games will be on the road.

"It is a very, very tough schedule," Ford said. "Some people have said maybe a little too tough. Some college coaching peers have said, 'I can't believe you're doing that. You guys are supposed to be good this year. You should try to make your schedule a little bit easier so you get 27, 28 wins.'

"But it's about making our team the best team that it can be. I think this schedule will help us."

The Minutemen will also play Boston College on Dec. 2 at the Mullins Center, after a humiliating 91-62 defeat at the hands of the Eagles last year at Conte Forum.

UMass will also travel to Pittsburgh on Nov. 18 to face the Panthers in the Colonial Class at the Petersen Events Center. The Minutemen will also play Oakland and Northeastern in the same weekend.

The Minutemen's conference schedule will start on Jan. 10, at home against George Washington, a team ranked as high as No. 6 in the nation last season. Temple is next, at home on Jan. 13, then the Minutemen travel to Cincinnati, Ohio, to face Xavier on Jan. 18.

UMass will go on the road against tough opponents in Charlotte, Fordham, and Saint Joseph's, after playing those teams at home last season.

"Our conference games are going to be much, much tougher on the road than they were last year," Ford said. "This year we've got to go to Charlotte, to Xavier, to Dayton, to St. Joe's, to Fordham. It's not an easy road schedule.

"What was tough last year was the non-conference road schedule. We had to play BC. We had to play Connecticut. We had to play St. John's. The non-conference schedule is what really hurt us last year. Our conference road schedule this season is an absolute beast."

Summer trip to the Bahamas

In the middle of a hectic summer for Massachusetts men's basketball, UMass coach Travis Ford found the time for a trip to the Bahamas — with his team.

"Most schools are doing this now," Ford said. "It's kind of the 'in' thing to do. Everybody's doing it."

The more financially secure basketball programs — once every four years, and no more — are flocking overseas to play against teams from around the globe.

Because freshmen are not allowed to travel on overseas trips, Ford thought it best to take the summer voyage while the team had only one freshman — Ricky Harris — who would miss the action.

"Most teams are taking a summer trip somewhere," Ford said. "It was something that all coaches know about and it was something that you can do every four years. I thought it would be good for our basketball team because everybody would be able to go, which is unusual because most teams don't get to take their freshmen.

"Also we had four transfers who were sitting out who haven't been in a game where a whistle has been blown or anything like that. It gave us some game situations to go against to get these guys ready."

For UMass, and surely to the delight of its players, the chosen summer destination was the Bahamas.

From Aug. 18-23, the Minutemen played five games in a five-day period. They saw names like Explorers, Crime Stoppers, Giants, and Rattlers on the opposing jerseys. Needless to say, it wasn't your typical summer getaway.

"We did a lot of team-building exercises and team-building experiences," Ford said. "As we told our guys, this wasn't a vacation. This was a business trip. And even though they had fun and got to do some things that they will probably never get to do again, every day we would spend two hours in a conference room or a meeting room discussing our basketball team."

For scheduling a summer tournament, the NCAA allots 10 days of all-out practice in preparation for the upcoming games.

And there lies the real reward for the coach who practiced his players two times per day during the regular season: 10 days of sweat and hard work with his new squad. Ten days getting used to the new guys — Etiene Brower, Gary Forbes, Tiki Mayben, Luke Bonner — and getting cozy with the new system.

"[The 10 days of practice] are probably the most valuable part of the trip," Ford said. "You get those 10 days that, normally, you would never get. You get to implement

Minutewomen off and running

The Massachusetts women's soccer team defeated the Iona College Gaels, 3-1, for its second consecutive win. The victory bettered the Maroon and White's season record to 2-1.

The Minutewomen split their first two match-ups of the season on Aug. 26 and Aug. 30, losing a disappointing season-opener, 2-0, to the UNH Wildcats, but rebounding to win the following game, 3-1, over the No. 27 Boston University Terriers.

UMass will look to better its record as it plays the University of Hartford on Thursday. It will be the first and last game between the two teams during the regular season.

The Hawks fell to 1-3-0 after a tough loss to Colgate University on Sunday afternoon.

This will be the first meeting of the two squads in more than a year.

On Aug. 26, 2005, UMass and Hartford competed at Rudd Field to start the season. The hometown Minutewomen defeated the Hawks by a score of 3-0.

UMass coach Jim Rudy said that his team beat Iona in the Sep. 3 matchup despite having somewhat of a disadvantage: it had the wind at its back and played at a slight downhill during the first half.

These conditions accelerated the speed of the ball as it zipped around Iona's field turf, making it difficult to control.

"Field turf is fast to begin with," Rudy said. "But with the wind at our back ... the ball was moving like a rocket sled. It was fast."

Junior forward Brit Canfield is second on the team in scoring with three points. She has one goal and one assist in three games this season.

It wasn't until the 36th minute that UMass beat the elements and broke the scoreless tie.

Junior forward Brit Canfield scored her first goal of the season to put the Minutewomen up 1-0 with less than 10 minutes to go in the first half.

Senior co-captain Nadia Villarroel and sophomore Vanessa Patry were credited with assists on the play.

Patry would contribute twice more before the game ended.

In the 51st and 54th minutes, she scored her second and third goals of the year, respectively.

Rudy was pleased to see such a solid performance from Patry. Severe sinus problems had forced the top-notch forward out of the season-opener against UNH. But her strong performances in the previous two games spelled relief for the team.

"Her field vision, which is her strength, was definitely lessened by

UM librarians volunteer in New Orleans

University of Massachusetts librarians Isabel Espinal, Anne L. Moore, Emily Silverman, and Christine Turner were among hundreds of library volunteers who worked on community rebuilding projects in New Orleans during the American Library Association (ALA) Annual Conference, June 22-28th.

Electronic Resources Librarian Christine Turner worked with "Second Harvest" sorting food at a New Orleans food bank and "Access Services" Coordinator Anne L. Moore worked with "Common Ground" in the 9th ward cleaning up a Catholic church, parish, and school on Roch St.

About 900 library volunteers from around the US and Canada gathered in New Orleans for the ALA Conference, the first large conference to be held in the city since last year's hurricanes.

Approximenty 17,000 people attended the convention programs, meetings, and special events, bringing in a total of $20 million in much-needed revenue into the city.

Reference Librarian Isabel Espinal said that upon arriving at the Convention Center downtown—which had been a refuge for New Orleans residents during the first few weeks after Katrina— she was surprised to find that it looked fine.

"If you didn't know what had happened you would have had no idea," she said.

Apart from the tourist areas, Espinal said, the area looked like a war zone.

Students find ways to save

COLLEGE STATION, Texas—Free food. For students struggling to make it from Outbound to Outbound, those two words can be beautiful. However, it is rare to find such a phrase without fine print below, telling the reader that free food can only be attainable through a mail-in rebate, blood donation or purchase of another 12 boxes of cereal. A few options are available to students who are low on cash and have a limited meal plan or no meal plan at all.

"I think (food sampling) is a great concept," said John Wilson, a freshman aerospace engineering major. "School is way too expensive these days. College kids have to do what they can so that the economy won't cripple them."

If walking in circles around H-E-B does not fit a specific student's style, he or she could get a free meal by joining an organization such as CARPOOL.

"CARPOOL provides food for its workers," said Allison Reigle, a junior accounting major. "It's actually donated, though. CARPOOL doesn't have to pay for (the food). They get food sponsors, and then on the night that you work, you're able to get free food. We're there from 9 at night until 4 in the morning, so they just want to be able to feed all of their workers. There's so much community support from the restaurants. We have food from 'On the Border', 'Cheddar's' and 'Antonio's'."

In addition to joining an organization, getting involved helps students meet friends who are willing to share their seemingly unlimited meal plans. Sophomore business major, Trey Bahney, claims that being a member of a freshman leadership organization definitely has its benefits when it comes to meal times.

"Every Monday before our FLIP meetings, we all have dinner at 'Sbisa'," Bahney said. "And there is always someone willing to share an 'Outbound.'"

For students who are not only in want of a free meal but also some food for thought, organizations such as the "Baptist Student Ministry" are available. The "BSM" holds "Vision" every Wednesday at 12:30 p.m. for students looking for a free meal.

"It's a way that we can serve students on campus," said Beverly Parrish, associate director of the local "Baptist Student Ministry." "Each week we serve a free lunch, and we do a short talk that's about 15 minutes long on topics that are relevant to college students on campus. We do another lunch on Friday. On Friday, our lunches are $1, so it's not free, but it's still pretty cheap. The talks are a little bit longer then, but it's still just a one-hour lunch, but the talks are a little more focused on a Bible study, but it's still pretty brief."

For the student who is unwilling to give free rides or listen to Biblical talk, there is another opportunity to score a free meal. At "Blue Baker", students who come decked out in "Blue Baker" attire are given a reward in return for their public gesture of love and devotion toward the restaurant.

"If people dress up in blue, we give them free food," said Bret Eikenhorst, a four-year employee of 'Blue Baker'. "But we have a scale. If someone comes with just a streak of blue on their face, we give them a free cookie, but if they come with their body and face painted, we'll give them a free meal."

Frat housing on decline

JUAN TRINIDAD / COLLEGIAN

A recent agreement between UMass officials and the company which owns much of Frat Row brings the destruction of those five houses on North Pleasant Street one step closer.

BY ERIC ATHAS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Disciplinary actions, rezoning, and a recent agreement have all sparked a plummet in the total number of Greek-sponsored houses over the past three years at the University of Massachusetts, according to records.

The plunge in numbers leaves a total of six houses currently operating under traditional standards. There are 12 official chapters on campus, which means only half are living in houses.

"In terms of fraternity housing, we're certainly seeing a change in the model," said Michael Wiseman, Director of the Office of Greek Affairs. "Traditional fraternity housing is not going to be a model here anymore."

The decrease in frat houses was mostly caused by a variety of actions taken in the last year. A recent agreement between UMass officials and the company which owns much of Frat Row brings the destruction of those five houses on North Pleasant Street one step closer.

Officials from Alpha Tau Gamma Inc. accepted a price offered by UMass, and will dissemble all five houses if and when the deal is complete.

"They are in the process of completing the paperwork, there's a lot of different rules," said Wiseman. "Part of the agreement is that the company that owns the houses would hand an empty lot over to the University."

This past summer, another fraternity was booted off the list of traditional Greek houses. Zeta Beta Tau attempted to relocate its frat to a former sorority house on Phillips Street. According to Wiseman, the owners of that house had to go to the Town of Amherst zoning board of appeals, because the house was tagged as a sorority, and would have to be rezoned to fit fraternity standards.

Wiseman said residents of Phillips Street pushed for the board to deny ZBT's request. He said they argued that zoning for a fraternity is much different than a sorority.

"There were two hearings and that second hearing a number of residents from the neighborhood came and voiced their concern about that property on Phillips Street becoming a fraternity house," said Wiseman. "People were arguing that zoning for a fraternity is different than zoning for a sorority."

After hearing arguments, the zoning board of appeals voted against ZBT's request.

Two other fraternities were booted out of there houses after being nabbed for several safety and fire violations during the spring of 2005.

Alpha Tau Gamma, which was located on Sunset Ave., was cited in May of 2005 for broken doors, blocked exits and illegal cooking. Shortly after, Sigma Alpha Mu was also called out by fire officials.

UMass suspended both fraternities, putting a three-year ban on their existence as fraternities. Sigma Alpha Mu was located on one of the five properties currently in the process of getting handed over to the UMass.

Also in May of 2005, the planning board for the Town of Amherst rezoned the east end of Olympia Drive, putting a block on any new construction of frat houses in that area. Sigma Phi Epsilon, which is located at 57 Olympia Dr., was already operating on that street at the time.

Wiseman said these incidents have changed UMass Greek life. He said while the traditional frat house concept will not be as big on campus, Greek life will still be present.

"Our goals and intentions are to still have fraternity and sorority life on the campus, and to see a bigger and a better part of the campus," He said. "It could be we're two to three to five years where we're in a place where we can explore different models."

Officials protest Sept. 11 miniseries

BY DEEPTI HAJELA
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK—A miniseries about the events leading up to the Sept. 11 attacks is "terribly wrong" and ABC should correct it or not air it, a group of former Clinton administration officials said in letters to the head of the network's parent company.

But in a statement released Thursday afternoon in apparent response to the growing uproar, ABC said, "No one has seen the final version of the film, because the editing process is not yet complete; so criticisms of film specifics are premature and irresponsible."

Former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, former National Security Adviser Sandy Berger, Clinton Foundation head Bruce Lindsey and Clinton adviser Douglas Band wrote in the past week to Robert Iger, CEO of ABC's parent The Walt Disney Co., to express concern over "The Path to 9/11."

The two-part miniseries, scheduled to be broadcast on Sunday and Monday, is drawn from interviews and documents including the report of the Sept. 11 commission.

The letter writers said the miniseries contained factual errors, and that their requests to see it had gone unanswered.

"By ABC's own standard, ABC has gotten it terribly wrong," Lindsey and Band said in their letter.

"The content of this drama is factually and incontrovertibly inaccurate and ABC has a duty to fully correct all errors or pull the drama entirely. It is unconscionable to mislead the American public about one of the most horrendous tragedies our country has ever known."

"For dramatic and narrative purposes, the movie contains fictionalized scenes, composite and representative characters and dialogue, and time compression," ABC said in its statement. "We hope viewers will watch the entire broadcast of the finished film before forming an opinion about it."

"ABC/Disney acknowledges this show is fiction and in direct contradiction of the 9/11 commission report and the facts, and it is despicable that ABC/Disney would insist on airing a fictional version of what is a serious and emotional event for our country," Clinton Foundation spokesman Jay Carson said in a statement Thursday. "No reputable organization should dramatize 9/11 for a profit at the expense of the truth."

The letter writers pointed out examples of scenes they had been told were in the miniseries, but which they said never happened. Albright objected to a scene that she was told showed her insisting on warning the Pakistani government before an air strike on Afghanistan, and that she was the one who made the warning.

The five-hour miniseries is set to run without commercial interruption. Director David Cunningham said it was a massive undertaking, with close to 250 speaking parts, more than 300 sets, and a budget of $40 million. Cunningham has said he shot 550 hours of film. The cast includes Harvey Keitel, Patricia Heaton and Donnie Wahlberg.

To boost retention, colleges turn to coaches

BY JUSTIN POPE

Heather Parsons poses in the Boston company where she works. Parsons is participating in a program which provides personal life coaching for some Northeastern students.

BOSTON—Heather Parsons was already juggling a full-time job and family life on top of her classes at Northeastern University. On top of that, a school project was in jeopardy because her team wasn't working well together — anxiety she just didn't need.

Time to consult her personal coach, Chris Tilghman.

"It was so easy, taking a step back from the emotions surrounding the issue," said Parsons, whose coach used his weekly phone session with Parsons to make a variety of suggestions for getting the group back on track. "Hearing a third person made all the difference."

The best part: Northeastern picked up the tab.

"I told him, 'You're cheaper than therapy,'" Parsons laughed. "He said, 'I get that a lot.'"

Long reserved for pro athletes and corporate executives, personal coaches are now being offered by some colleges to help students set goals and manage time.

It sounds like the kind of college concierge service one would expect to find at exclusive, upper-crust schools. But in fact, the 15 or so schools that have hired a coaching company called InsideTrack don't fit that description at all. Several — including a number of for-profits — cater to older students trying to balance the demands of work, school and family. Others serve traditional-age college students who may need help making the transition from high school.

The coaches talk to students about setting goals and respond to anything that might be getting in the way of pursuing their degree, from financial issues to personality conflicts. Following a pilot program last year, Northeastern will offer once-weekly telephone coaching sessions to all new adult-education students this year.

Our Lady of the Lake College, a small Roman Catholic school in San Antonio which serves mainly Hispanic students, is offering in-person coaching free to all new freshmen this year, under a grant from AT&T.

What the schools most want from the service is to improve graduation rates. Barely 60 percent of students who enter four-year colleges earn a degree from that school within six years, according to the Department of Education's latest figures.

Colleges historically have blamed students' weak effort or poor preparation. But increasingly, colleges are recognizing that a mix of factors makes students leave school — from money to family problems to lack of mentoring. That's especially true for adult learners, at a time when students 30 and older comprise about one-quarter of the nation's 17 million undergraduates.

"Most of the students that we work with that are at risk are not really at risk intellectually," said InsideTrack co-founder Alan Tripp. "They're smart enough to do the work. The system just isn't working for them."

There is a catch and it's a big one: The coaching service is labor-intensive and very expensive. For schools paying from their own pocket, the cost averages about $1,000 per student for a year of weekly sessions in person or by phone — not something most schools can afford.

But participating colleges hope the intensive help will pay for itself by keeping students in school, and paying tuition. InsideTrack claims pilot programs have boosted retention 25 percent or more, saving schools $3 for every $1 they spend, Tripp says. They also use it as a recruiting and enrollment tool. Northeastern, for instance, has been putting coaches in touch with adult learners as soon as they apply, and reports an increase in the number who enroll.

"Students, especially adult students, their lives are busy," said Christopher Hopey, Northeastern's vice president of adult and continuing education. "You've got two kids, you got a job. Lots of people call us up and say we want to come to Northeastern, but they never follow through with it."

Death exposes surgery network

By Melissa Trujillo
Associated Press

FRAMINGHAM, Mass.— Fabiola DePaula's quest for beauty took her to a condominium basement, where authorities say she paid an unlicensed doctor $3,300 for a nose job and liposuction performed on a massage table.

But something went terribly wrong and the 24-year-old nanny died, exposing what investigators say was an underground cosmetic-surgery network used by immigrants from Brazil — a country whose women are world-famous for their beauty and their willingness to go under the knife to achieve it.

"Somebody has to speak out. Go to the Brazilians, open their minds and let them know it's dangerous," said Jacque Foster, a friend of DePaula's. "This is totally beyond unsafe. You have to think about what you are doing."

Authorities believe a Brazilian doctor, Luiz Carlos Ribeiro, performed liposuction, nose jobs and Botox injections for three years in the Framingham area, mostly for the town's large Brazilian immigrant population and mostly for cash.

Police say DePaula, a native of Brazil, went to Ribeiro for a nose job on July 27, then died three days after the liposuction. According to the autopsy report, DePaula died of complications from the liposuction, including pulmonary fat emboli, or fat particles in the lungs.

District Attorney Martha Coakley said doctors in a hospital could have dealt with the complication, which she called a rare but known risk.

Ribeiro and his wife, Ana Maria Miranda Ribeiro, both 49, were arrested July 31 and charged with manslaughter, unauthorized practice of medicine and drug counts. The couple pleaded not guilty and remain in jail. Their attorneys declined to comment. The owner of the condo was also arrested.

The district attorney said Ribeiro was licensed to practice medicine in Brazil, but his specialty was not cosmetic surgery. Officials have not identified his specialty.

Eliana Miranda, a Brazilian immigrant who owns a clothing store in Framingham (about 20 miles west of Boston), said she doubts Ribeiro had trouble finding customers.

Cosmetic surgery is "big here too, but in Brazil, it's much bigger," she said. "We suffer all day in high heels, just to look good. Americans think about what is comfortable. Even the underwear is more underwear."

Youth and beauty are positively worshipped in Brazilian culture, exemplified by the scantily clad women celebrating Carnival or sunbathing on the beach (a spectacle immortalized in the sultry song "The Girl from Ipanema"). The best-known plastic surgeons in the country are celebrities.

Other states with large immigrant populations have also seen cases in which people fell victim to others practicing medicine or dentistry illegally. In Miami, for example, which has a large population of Brazilians (and others from Latin American countries that put a heavy emphasis on female beauty), many cases involve illegal cosmetic procedures.

Some Brazilians around Framingham said it is common for Brazilians to travel back to their native country for all types of operations — not just cosmetic surgery — that often cost thousands of dollars less than in the United States.

Maxine L. Margolis, a professor of anthropology at the University of Florida, who specializes in Brazilian immigrants, said unlicensed doctors offering cheap procedures here could be particularly appealing to illegal immigrants, who do not want to risk being unable to return to the United States. (The district attorney's office would not comment on DePaula's immigration status.)

In the Framingham case, at least two other women have come forward, saying they were patients of the doctor. Authorities are using local Brazilian media and a hot line to find other potential victims and explain the risks involved in illegal surgery. Massachusetts is estimated to have more than 30,000 people of Brazilian descent, most of them in the Boston area.

"There should be a lesson learned from the death of this young woman," said the district attorney. "People think this is an extension of getting my nails done, getting my hair done."

Foster said the sad thing is that her friend had no need for cosmetic surgery: "She was absolutely gorgeous, not only on the outside but on the inside."

Springfield lawmaker pleads guilty in corruption case

SPRINGFIELD, Mass.—A former state lawmaker on Thursday pleaded guilty to siphoning funds from the Springfield Housing Authority to fund his campaign and make improvements to his home.

Christopher Asselin is one of a dozen people to agree to plea deals in a corruption scheme involving several of his family members, including his parents, who have already admitted their roles in fleecing the housing authority. Collectively, the defendants have agreed to repay $4.4 million.

Asselin, a two-term Democratic representative who was voted out of office after his arrest in 2004, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to receive illegal gratuities, conspiracy to commit theft against the government and conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud.

As part of the deal, Asselin agreed to forfeit his home in Springfield and his interest in a family home in Chatham. He faces 18 months to two years in prison when he's sentenced Dec. 18.

Asselin and his attorney, William Cintolo, refused comment after the hearing in U.S. District Court in Springfield.

Asselin had been scheduled to enter the plea last week but had second thoughts when questions arose about how the case would affect his wife's standing as a guidance counselor in the Chicopee school system. Merylina Asselin, was also expected to admit her role in the case at a later date. There was no resolution to that discussed in court Thursday.

half were not. It was a very sobering experience," Espinal said.

Emily Sullivan, the UMass Library Director of Development and Communication said that when ALA decided to hold the convention in New Orleans last October, she immediately decided she wanted to go.

She spent a few days volunteering with "Habitat for Humanity" in the Musicians Village, a neighborhood in the 9th ward that is being rebuilt to help the musicians of New Orleans who lost their homes. She too drove through the 9th ward, the most devastated area.

"We saw hundreds of homes, one after another, gutted and empty and spray painted with symbols by the National Guard," Sullivan said.

Espinal worked at the Nora Navra Branch library in the 7th ward, cleaning out the moldy remains that had been flooded by three feet of water last August.

"The books on the bottom shelves were covered in mold and we even had to pry some from the floor. We had to wear suits and masks," she said. "It was by far the dirtiest job but it was rewarding when we finished."

The next step, Espinal said, will be to rebuild the library.

Both Espinal and Sullivan said there was a lot of nervousness about the convention being in New Orleans but both thought that it went very smoothly. Sullivan said she believed that there had been a lot of planning to get the infrastructure of New Orleans back to normal just for the convention.

They also said that there were a lot of youth group and college age students there volunteering. "It is an ideal volunteer opportunity," Sullivan said.

All of the locals were very happy to have them there. "Every store you walked into people thanked you and wanted to tell their story," Sullivan said. Volunteer groups such as "Habitat for Humanity", "Common Dreams", and "Hands on New Orleans" are all trying to recruit more volunteers to go help", she said.

A WEEKLY LOOK AT THE UNIVERSITY LIFESTYLE

Is UMass number seven?

Is it possible that UMass Amherst really is the seventh biggest party school in the country, or is the Princeton Review a joke?

By Melissa D'Amico, Teresa Reilly, and Frank Vitale
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Many students at University of Massachusetts like to enjoy the occasional party. The Princeton Review says that UMass students enjoy their parties more than any other university in New England.

In the 2007 Best 361 Schools, UMass was ranked as the number seven party school in the United States. ZooMass has come to be known for their Frat Row keggers, wild off campus apartments, and out of control Southwest towers. But while some students bask in the glory of creating a top ten party school, others try to bring more focus on different aspects of campus life, and the success of UMass academics.

"I think that people have this idea about UMass that everybody parties all the time, but it's not like that. People study, they have jobs, they care about academics. The fact that there are so many people here just makes it easier to call UMass a party school," said Meghan Caffrey, a UMass sophomore.

The college experience for most students involves partying at one time or another, and in a campus with over 11,000 undergraduate residents, there are bound to be more opportunities for this experience. With parties being such a common occurrence at UMass, the University has developed its own reputation as a party school.

Even outside of its own community, UMass is known for its crazy parties.

"My dad called UMass 'The Zoo' even before I knew people called it that," said UMass student Danielle Rizzi.

Many students do not disagree with the idea that UMass is a party school, but suggest that UMass does not party to the extent that many outsiders believe.

"There are people that get together and have fun, but I don't think UMass quite lives up to its reputation. Most college kids party and are involved in that kind of stuff during their years in school, so it's not just UMass students who can get a little out of control," said Caffrey.

"I think that having UMass ranked at number seven is nothing to be proud of. It only gives others a bad perception of our school. UMass probably only made the list because there are so many students that go here, not because UMass throws huge parties that every student goes to together. There are a lot more small gatherings than really big, out of control parties," she added.

Other students disagree, saying that UMass has earned its spot as a top ten party school. "I feel like UMass has earned its title, it is a huge party school in comparison to every other school I have visited," said Joe Desimone, a UMass sophomore. "Parties are just a microcosm for what the entire school is like."

The rankings reported by The Princeton Review are based solely on responses by students to survey questions regarding topics ranging from drugs and alcohol to financial aid. There is no scientific basis to the findings.

"The Party Schools list is one of 60 ranking lists in the book based completely on what students The Princeton Review surveyed at the schools in the book reported about their campus experiences at them. Some ranking lists are based on students' answers to one survey. Other lists are based on students' answers to a combination of questions. Both are based on students' answers to survey questions concerning: the use of alcohol and drugs on their campuses, the popularity of the fraternity and sorority scene, and the number of hours they study each day outside of class time," said Jeanne Krier, a publicist for The Princeton Review Books.

Ed Blaguszewski, Director of News and Information for UMass says that these types of rankings are simply a scheme to sell books, without any real factual base.

"The methods are sloppy, and it all comes across as a misleading attempt to capture attention each fall. The Princeton Review acknowledges that it gets about 300 students per school to fill out a survey, and from that it draws wide-ranging, comparative conclusions based on an unscientific, self-selected sample. At UMass-Amherst, that's about 1 percent of the students."

Despite the fact that UMass is notorious for their partying, many students believe its strengths and opportunities in academics are continually overlooked.

"I really like the school that I go to, but I don't like other peoples' perception of it. I don't go to school just to party, I go to school to get ready for life," said UMass student Mary Kociuba. "This campus is so big, with so many different events, clubs, and academic opportunities. It is really a great school, and it should not just be overlooked as a place where students slack off, and don't care about their education because I know most students do put in a lot of effort and focus on their school work."

Many University faculty members suggest that UMass' ranking does not accurately reflect the true nature of students at the University.

"I do not think the survey adequately describes our community of student scholars. Our student body is bold, brave and courageous; they are scholars; they conduct research; they work; they join student organizations; they participate in the performing arts and intercollegiate athletics; they have internships and work-study; they study abroad; they participate in our center for student business; they participate in community service and service learning; they study; they go to class; they are serious about their lives and they are serious about their futures; our students graduate," said Vice Chancellor Mike Gargano.

"Our students also compete after graduation for the best careers, admission to graduate school—MBA, Law, Medical; careers in the private sectors, careers in the non-profit sectors, careers with Teach for America, Peace Corp and Vista; Our students at UMass-Amherst make us all proud," he added.

UMass students may have put in a lot of time, effort and hangovers into becoming the number seven party school, but students also put in just as much time and effort into their academics. "We are hardcore in all ways, not just partying. You should check out the library at 3:30 in the morning during finals week," said Desimone. "It's just as easy to shut your door and study as it is to go find a party on campus."

Many students agree with the ideas stated by Desimone. "You can find anything at UMass if you look hard enough. Sure, there's a lot of partying if you look in the right places. But UMass shouldn't be overlooked as a substantial institute of higher learning. One from which many a scholar has been produced," said Martin Legg, a UMass Freshman.

College parties, in the eyes of many people consist of highly intoxicated, belligerent, and uncontrollable people, beruit, and horrendous hangovers. These kinds of parties are what create negative reputations for schools like UMass.

"We need to separate the negative connotation with a party. Parties that are well organized, well planned, well managed, have the proper security in place, have the appropriate venue to accommodate the number of guests, contribute to student life and engage the University community and are good for students and the University. Associate Vice Chancellor, Byron Bullock is actively engaging student organizations on the planning process that leads to a high quality event," said Gargano.

While UMass ranks number seven for party schools, according to the Princeton Review, the University also ranks number 12 for "Lots of Beer" and 15 for "Lots of Hard Alcohol." Other rankings for UMass Amherst include being number two for "Students Dissatisfied with Financial Aid," number five for "Students Who (Almost) Never Study," and number 12 for "Reefer Madness." Any UMass student can participate in next year's Princeton Review survey by going to survey.review.com.

UMass is a better world

Joshua H. Wilder

Well, it's finally here, that special time in Massachusetts when the leaves change color, it gets cooler and summer fades into autumn; a time when all of us 18,000 sum-odd, hardworking college students bring our laptops, plastic cubby bins and shot glasses and descend on a little town by the mountains known as Amherst.

While some students find the transition from summer vacation into the school year to be a major downer, I myself couldn't have been happier to be back. The endless summers I used to know as a young tyke that were chock full of leisure, horsing around and basking in the glow of two plus months without any school, work or responsibilities have faded into something twisted and wrong: the real world. I had no actual understanding of this concept before this summer, and for those of you who still don't know how it really is, you make up a slim slice of the fortunate ones in the population.

In this real world, adults both big and small cram themselves into little office cubicles, shut away from the sun, nature and fun. They lose these essentials and trade them in for the glow of harsh fluorescent lights and "Mr. Coffee" machines. They spend each week, all day, straining their eyes in front of little computer screens, crunching numbers, looking for promotions and hating every minute of it.

Instead of worrying about passing a class, they are worried about carving out a career in which success equals getting a nicer office with more windows and a bigger paycheck. Despite always hearing about a life like this from adults and older friends, their precautionary tales never effectively conveyed just how depressing, creatively draining and flat out boring a lifestyle like this really is. Working at an office much like this one for the summer sure made me miss my interesting days and hazy nights spent at the Zoo.

Don't get me wrong, there is no denying that becoming part of the workforce does make you feel a bit higher up on the food chain, as you are actually able to earn your own money and do so with a tie and a glow of partially deserved respect. Waking up every day and going in to work eight or more hours is no small feat, and it requires reliability, diligence and patience.

Holding down a job is something many people are unable to do. However, once that initial novelty wore off I found myself feeling stuck in a rut, looking ahead at day after day, week after week, month after month of sitting in the same old office, surrounded by the same co-workers, many of whom were much older than your humble columnist and already jaded by the grind and harsh realities of the corporate world. When it looked like my chances of having a summer vacation away from school and work had officially dropped faster than the ceiling panels in the Big Dig tunnel, I realized two things.

Firstly, this job was only temporary, and soon I would be going back to school for another semester full of lectures, independence and debauchery. On top of that I was going to the University of Massachusetts-Amherst, a place a lot more exciting than my summer abode in Suburbia USA. Once that first weekend in September rolled around my folks drove me along the good old Mass Pike and released me from the shackles of a real job.

Luckily for me, I went from being just another miserable sap wearing a suit and tie in an office to a college student with classes, clubs, intellectuals, drunks and co-eds all around me. Instead of following the goals set forth by the office, I could set my own path. Once I started making the comparisons between the real world and UMass I realized just how lucky I was.

What better job in the world is there than being a student? Think for a minute or two, and you'll come up with very few answers. Sure, Paris Hilton or Mike Jones might have it better off, but if you were actually paying attention to this column, you would have known they don't live in the real world. You won't find many jobs where the weekend starts on Thursday afternoon and ends Monday morning when you roll out of bed late for class.

Sitting in a lecture surrounded by a bunch of friends for two to three hours a day is a lot better than sitting alone playing solitaire in an office for eight. And the weekends? Well, I don't need to explain that, do I?

This summer I've learned just how fortunate we all are to be here at UMass doing what we love, and so what if we'll be swimming in debt after it's all said and done? The experiences you can have at school are ones that will be remembered forever. So kiss summer goodbye and get ready for the real vacation, if you will, because in four short years it'll be time to join the real world.

Make 'Full House' at Cage

Michael Shulman

First Week at UMass is filled with an array of events that allow us to visit old friends and make some new ones along the way. This year, the University has brought in Bob Saget to perform at the Curry Hicks Cage. On Friday, September 8th Saget will be delivering to UMass his own style of comedy. Saget's dark, dirty humor is a departure from his previous roles on television. If anyone has seen Saget on the big screen, most notably his roles in the films "Half Baked" and "The Aristocrats," then you already know the type of material he performs.

We grew to adore him as the ultra-neat, moral, lesson spewing father on "Full House." We then got more of Saget as the clean cut, boyish host of "America's Funniest Home Videos," or as I like to call it, people getting hit in the junk. In contrast to these iconic roles, Saget's stand-up routine discusses, with the utmost vulgarity, his experiences being a single dad, dating and his ex-wife. An edgy, bawdy Saget may take getting used to at first, but he is one of the best in the game and is a treat for fans of the stand-up scene.

His ability to jump from one extreme to the other is the definition of his genius. I think for most of us one line changed it all.

The versatility of Saget is the merit of his career. His ability to jump from one extreme to the other is the definition of his genius. I think for most of us one line changed it all. When his character in the movie Half Baked replies, "Marijuana is not a drug. I used to s * for coke. Now that's an addiction. You ever s some * for marijuana?" most of us laughed for a long time continually remarking on how we cannot believe that was the dad from Full House. That was the open door into understanding Bob Saget and his career as a twisted, sexually charged comedian.

I know we are all saying to ourselves how could the guy who played some of the cheesiest roles in television history ever be funny as a stand-up? I have no idea, but he has been performing for 20 years. There must be something about this guy spitting out profanity that makes people's sides hurt.

I know the first week back is crazy, but this may be your only opportunity to see one of the most memorable TV dads of all time dealing with adult themes, using very adult language. I love stand-up comedy and had a great time my freshman year when Lewis Black came to the Mullins Center. I think that Saget will be just as funny and smaller venues always make for great performances.

Saget is doing a lot more than performing for us here at UMass, and a number of other schools as he begins his campus tour. He has continued to act in a variety of mediums including playing himself in an episode of "Entourage" (an amazing show that will definitely get a column devoted to it later this year), as well as lending his voice to the animated hit "Madagascar." He is also working on several projects soon to be released, including an HBO sitcom where he plays a gynecologist and single father.

He is also working on the much anticipated "Farce of the Penguins," an R-rated comedy/documentary. Saget is exercising all of his talents for this one: voicing-over, writing, directing and producing with producer David Permut and Thinkfilm, who made "The Aristocrats."

I, for one, am pumped to see Saget perform. Just hearing the same guy who was Danny Tanner curse is worth it alone. Not to mention the guy is actually funny. Stand-up comedy is maybe one of the hardest things to do as a performer, and seeing a great comedian is something to look forward to this first week back at school.

I know that going to see a performance on the first Friday back at school might not be the coolest thing to do, but make a trip over to the Cage. The show starts at 8 p.m. and should be over with plenty of time to pick up your books and get a head start on classes. The school has done a good job recruiting some real talent, and it would be a waste to not give Saget an audience worthy of his. Tickets cost $5 and can be purchased at the Fine Arts box office, and make sure to bring your student ID to the event. Hope to see you all there.

But this year's different

Caroline Moss

Going back to college after a long summer break doesn't hold that wave of excitement that used to overwhelm us the night before another year of high school began. These are the first days of school that no longer find us armed with trendy binders (FiveStar zipper, in case you were wondering), erasable pens and monogrammed L.L.Bean backpacks. Au contraire, we prepare ourselves with television sets, a lifetime supply of microwavable noodle bowls and an egg crate. The college years (cue "Saved by the Bell" theme here) open the doors to new back-to-school tasks. Instead of preparing our lunches, for instance, we prepare our livers.

Every year brings in a new wave of excitement, one infused with the awareness that you'll live in a new room, maybe with a new person, take new classes and meet new people. Fresh drama, drunken pictures, random and awkward run-ins with the same people you share a floor with are inevitable. It's a new year at college; living on your own, cherishing every second of alone time you get, because after all, it's here, and only here, that we combine our academic lives, our social lives and our private lives into one jumbled four year mess.

So what will we do, UMass students, to set this year apart from all the others? Let's start off with the obvious. Everyone's first resolution is almost always some version of: stop being fat/work out more/get jacked. Sounds simple, really, but come on. Who actually sticks to that? If the majority of people kept their resolutions, we wouldn't keep making the same ones every time December 31st rolls around, and we definitely wouldn't find ourselves waiting in that 10 minute line for soft serve every night at Worcester Dining Commons.

But this year's different you'll tell yourself, obviously. I bet you spent all summer just anticipating the ways that you'd make your (first, second, third, fourth...fifth...sixth?) year at UMass the most perfect year ever, and here's how.

1. (insert your name here), resolve to:

1) Be efficient in the Blue Wall Café/Library/Rao's/AmherstCoffee. Along with resolution number four, carrying a notebook to the Blue

Everyone's fist resolution is almost always some version of, stop being fat/ work out more/ get jacked. Sounds simple, really, but come on. Who actually sticks to that?

Wall Café/Library/Rao's/Amherst Coffee obviously makes it look like studying will happen, when in reality, you will consume some sort of food or beverage without tasting it and look at your cell phone every two minutes to see if anyone has texted you. But this year, you will open that notebook, and get some work done, or you'll at least perfect your skill at writing your own name in script.

2) Finally change my major. Though I have taken every pre-requisite to become a successful neurosurgeon, I am still a theater major. This is because I am too lazy to walk around campus getting papers signed.

3) Stop lying to myself about what I'm actually doing on Wednesday nights. While my away message says I'm studying, I know that I am actually watching "The Hills." Furthermore, I resolve to understand that even though my away message says I'm studying, it doesn't mean I actually ever studied, thus meaning I don't actually know the material. I will stop killing brain cells by listening to Lauren and Jason bicker. I will actually study.

4) End my relationship with the delivery staff of Wings. They come every night at 2 a.m., take my money and leave. I feel used, nothing I own fits anymore and I'm broke. This year I'll save my money for practical things, like the NoDoz in the library vending machine and the $5 solo cup fee at SigEp.

5) Stop making excuses as to why it's actually not a big deal that I sleep through 75 percent of every class scheduled before 12 p.m. I mean, I'm here for an education right? Right.

6) Walk somewhere at some point, because maybe it isn't efficient to spend more time waiting for PVTA than actually getting there by foot, like in the old days. Maybe taking the bus from the stop in front of the Campus Center to the one in front of the FAC makes me look a little pathetic.

Generally speaking, we all have our resolutions; the things we tell ourselves will be different at 'ut the new year, the things we sw..ar we'll never do again. Don't be ashamed by the fact that tonight, you too will be speed dialing your boyfriend over at Wings, watching "The Hills" and telling yourself that next year will be different. Welcome back, UMass. Nothing's changed. Cheers.

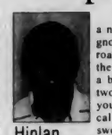
The pain of playing



Hinlan Wong

I would like to introduce you to a new world, a place where elves, gnomes, dwarfs, trolls and humans roam. No, I am not talking about the "Lord of the Rings" trilogy but a brand new world founded about two years ago. It is a world where you can accumulate gold, use magical powers and fight with huge swords that are as long as your body. All you have to do is travel to Best Buy and pay $39.99 for the software for "World of Warcraft." You get a month free and thereafter you have to pay $15 a month. Almost everyone who buys it agrees "World of Warcraft" is more addictive than crack cocaine.

"World of Warcraft", or commonly referred to as WoW (and what a wow it is), may be the newest, best selling Massively-Multiplayer Online Role-Playing Game (MMORPG) with over five to six million players worldwide. Most likely you are either part of this figure or know someone who plays WoW, but a few of you might have been living under a rock for the past two years, so I will summarize.

WoW is the newest edition to the "Warcraft" series. You play as a character of your choosing in the virtual world of "Warcraft." You choose the server or realm of your liking and use your mouse to attack whoever, without killing yourself. For every kill you make you gain a certain prize and increase your level of experience. Like any other game, the more prizes accumulated, the more your character evolves and you can get extraordinary things like enormous swords.

French communications company, Vivendi, has been profiting from the game since 2004. Their stocks had dramatically dropped in 2003 but ever since the release of WoW, Vivendi's stock has been increasing steadily. At one point, the number of people paying the monthly subscription actually accounted for 50 percent of Vivendi's gaming unit profits; wow.

Unlike the rest of us who prefer going to bars, restaurants or shops in our free time, people who play WoW are not spending as much money, and some are actually making money by sitting and clicking a mouse. Don't believe me? Check out eBay, type in "World of Warcraft," and you will see people selling their accounts. Accounts being sold on eBay can go for $20 to $500 depending on how much experience the character on the account has.

Who could forget about the boy in South Korea who died after sitting in front of a computer screen for more than 50 hours; he died of heart failure, supposedly from exhaustion.

A growing number of players are even selling WoW currency for actual money (these people are called Gold or Asian Farmers). Being that the game is incredibly popular in China, and other Asian countries, many people play these games all day to collect gold, the currency used in the game. After accumulating a certain amount, these farmers sell their winnings for actual money in chat rooms or message boards. Many of these farmers make a decent living, considering the fact that many of them are from the rural countryside.

Staying in front of a computer for so long not only hurts your social life but your psychological and physical health as well. In one instance a boy in China committed suicide by jumping off a large building because he thought once he died he would somehow magically end up in cyberspace.

A young man even killed his friend after the friend had stolen a magic sword from him online and sold it to another player. There are many recorded instances of hackers stealing online gaming money (like WoW gold) and selling it for real money. Who could forget about the boy in South Korea who died after sitting in front of a computer screen for more than 50 hours (he died of heart failure, supposedly from exhaustion).

While these deaths and vandalisms are not attributed to WoW, that doesn't mean WoW doesn't affect people. A friend of mine is addicted to WoW and has been playing it for months. While he is saving money by only going to work and coming back to play WoW, his social life is completely out the window. He aggressively yells at family members when he loses in the game, and when friends call him to go out he refuses to leave the house because he is playing WoW and ends his conversations in less than a minute.

WoW and other online games are getting people hooked (like my friend) and are alienating them from their friends and family. I'm not a professional, but it looks like signs of serious addiction. The fact is, since this is such a new addiction it is hard to help them find a solution. There are support groups for online gambling and alcohol, for example, but what about online gaming?

Think about this: 15 million people in South Korea play online games, and I bet you millions more play them all across the world. How many of them do you think are addicted? How many of them do you think are like my friend? I'm sure many of them are addicts and need professional help. While there may actually be professionals and support groups out there to help gamers, they sure aren't advertising enough.

Bob Saget will be performing tonight at the Curry Hicks Cage at 8 p.m.

Full House ain't got nothing on the Cage

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

He towers over crowds bearing a goofy countenance that is recognized by millions. He has played a father figure in one of the most influential sitcoms of the early 1990's. In the lives of those who grew up in a generation where television was practically a third parent, he sat in our living rooms night after night. And now this pop culture icon has his sights set on the Curry Hicks Cage tonight at 8 o'clock.

But who is the real Bob Saget? And why now?

Born Robert Lane Saget to two proud parents in 1956, Bob grew up quiet, but always quick-witted with friends. He attended Temple University where he studied film. He built up a comedy routine and an acting career, and soon he landed a role where his image would be immortalized. As Danny Tanner in "Full House," a family sitcom which debued in 1987, he starred as a soft-spoken, stern and widowed father. Sage quickly found a groove and a hefty audience. The demographic, though limited to mainly suburban households, proved loyal. Over its nine year life-span, the show catapulted through the roof in terms of ratings and Sunday nights were filled with awkward laughter with a message always tied in. The Tanners, let's face it, were with us through thick and thin, and we returned the favor: when Stephanie drove the convertible through the kitchen, we were there to sympathize, when Uncle Jesse got married and had those twin brats, we were there to watch them grow up, and when Danny had trouble dealing with DJ, we watched them bicker. But it was being an American Family that kept them together. In an era when there were a slew of mid-grade sitcoms, "Full House" stumped them all.

Next came "America's Funniest Home Videos." Every Sunday night at seven, Saget welcomed audiences to sit back and watch kids hit their fathers in the crotch with plastic bats, cats fall off coffee tables and other furniture and happily observe a land where personal injury and embarrassment were rewarded with 10,000 dollars. It was the American Way at at its finest. For every clip, Saget would, to the best of his ability, dub over his too-easily-recognizable voice for men, women, children, and animals. And to tie it all up, Bob would present the money himself; our Danny Tanner at work.

But after 1997, Bob Saget seemed to have dropped off the face of the Earth. Audiences would have to do with the never-ending re-runs of the Tanner family. And as far as dubbing over voices, Daisy Fuentes just didn't seem to have the same flair Bob once did.

Then a bomb dropped. With the release of Dave Chappelle's "Half Baked," Bob Saget created one of the most memorable quotes in cinematic history (that is simply not fit for print.)

A whole new Bob Saget had emerged — a satirical comedian with few limits. He furthered this image with his recent appearance in "The Aristocrats," a documentary on the dirtiest joke in American standup. For what was probably one of the longest eight minutes of his career, Bob Saget opened his mouth and what came running out was absolute filth. It was a no-holds-barred swearing explosion, malicious acts of bestiality, and cringing remarks about the Olsen twins.

And it was hilarious.

Though his standup routine has consisted of this obscene adult humor for years, people everywhere are now just realizing the old Danny Tanner is no longer with us — and an updated, more perverted Bob Saget stands before us.

It's up in the air as to what to expect for tonight's show. What is inevitable, however, is an explanation of just how Danny Tanner, who we all grew up with in our living rooms, evolved into the distorted, self-deprecating mess that is Bob Saget of the 2000s.

That is, until you wander through the campsites or up and down "shake down street" where vendors sell their latest art work, haberts, and clothing.

Strange for so many festivals. Acrobatics and men on stilts are a blurry background to the heavily advertisements for "really," "doses," and "handy sugs." With that, one decides the nature of their journey toward the next day.

The "Gathering of the Vibes" showcased stellar musicians ranging from the bluesy drawls of Martin Sexton to the jazzy rock of Bob Weir and Rat Dog, from the multi-tasking talent of Kellar Williams to the bluegrass folk of "Yonder Mountain String Band."

The music kicked off on Friday, Aug 18, brandishing with it an atmosphere so eccen-

One of Escalet's most famous pieces, "Harlem Straight Flush," will be featured in the Augusta Savage Gallery in the New African House.

By Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

AMHERST- Artist Frank Diaz Escalet has returned to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. For the second time in his long career he is participating in a gallery at "The New African House" in the Augusta Savage Gallery.

The name of the portfolio showcasing Escalet in the gallery is called "Hopes, Dreams, Sorrows".

The gallery will be running until October 13, but don't wait until the last minute to check it out. The seventy-six year old painter is one of the most talented artists out there today. Whether it is paintings, sculpture or wall hangings it doesn't matter, Escalet is one of the best.

Escalet creates art with a variety objects such as wood, metal, paper, acrylics, oils, ink, water color, leather, fabric, and stone. These objects together make art that is original, straight forward and sometimes political. His paintings showcase people working in the fields of farms as well as people hanging out. The leisure moments captured by Escalet everyone can relate to (despite the fact that the actual people in the paintings are African American and Hispanic American, a common theme in his artwork).

As for the actual images in the paintings, they are almost cartoon like, but not in a "Family Guy" kind of way, instead the faces and body shapes are similar to a caricature with exlorted noses and chins despite the fact they are oil paintings.

Public Broadcasting Station's in Maine and Massachusetts have featured Escalet in many documentaries over the years about his life such as "Traveler on the Road" which aired in 1982. In May of 1992 he won "Manhattan's Art Magazine" Award of Excellence, but that's not all. Escalet has also won the Man of the Year Award (Award of Excellence) in December of 1992. Don't let the more then ten year old dates fool you; Escalet is still a relevant person in art today.

Escalet is one of the few artists to have different paintings in permanent galleries all across the world, from Texas to Russia Escalet has over 75 paintings showcased in galleries world-wide. Some of them are public and some of them are private. Famous people such as the late President Ronald Reagan have owned some of Escalet's paintings. One of the more unique artwork pieces of Escalet's career was the painting of Pablo Casal's cello case at the Museum of Modern Art which was used for seat covers at their stone seating area of the museum's sculpture garden.

It's hard to believe, but Escalet was not always an artist. He was originally a member of the United States Air Force despite the fact he was born in Puerto Rico at a time when the Commonwealth wanted to be independent from being an American dependent. He also created leather clothing for a time before becoming an artist. Some of the leather clothing he made was worn by the rock'n'roll band "The Rolling Stones" and other musical acts, including artists like Aretha Franklin.

The gallery is open Monday and Tuesday from 1 p.m. to 7 p.m. and Wednesday through Friday from 1 p.m. to 5 p.m. It is free for UMass students

Paris Hilton's DUI arrest a likely boost for her party girl image

By Sandy Cohen
AP Entertainment Writer

LOS ANGELES — For most celebrities, getting smacked with a DUI is an instant image crisis. For Paris Hilton, it could be a career boost.

"Paris Hilton being arrested just makes her more famous," said veteran publicist Michael Levine. "She has devoted her entire adult life to appearing to be the princess of parties."

Hilton's publicist, Elliot Mintz, confirmed the star's festive nature Thursday: "She's been known to have a drink or two."

Hilton was arrested by Los Angeles police officers in Hollywood early Thursday on suspicion of driving under the influence. During the arrest she was briefly handcuffed. Hilton was booked at LAPD's Hollywood station at 1:43 a.m. and released shortly afterward, said Nick Velasquez, a spokesman for the city attorney's office.

This is Hilton's first drunken-driving arrest, Mintz said, adding that he doesn't expect the incident to hurt her image.

"The people who enjoy Paris as a comedian or actress on TV or as a singer on her CD, a woman who seems to have captured the imagination of so many people, I don't know if this is going to have any impact on them one way or another," he said. "But, of course, she regrets what took place."

Hours after her release, Hilton defended herself to radio host Ryan Seacrest during his Thursday morning show on local station KHS-FM.

"It was nothing," said Hilton, 25.

The singer, actress, handbag designer and heiress to the Hilton hotel-chain fortune said she was "starving because I had not ate all day" and possibly "speeding a little bit" in her Mercedes-Benz SLR on her way to grab a bite.

"I was just really hungry and I wanted to have an In-N-Out burger," said the one-time pitchwoman for Carl's Jr.

Hilton, who made her singing debut last week with the release of her eponymous CD, said she spent Wednesday filming a music video and having dinner with her sister, Nicky, and some friends before heading to a charity event sponsored by rocker Dave Navarro.

Hilton said she had "one margarita" at the event.

Just last month, she told the Los Angeles Times that she "doesn't like the taste of alcohol."

"It grosses me out," she said.

Hilton told Seacrest that police stopped her for speeding. An LAPD spokeswoman said Hilton was driving erratically.

"Officers observed the vehicle driving in an erratic manner so they pulled the car over," officer Marjan Mobasser said Thursday.

Hilton's blood-alcohol level was .08 percent — the minimum to warrant an arrest, Mintz said.

According to a national research study, a 137-pound woman would need to consume three alcoholic drinks in one hour on an empty stomach to reach a .08 blood-alcohol level. The 5'8" and fashionably slender Hilton likely weighs much less than 137 pounds.

She described the arresting officers as "really nice."

"There was a lot of paparazzi around so I think they were trying to make a statement," she told Seacrest. "Everything I do is blown out of proportion and it really hurts my feelings."

Hilton is expected to be arraigned Sept. 28, said Velasquez of the city attorney's office. Penalties for a first drunken-driving offense typically include a fine, probation, an alcohol-rehabilitation program, license suspension and "other DUI-related conditions" such as community service, he said.

LAPD officials said they will not release Hilton's arrest report or her mug shot.

The maximum penalty for a first misdemeanor DUI offense is a $1,000 fine and six months in jail.

This isn't the first legal problem for the blonde heiress.

In February, a Superior Court judge ordered Hilton to stay away from event producer Brian Quintana after he claimed she shoved him on at least three occasions and badmouthed him.

A month earlier, actress and diamond heiress Zeta Graff filed a multimillion dollar lawsuit against Hilton claiming that Hilton spewed "vicious lies" to the "New York Post" about an altercation the two had in a London nightclub.

In November, Hilton was a passenger in a silver Bentley that a companion drove into the back of a large commercial truck, scratching the hood of the car. The mishap was captured on videotape. Cameras were also rolling when Hilton's Range Rover backed into a car in a parking garage in June.

Hilton was just a pretty party girl and everyday heiress until a sex-tape she made with an ex-boyfriend surfaced in late 2003. That made her a cyberspace novelty and instant tabloid favorite. Hilton's reality TV series "The Simple Life" debuted shortly afterward.

In 2004, Hilton released her book, "Confessions of an Heiress: A Tongue-in-Chic Peek Behind the Pose." She appeared in episodes of television's "The O.C." and "Veronica Mars" and had a role in the 2005 horror flick "House of Wax."

Hilton released a perfume bearing her name in 2004. Earlier this year, Hilton unveiled her cell-phone video game, "Diamondquest." She'll follow that with a line of Paris Hilton purses and cosmetics.

Hilton's string of boyfriends has also kept her in the news. She was engaged for several months to Greek shipping heir Paris Latsis before dating another Greek shipping heir, Stavros Niarchos III. She has also been linked to former University of Southern California football star Matt Leinert, who recently signed with the NFL's Arizona Cardinals.

Two new films reflect Hollywood

By Michael Phillips
Chicago Tribune

The world loves a winner, a parade and a good villain, and Hollywood rates high in all three. "An easygoing mausoleum" is how Bertolt Brecht, not the happiest of well-compensated but deeply embittered playwrights turned scenario writers, referred to Southern California in general and the movie world in particular, where a smile is no umbrella, it's simply a non-verbal lie.

Now more than ever, movies about casualties of the movie business — the moths that flew too close to the flame, or never got invited to the bonfire in the first place — hold a peculiar fascination for both insiders and the rest of us. You'd think Hollywood's obsession with itself and its sacrificial lambs would've peaked in the middle of the last century, with "Sunset Boulevard." But in this new century, everyone's a star on "MySpace" or "YouTube", and network television has become a 24-hour audition for a talent show designed to make fleeting stars out of every last American citizen.

This month, at the front end of a busy fall season, two films enter the marketplace bringing stories of the mysterious deaths of two Hollywood denizens, one who knew B-level fame firsthand, another who died trying. Both real-life characters had their enemies, but the real villain was a metaphoric dream factory, the one with the "help wanted" sign scrawled in disappearing ink.

"Hollywoodland" opens Friday. In director Allen Coulter's debut feature, Ben Affleck plays George Reeves, the man who played Superman on TV in the early 1950's and then couldn't play much else. Diane Lane plays Reeves' mistress and keeper, Toni Mannix, the wife of MGM executive Eddie Mannix (Bob Hoskins).

The main line of action in "Hollywoodland," however, belongs to Adrien Brody. He portrays a fictional character, private eye Louis Simo, who investigates Reeves' apparent suicide in 1959. Theories abound regarding Reeves' death; "Hollywoodland" posits three of them, leaving the audience to decide for itself in the end.

A week after "Hollywoodland" comes "The Black Dahlia," director Brian De Palma's film version of the James Ellroy novel about the most grisly of all unsolved California murders, which is saying something. Ellroy took the basics of the 1947 crime and created characters haunted by the short life and horrific death of actress-on-the-make Elizabeth Short, the woman known as the Black Dahlia. Her nickname was a riff on a movie title, "The Blue Dahlia" (1946), with Veronica Lake.

From the beginning, as author Ellroy said recently in an interview in Chicago, Hollywood served "as a magnet for psychically maimed misfits running away from something." It's a cliche, but it's a cliche Ellroy finds attractive and just true enough.

The novelist had no hand in the "Black Dahlia" screenplay. Ever since his 1987 novel was in galleys, there was talk of a film version. David Fincher ("Fight Club") attached himself to the project for a while; he envisioned a three hour black-and-white opus.

Ellroy says he's happy to cash the check and says he admires the film. He also admires "L.A. Confidential," another Ellroy adaptation, and, for many, a high-water mark when it comes to contemporary noir.

Why are we interested in characters such as Elizabeth Short, who never made it, and George Reeves, who did, sort of, for a while? Simple: "They lived in the margins of fame," says "Hollywoodland" director Coulter, who worked extensively on "Sex and the City" and "The Sopranos" before moving into film.

"Hollywood promotes the dream and the allure of glamour, huge stardom, money, sex — all the things one fantasizes about having endless supplies of," says Coulter, a soft-spoken Texas native. "Yet most of us don't have those things. I think we feel both an identification with those who don't have it — that's certainly my interest — and the desire to see the grim results of fame."

"Hollywoodland" was budgeted in the modest $15 million to $20 million range, according to Coulter, and was shot largely in and around cost-friendly, tax break-rich Toronto, with some exteriors shot in Los Angeles, Long Beach and environs. "The Black Dahlia" cost two or three times that amount, depending on estimates. De Palma and his stars—Josh Hartnett, Aaron Eckhart, Scarlett Johansson, Hilary Swank and, as the Dahlia, Mia Kirshner — made most of their film in highly economical Bulgaria.

It's an old story, this business of making Hollywood movies somewhere other than Hollywood.

"You can't re-create 1947-era Los Angeles with any degree of authenticity," Ellroy says. "It can't be done. It's not there." Likewise, when Robert Towne made his 1930's set "Ask the Dust," another tale of L.A. misfits and strivers, he went to South Africa to re-create downtown L.A.

Coulter's mission with "Hollywoodland" was to shoot the 1959-era sequences, as opposed to the Reeves-centered "Old Hollywood" flashbacks, as if he were simply making his movie in 1959, straightforwardly and without fuss. He was after "the whiff of what it felt like to live then," he says, using the book "Americans in Kodachrome" as his visual guide. The production designer for "Hollywoodland" was Leslie MacDonald, who served as art director on "Bugsy" and, more in the "Hollywoodland" budget range, the Coen brothers' "Barton Fink."

With "Hollywoodland" opening Friday and "The Black Dahlia" one week later, there's a worry that one or both of the films will suffer. A larger question looms: does either film offer the sort of noir sleaze, sex and Hollywood sinning that can capture a mass audience?

For his sociological survey of 1940's Hollywood, author Otto Freidrich used the title "City of Nets." The title referred to the Bertolt Brecht/Kurt Weill opera "The Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny," in which librettist Brecht imagined "a city of liberation and license stretched like a net to snare whatever passes." That's Hollywood the metaphor: a winner, a parade, a magnet, a sinkhole, rich and strange enough to encompass everything from "Sunset Boulevard" to "Entourage."

"Our story," says "Hollywoodland" director Coulter, speaking for a lot of other movies, "is about the risks of the pursuit of some ephemeral notion of stardom. It's that belief that you will only be somebody when you attain stardom. And for whatever reason that's still with us. That's the cult of celebrity we live in now."

This fall we have Christopher Guest to put it in comic perspective. The ringleader of "Waiting for Guffman," "Best in Show" and "A Mighty Wind" is coming out with his own movie about the movies, "For Your Consideration," in which the cast and crew of a micro-budget indie ("Home for Purim") gets caught up in awards season craziness.

In "Strictly from Hunger" (1937), humorist S.J. Perelman wrote of being squired around Tinseltown: "The violet hush of twilight was descending over Los Angeles as my hostess, Violet Hush, and I left its suburbs headed towards Hollywood. In the distance a glow of huge piles of burning motion-picture scripts lit up the sky. ... How good it was to be alive, I thought, inhaling deep lungfulls of carbon monoxide."

It's the old siren song, heeded by one would-be star after another. Come on in, says the flame to the moth. The air's fine.

Paris Hilton was arrested on a DUI early Thursday in Los Angeles.

Christian game looks to cash in

By Sandy Shore
AP Business Writer

DENVER — The streets of New York have never looked so barren.

An occasional taxi or bus motors down a boulevard as people wander aimlessly among eerily vacant buildings. Soon, black helicopters loom overhead and armed soldiers close ranks on the streets below.

This isn't your run-of-the-mill video game "Left Behind: Eternal Forces" is based on the best-selling "Left Behind" book series about the apocalypse. But it's the apocalypse without dismemberment or graphic bloodshed, though the game has an element of violence that some Christians argue is counter to teachings of the Bible.

The game's creators say they hope to wriggle into the multibillion-dollar mainstream video game market by offering a real-time strategy option for serious gamers. They do believe the faith-based theme is important too.

"What we've decided to do is embed our message in a game so that it's not overt but it is in the game," "Left Behind Games" President Jeffrey Pachter said. "We're not ashamed of it there are Scriptures in the game and we're faithful to those Scriptures."

The overall video game software market, including consoles and portables, was $6.1 billion in 2005, based on U.S. sales, according to The "NPD Group" research company in Port Washington, N.Y. It does not track sales for Christian video games, which is a tiny niche.

Analyst Michael Pachter, who follows the industry for "Wedbush Morgan Securities Inc.", has played "Eternal Forces" and said it probably will be well-received.

He estimated it would sell between 250,000 and 1 million units, likely far more than any other Christian video game, because of its high quality.

"They did a nice job," Pachter said. "In order for the game to hit the higher end of that range, I think they have to attract mainstream consumers who just want to play the game because it is a good game.

"The question is, will the game be perceived as too preachy for the mainstream and I just don't know. We'll see."

Set in New York, the game begins with smoldering landscapes, the eerie streets and wandering nonbelievers and evildoers. The object is to convert nonbelievers and ultimately prevent evil forces from taking over the world.

"Left Behind" marketing manager Greg Bauman won't be specific about how to achieve victory because the game won't be officially released until later this year. However, a demo of the game available free of charge on the company's Web site provides some clues.

Players, as commanders of the forces of good, need to make sure their people are housed and fed, nurtured with prayer and armed to defend themselves for eventual battle.

Players recruit people to battle evil forces while taking control of buildings for medical clinics and housing. They can send people into battle but lose points by killing evil soldiers or by failing to meet the spiritual needs of the troops. Want to ward off evil? Hit the prayer button.

Every person depicted has a name and a history, which emphasizes the human cost of battle, Frichner said.

Along the way, players find clues to Bible mysteries and other information. Christian rock groups provide background music.

In the single-player mode, the player battles evil forces. In the multiplayer mode, players may choose to represent evil or good. Gamers can also play each other online.

The PC-only game cost between $3 million and $5 million to produce. It will sell for $49.99.

The current market for Christian video games is essentially nonexistent, Pachter said, but there is opportunity given the growing popularity of Christian products and the fact that parents want nonviolent fare for their children.

"Eternal Forces" is the first effort from "Left Behind Games Inc." of Murrieta, Calif., which has a license to develop games based on the "Left Behind" novels by Jerry B. Jenkins and Tim LaHaye that have sold more than 63 million copies.

The company's mission is to produce products that promote faith-based values but also appeal to the general population. The books and the game are built around those left on Earth after millions of Christian believers ascend to heaven during the Rapture as defined in Christian theology.

Since it was previewed in May at the Electronic Entertainment Expo in Los Angeles, "Eternal Forces" has drawn opposition on Internet sites, in some newspapers and on television from those who contend the violence goes against the Bible.

"It's reprehensible," said Florida attorney Jack Thompson, a critic of video game violence. "They're basically using the phrase — Christian game — to disarm parents into thinking it's going to be OK for our kids."

"Left Behind Games" co-founder Troy Lyndon has posted a statement on the company's Web site calling the game a classic battle of good and evil. Frichner said it depicts choices people must make when faced with threats.

"Do we just lie down and allow aggressors to kill us, or maim us or pillage us?" Frichner said. "I think most Americans would answer "no". We defend ourselves. To remain faithful to the "Left Behind" series, we couldn't make a game that didn't have that element in it."

Ralph Bagley, chief executive officer of video game maker "N'Lightning Software Development", believes there is a market for Christian video games waiting to be tapped, particularly for technically accurate products such as "Eternal Forces."

He's been in the business since 1999, when Christian game developers consisted of a handful of people who made a video game with about $10,000 while top game developers were spending $2 million to $3 million.

"We couldn't stand up to it," Bagley said.

He invested about $800,000 in the design and production of "Catechumen," a nonviolent adventure game that has sold 80,000 copies — a top seller in the Christian video market.

Bagley's other game, "Ominous Horizons, a Paladin's Calling," is set in Germany in the 1400's when Satan steals the first printed Bible and hides pieces of it throughout the world. The player solves puzzles devised by ancient societies to track down the missing pieces. Bagley spent about $1.2 million to develop it.

He predicted demand for Christian video products would continue to grow.

"Even the youth pastor that runs the youth group, when he comes home and wants to play a game he really doesn't want another Bible lesson thrown at him," said Bagley, who is also a spokesman for the 'Christian Game Developers Foundation'." "He just wants to play a game."

Affleck ready to take flight again

By Daniel Fienberg
MCT

LOS ANGELES — It was only two or three years ago that Ben Affleck was everywhere, a state of ubiquity that bred an avalanche of contempt.

The star of "Gigli" and "Jersey Girl" was constantly out-and-about with girlfriend Jennifer Lopez and his every move was tabloid fodder. The worst part was that Affleck looked to be embracing the attention to his personal life, seemingly unaware that audiences were rapidly forgetting why they'd liked him in the first place.

Then, the "Good Will Hunting" Oscar winner took a step back. He traded Jennifers, parting ways with Lopez and eventually marrying Garner. He became a father. The paparazzi may still have been hovering to capture his every move, but he seemed less eager for the press. And, with the exception of "Surviving Christmas," a dud so massive it hit DVD shelves within weeks of its theatrical release, he stopped appearing in movies.

"I wanted to sort of take a break and keep things quiet, and I kind of made the decision to just do the kind of movies that I really like to be in and that I can be proud of being in and not work for money or work to be famous or any of that stuff," Affleck says.

Ben Affleck, the actor (as opposed to Ben Affleck, the movie star), returns to screens this week in "Hollywoodland," a fact-based examination of the death of "Superman" star George Reeves. The film, directed by Allen Coulter, depicts Reeves as a man who became the victim of his own fame. Let's just say that Affleck relates.

"It's just like, in doing this movie, I sort of lived my own research a little bit which was nice, playing this part, because I didn't have to then go around and ask a lot of people what this is like, what this feels like," he explains. "It's like the guy from 'Good Will Hunting,' playing a guy from Boston. I kind of had a head start on that."

Of course, Affleck isn't just playing himself and he admits proudly that he watched every available hour — color and black-and-white — of Reeves' "Superman" television series, as well as attempting to catch all of the actor's undervalued film work.

"George Reeves was an iconic guy because of who he played and that was, in some ways, tragic for him," he notes. "And that very tragedy and a kind of paradox — in the sense that he got the thing that he wished for and ultimately it was very destructive — is part of what makes the story so good and part of what makes the character so good. The onus was on me and on Allen and on the writers to be consistent with who the guy really is, because there is a kind of a burden and a responsibility and I think even more so because I think of George as a guy who never really got a fair shake."

The recent changes in Affleck's life seem to have caused the actor to get a new perspective on stardom, one that he suspects Reeves might have shared.

"You keep on running on this treadmill and reaching for another movie or another prize or another accolade or someone else to ask for my autograph or another TV appearance. It never gets there. It's hollow," he muses. "It's like a Western facade town on the Universal lot. You go, 'Oh, look. It looks like the Old West. It's neat.' But if you go there and actually open the doors there is nothing actually inside. It doesn't matter what's inside. It just matter what it's showing you. So that's how it kind of works and I've done that and getting to the point where — I'm lucky. I got to kind of see that and then say, 'Ok, well, what do I really want to do?' In the course of that I got dinged up plenty and now there are things that will probably come along that I won't get the chance to do what I would like to, that being that guy would afford me the opportunity to do."

"Hollywoodland" can maybe be seen as Affleck's first step in rebuilding his image, a process that will continue in the spring with the release of "Gone, Baby, Gone," his feature directing debut.

"Ultimately, I found myself at the end of that period to have sort of a horrible feeling, to be trapped inside and part of this whole tabloid situation where my personal life is out there," he reflects. "So just being able to take a couple of years and reassess about what I want to do with my life, what do I want to be, has been great. I have a family. I'm working on stuff I like. I directed this movie now, which was extraordinarily terrifying and wonderful and horrible and great all at the same time. So I'm in a nice place."

opener against Maine, and he added an insurance goal in the 2-0 victory over Navy.

Forward/midfielder Prince Ofosu also has four points on the season with a goal and two assists. He scored the first goal of the season – the first of his career – and added an assist against Maine. His other point came against Navy on a Bassett goal.

Senior Greg Cirillo is also off to a strong start, leading the team in assists with three.

Siena enters today's matchup having played only two games, while the Minutemen will be playing their fifth of the regular season.

After battling Central Connecticut to a 0-0 tie, Siena fell to Drexel, 2-1, with junior midfielder Liam Welsh scoring the Saints' only goal.

Two different goalies have started for the Saints already. Kyle Christiansen shutout Central Connecticut, making three saves. He also earned Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference Defensive Player of the Week.

Patrick Henry started against Drexel, making five saves and allowing to goals, including the game-winner in the 96th minute.

UMass is undefeated all-time against the Saints, holding an 11-0-2 record. However, Koch is not expecting an easy win for his team.

"I expect them to put their shoes on be ready to play on Friday," Koch said. "[Siena] will play a hard fought game. Coach Curto will have them ready to play."

Later today, the winless Bonnies will visit Holy Cross, then make the trip west to Amherst on Sunday, when the visiting teams will switch hosts to cap off the weekend.

After opening its season with a shutout loss to Colgate, St. Bonaventure fought nationally-ranked Akron into a second overtime before falling, 3-2. A week later, the Bonnies lost to Bucknell, 3-1.

Senior forward Kevin Omokhua is the team's leading scorer with three points. He tallied one goal and one assist in the loss to Akron.

three final contests of the season. All three were road games. The team, as any team is at the tail end of a season, was a little bit beaten up. And they were taking on the Black Knights of Army, who were riding a two-game winning streak and were playing at home.

Maybe Army isn't the most daunting 1-A football program, but it has a fine base, and those cadets make that Michie Stadium rumble.

But, despite rich tradition and riotous ing power, UMass gave Army a run for its money, falling by a mere seven points.

History says it's not likely. But go ahead, ask the burning questions.

Will Navy shutout UMass? Will the Minutemen surprise the Midshipmen? Or will they follow the trend of a few other 1-AA programs that embarrassed 1-A coaches and players?

It could happen.

Marion Jones cleared of recent allegations

By Eddie Pells
Associated Press

Marion Jones is free to return to the track again, her record and reputation cleared after a backup drug test came up clean.

The "B" sample taken from one of the world's best-known and most decorated sprinters did not detect the banned endurance enhancer EPO, her attorneys said Wednesday night — a stunning result that resurrects her career almost as quickly as it was nearly dashed earlier this summer.

The finding means her initial positive result is thrown out, clearing her of the most recent — and most damaging – allegations and paving the way for her return to the sport she defined in the late '90's and early this decade.

"I am absolutely ecstatic," Jones said in a statement released by her lawyers. "I have always maintained that I have never ever taken performance enhancing drugs, and I am pleased that a scientific process has now demonstrated that fact."

Long a target of governing bodies in track and the Olympic movement, Jones tested positive for EPO on June 23, after winning the 100 meters at U.S. nationals for her first sprint title since 2002.

She withdrew from the 200 meters the next day and was slated to race at a meet in Switzerland in August, but withdrew unexpectedly. Hours later, reports of her positive "A" test for EPO were revealed.

She faced a minimum two-year ban, pending the result of the backup, or "B," test, conducted at the same UCLA lab using the same sample. That sample came back negative.

"I am anxious to get back on the track," Jones said.

The International Association of Athletics Federations is awaiting notification of the lab result.

"We have not received any formal notification from the lab," IAAF spokesman Nick Davies said Thursday. "Until then, we can't comment. Only until we receive the notification and accept the explanation can we make any decision on her eligibility."

The statement about the results, released by attorney Rich Nichols, said Jones was informed of the negative test by the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency. USADA does not comment on active cases and never acknowledged Jones' positive "A" test.

World Anti-Doping Agency chairman Dick Pound said "EPO is open to interpretation."

"Maybe the first one was made too hastily," Pound said in a phone interview Thursday with The Associated Press. "You wouldn't think there would be variations between the amount in sample A and sample B. I'm sure there will be some explanation forthcoming from the lab or from USADA.

"I think the test is good, you just have to know how to read it."

USADA general counsel Travis Tygart did not immediately return messages left late Wednesday by The Associated Press. U.S. Olympic Committee spokesman Darryl Seibel said the federation had no comment.

Questions have long been raised about the reliability of EPO testing, and this negative "B" test will spark further debate.

"I believe there are issues with that test," said Howard Jacobs, another Jones attorney who has defended several athletes on doping charges. "It's a difficult test. From what I saw on the "A" sample, it was questionable as to whether it should've been called a positive. I can't say I was shocked that the "B" came back negative based on what the "A" looked like."

As he has in the doping case involving Tour de France winner Floyd Landis, Jacobs derided the leaking of positive tests. Doping cases aren't supposed to be made public until they are resolved, but most are reported once a positive "A" test is confirmed.

"This is perfect illustration of why this new trend of leaking A-positives is a horrible thing," Jacobs said. "This whole thing should have happened anonymously. Marion should've been able to keep competing and no one should have known about it."

EPO is also known as Erythropoietin, a banned performance-enhancer that can boost endurance.

Jones, who has five world championships, dominated track and field in the late 1990s. At the Sydney Games, she became the first woman to win five Olympic medals — taking gold in the 100 meters, 200 meters, 1,600-meter relay and bronze in the long jump and 400-meter relay.

Since then, her reputation has suffered. She is one of several athletes who testified to the federal grand jury investigating BALCO in 2003. Her ex-husband, C.J. Hunter, and Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative founder Victor Conte have accused her of using banned substances, allegations she has denied.

Her former coach, Trevor Graham, has been linked to several athletes in trouble for doping, including Justin Gatlin, who recently tested positive for testosterone or other steroids and faces a possible eight-year ban. Last December, the father of Jones' son, sprinter Tim Montgomery, retired after he was banned for two years for doping violations – the result of information gathered in the BALCO probe.

Earlier this year, the International Olympic Committee said it would continue to investigate Jones' performance in Sydney to determine whether she was doping then.

Jacobs said the turnaround in Jones' case places a burden on sports federations and those who administer the tests to make sure they're doing a good job and following protocol on releasing results.

"They need to look at their procedures," Jacobs said. "Not USADA so much as the sports federations" who leak the positive tests.

"They always talk about holding athletes to the highest standards," he said. "They need to follow their own rules.

"This kind of calls them on the carpet."

Marion Jones is one of several athletes who is connected to the BALCO investigation. She has been accused several times of using banned substances.

At the 2000 Sydney Olympic games, Marion Jones (left) became the first woman to win five medals. She has been cleared of recent doping allegations.

his offensive line, his coaching staff, the fans – just about everyone and anyone but himself. Possessed with a shifty running style and a powerful right arm, he ran for 11 touchdowns and passed for 16 more (with just four interceptions) last season.

He said he's humbled by the preliminary Heisman talk.

"Anytime your name is mentioned in the same breath as such a prestigious award, you sort of get blown away," the senior said.

Ginn has six kick returns for touchdowns in his two seasons at Ohio State. A year ago he showed he had hands to go with those legs, catching 51 passes for 803 yards and four touchdowns. With Santonio Holmes gone to the NFL, Ginn's role in the offense will undoubtedly grow even larger.

Not surprisingly, the two are linked by opposing teams. Just as they could split the Heisman vote, they also divide the attention of defenses.

"We really can't go out there and focus on just Troy Smith or focus on Ted Ginn," Texas safety Michael Griffin said.

Ginn said the two must play together just as they did years ago when they played catch at Glenville High School.

"We both have to go out and play for each other," Ginn said. "Whoever wins, wins. Because we're both going to get credit for it if we win."

So far, Smith and Ginn have proceeded as if this is just a typical season.

"People are saying they have the potential to produce. That should encourage you and fuel your fires to work," Tressel said. "It shouldn't make you relax and start daydreaming about what you might say at the Downtown Athletic Club."

Bush has some final advice for the Ohio State teammates.

"Just don't think about it," he said. "Don't even let it bother you. Don't even let it pop into your head. Just think about winning games, winning championships and being there for your team. That's it."

Last season, Tedd Ginn showed versatility by catching 51 passes for 803 yards and returning six kickoffs for touchdowns.

Tears to cheers for Harrison

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO, Mass. – A smile has replaced the tears on Rodney Harrison's face.

His badly damaged knee is strong again, the drive that made him an intimidating hitter never left and the return to football some doubted would happen is just days away.

Bring on the Bills.

"I don't feel any restrictions" for Sunday's opener against Buffalo, the New England Patriots strong safety said. "I don't see myself being limited in any capacity. I just feel like when I go out there I'm going to be ready to play."

Harrison, known for his intimidating hits, couldn't even stand up the last time he played in an NFL game. He tore three ligaments in his left knee in the first quarter last Sept. 25 at Pittsburgh and knew right away his season was over. He missed the last 13 regular-season games and two playoff contests.

Free safety Eugene Wilson saw Harrison at halftime of the Steelers game.

"He had tears in his eyes because he loves the game so much," Wilson said, "and to go down and know that you might not be able to play, it hurts."

Harrison was driven off the field on a cart. After the game, a cart took him to the team bus. All that hard work in the offseason after the Patriots second straight Super Bowl win meant little. Frustration set in and the sparkplug of the Patriots defense couldn't take it out on opponents.

"I knew I was done for the season because I heard something pop," he said. "You have to go through trials and tribulations to make you gain perspective in life as well as in your work and it just makes you appreciate it that much more and I'm not taking it for granted."

The 33-year-old worked hard on his rehabilitation. He wasn't ready to practice when training camp began July 28 but worked his way back to the point where he's played multiple roles in workouts – starting safety, special teams, mimicking an opponent's defense to help the offense prepare.

He was motivated by doubters of his ability to come back and felt less swelling and pain in his knee than he had expected.

Now he has a new teammate who helped him develop that determination and skill when they played together for San Diego for nine years. Linebacker Junior Seau, who was in his fifth year with the Chargers when Harrison was a rookie, signed with the Patriots Aug. 18, four days after announcing his retirement following three seasons with Miami.

"A lot of times he would come up to me and tell me that he was proud of me and the way I've worked and the way in which he's seen me grow" in San Diego, Harrison said. "I was very, very immature as a rookie but there was a difference between my rookie year and my fourth and fifth year when I really started understanding and appreciating the opportunity that I had."

Harrison played a big role in Seau's decision to join the Patriots. The two talked and Seau was comfortable with the atmosphere and mood around the team.

Now Seau gets to see at close range just how far Harrison has come less than a year after being hurt.

"It's amazing," Seau said. "It just doesn't happen every day and it takes a special person to do that and Rodney is definitely a special person."

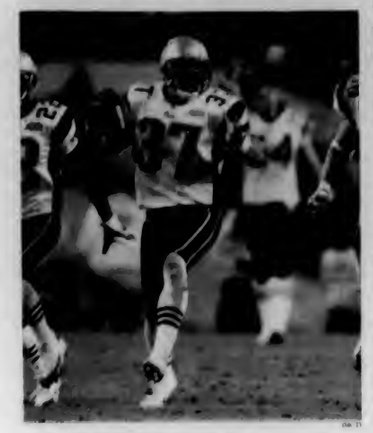
Harrison had started all 41 games the Patriots played in his three seasons with them before being sidelined. He was their leading tackler in his first two seasons, two of the happiest of his career. The Patriots won the Super Bowl both times after he had been in just four playoff games in his nine seasons with San Diego.

"I've enjoyed football these last three or four years more than I've ever enjoyed football," he said. "It's really a joy and a treat to be back in the locker room hanging out with the guys and joking with them."

It sure beats crying over an injured knee and hearing talk that his career might be over.

"No one thought I would ever play football again and for me to come back and play has just been a true blessing," Harrison said. "Just to have the opportunity to get back on the field is just incredible. It's just amazing. I'm excited about it, but once you get over that initial feeling then it's just football."

Rodney Harrison returns to the Patriots' defensive backfield in 2006 after missing most of last season with torn ligaments in his left knee.



The New England Patriots welcome Rodney Harrison back with open arms this season. The 33-year-old expects to be ready for the season opener.

Bruschi questionable for opener vs. Bills

FOXBORO, Mass. – Tedy Bruschi returned to practice Thursday with a cast on his surgically repaired right wrist and was listed as questionable for the New England Patriots season opener Sunday against the Buffalo Bills.

The inside linebacker, who broke his wrist on the fourth day of training camp July 31, was on the field for the stretching period that was open to the media. The injury report issued later Thursday said Bruschi missed a portion of the practice.

Bruschi, entering his 11th season, missed the first six games last year after suffering a stroke the previous February. After Bruschi broke his wrist, the Patriots signed 17-year veteran Junior Seau to play inside linebacker four days after he announced his retirement.

"He's getting better every day," coach Bill Belichick said of Bruschi before practice. "He's day-to-day." Even when he was away from the field, Bruschi was involved in team meetings and helped Seau get acclimated to the defense.

"Tedy has been very involved in everything and he's great about that, just like he was last year with some of the new guys that have played in there," Belichick said. "Overall, it's a good group and they work well together and that includes all of them. Tedy is a big part of that."

He also said there's no doubt Bruschi would play with a cast when he returns.

Rookie wide receiver Chad Jackson also returned to practice after missing most of training camp with a hamstring injury. He missed part of Thursday's session and was listed as questionable for Sunday's game. Tackle Nick Kaczur also was questionable with a shoulder injury.

Quarterback Tom Brady (shoulder), wide receiver Doug Gabriel (hamstring) and guard Stephen Neal (ankle) were listed as probable. Brady was listed as probable with a shoulder injury nearly all last season but played every game.

Siena, St. Bonaventure on tap for Minutemen

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team (3-0-1) will look to continue its best start in nine years today when the Minutemen host Siena (0-1-1) to kick off the UMass/Holy Cross Invitational, part of a five-game homestand.

Atlantic 10 rival St. Bonaventure (0-3) will visit the Crusaders later today, then on Sunday the Saints will take on Holy Cross, and the Minutemen will cap off the weekend against the Bonnies.

The Minutemen come into the weekend riding a four-game unbeaten streak that mirrors the six-game stretch that concluded the 2005 regular season. It is the best start to a season since the 1997 team started 4-0-1, and this year's start has earned the 2006 Minutemen national respect.

Wednesday, the National Soccer Coaches Association of America/ Adidas ranked UMass No.3 in the Mid-Atlantic Region. Fordham (3-0) and St. Louis (1-1-1) are Nos. 1 and 2, respectively, and Duquesne (2-0-1) is fourth, giving the A-10 the top four spots in the region. Rhode Island (1-1-1) is also ranked in the Top 10 of the Mid-Atlantic region.

UMass coach Sam Koch is happy with the strong start, and feels it will help build the confidence of a very young team.

"It's important to win every game," Koch said. "But does it help a young team [to win early]? Yes. We've already had to come from behind to win, and I think that shows a lot of character in our players."

Overall, play has been solid for the Minutemen, who have allowed just one goal in four games, a late score by Boston University in a double-overtime 1-1 tie.

The defense for the Maroon and White has been particularly dominant, squelching any offensive threats, which has helped sophomore goalkeeper Zack Simmons put up a 0.24 goals-against average and a .933 save percentage.

"He's been fantastic," Koch said. "He came up big for us this past weekend. He made some crucial saves."

Simmons posted two shutouts at the Navy Anders Classic, and was the unanimous MVP choice.

"The four players in front of him have been solid," Koch said. "The key to our success has been how well the front runners have descended [on defensive plays]."

On offense, redshirt sophomore Chris Brown scored his first career goal in the 1-0 victory against UMBC. Koch has praised the young defender before the season, and it is already becoming apparent why.

"On any given day, [Brown] can be one of the best backs in the area," Koch said.

However, he was quick to downplay the individual accomplishment.

"It's very important to the team that we get a full effort from everyone because it's about the team first," he continued. "It's good to see a full effort from [Brown]."

Another sophomore, midfielder Tony Bassett, is leading the team in scoring with two goals. His first came in the season

Redshirt sophomore goalkeeper Zack Simmons was named UMass Athlete of the Week after posting two shutouts last weekend at the Navy Anders Classic. He now has three shutouts on the year, and seven in his career.

Can UM beat the I-A odds this weekend?

Eric Athas

It's that question so many will ask, but few will be willing to answer: How do you think a I-AA program will fair against a I-A bowl contender?

Skittish fans of I-AA teams ask the question with a little tremor in their voices.

And while football gurus, fans, and coaches may think they have an answer, how do you really know?

As UMass prepares to take on Navy this Saturday in Annapolis, many fans are asking that question – comparing the numbers, glancing over the stats, flipping through a media guide or two.

Navy racked up 409 yards of offense in its 28-23 win over East Carolina last weekend. And the Minutemen handled Colgate last Saturday in a decisive 28-7 knockout defeat.

But when it comes down to it, stats and scores can only tell you so much. When two teams, separated by division, meet up on a field, you just never know.

Last weekend, other Atlantic 10 programs faced off against I-A teams, and the results were scattered.

Rhode Island was trounced on, 52-7, by UConn.

Richmond turned out a surprising 13-0 shutout of I-A Duke.

William and Mary had an impressive showing against Maryland, before falling 27-14.

Central Florida defeated Villanova by a margin of 35-16.

And Northeastern, no shocker here, got shutout by Virginia Tech., 38-0.

Outside of the A-10 conference, however, other I-AA teams humiliated some I-A programs.

Montana State beat Colorado 19-10, while Portland State edged New Mexico 17-6.

It has happened three times this year after one week.

Rudd Field is welcome sight

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

Rudd Field has been good to the Massachusetts men's soccer team in its four years on the UMass campus. Now in its fifth year, the state-of-the-art groundwork has given the Maroon and White much success.

The Minutemen are 23-11-4 all-time at Rudd Field, and are 3-0-2 in their last five games at home, including their 2-0 win over Maine in the first game of the 2006 campaign.

UMass has outscored its opponents 95-51 at home since Rudd Field opened in 2002. It has 11 shutouts there as well. UMass coach Sam Koch still found the need to downplay any advantages.

"It's one game at a time," Koch said on whether home field was really an advantage. "It's certainly better to play at home than it is on the road. But is it big? You have to play the games. I think it's great to be at home. It's certainly nice. But is it a huge advantage?

"I think sometimes the tough thing about our field is that the other teams coming in get excited playing here," he added. "So I think it's great playing at home, but I also think the other teams love coming in because it's one of the best fields in the league."

UMass begins its longest homestand (five games) today against Siena. The remaining opponents are St. Bonaventure, Hartford, Vermont, and New Hampshire.

Minutemen get recognition

The NSCAA/Adidas Regional Rankings say that UMass is now ranked third in the Mid-Atlantic Region. Among the Atlantic 10 teams that gained recognition in the poll are Fordham (1), Saint Louis (2), Duquesne (4), and Rhode Island (7)

Coming out party

Ofosu notched an insurance goal in the Minutemen's season opening 2-0 victory over Maine. Brown scored the lone goal in UMass' 1-0 win over UMBC last Sunday.

Hogan scored the go-ahead goal against Boston University in the second game of the year. However, the Terriers tied the game at 1-all just a minute later, giving UMass its first draw of the season.

"I was just hoping the ball would get there," Hogan said. "It's tough learning a new system with new players, but I think it's coming along pretty well. We're coming together as a group" . . . Ofosu was taken out of the game against BU due to a shoulder injury. "[Ofosu has] gotten a lot better," Koch said after practice on Wednesday. "Right now, he's 100 percent healthy. He'll certainly be ready to play this weekend.

"[His shoulder] might pop out, but we'll just glue it back in," Koch added. "That's pretty much what we've been doing. It's been popping out a lot, but it's not an issue. We've got it wrapped, but could it pop out again? Yes. Will it sometime during the season? Most likely. But does it hold him back? No. He just pops it back in and plays."

As it turns out, playing for the UMass soccer team requires more than just being able to kick a ball. The Minutemen were forced to take three separate vans to their game against BU nearly two weeks ago due to a bus cancellation . . . In case you did not drive by them on your way to Nickerson Field that Sunday afternoon, one of the vans broke down, only to have the players push the van to the side of the Massachusetts Turnpike while first-year athletic trainer Kristen Wilson navigated behind the wheel. "Initially, we were waiting for the bus, and it never showed up," freshman Bryan Hogan said. "Then we got to one of the tolls on the highway, and one of the vans broke down. We had to push it to the side of the highway, and everyone else had to pile into two vans."

"On the road, especially after having one van break down, and the bus not show up, I think a tie was a good result for us," Koch said on the 1-1 draw to BU. "Just to have two things happen that can take your focus off, our guys were great on being ready to play."

Minutewomen grab third straight win

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team (3-1-0) shut out the Hartford Hawks (1-4), 1-0, on Thursday night at Al-Marzook Field in West Hartford, Connecticut. The win extends the Minutewomen's winning streak to three games.

Next up for UMass is a home match on Sunday at 4 p.m. at Rudd Field against the Albany Great Danes. Albany had a disappointing season a year ago, finishing 1-18. But they have already matched that win total this year under new coach Mary-Frances Monroe.

The two clubs have not squared off since 2000, and UMass won that matchup, 3-0. Although Albany (1-4) has one victory this season, it has been outscored 16-3. Despite the rough start by Albany, UMass coach Jim Rudy refused to look past them.

"You have to take every opponent seriously and take one game at a time," Rudy said. "This team can't be taken lightly. They have a young team with a lot of speed that will prove to be dangerous on the counter-attack."

The win on Thursday against Hartford was the first shutout recorded this season by the Maroon and White. Junior goalie Kristin Walker stopped the few shots that came her way as the defense kept the ball out of the zone for most of the game.

The score by sophomore forward Britt Canfield is all that UMass needed.

In the 65th minute Canfield received a beautiful pass from junior teammate Melissa Toulouse who got the assist on the play.

The pass was placed perfectly down the right flank over everybody except Canfield, who sprinted past the defense for a one-on-one with the goalie.

Canfield's bomb in the left corner went right by Albany goalie Liz Cook for what proved to be the game-winner.

It was the second consecutive game Canfield has scored and Toulouse has had a helper. Rudy credited his teams win and improved play as the game progressed by adjusting its tactics in the second half.

"Hartford was a difficult opponent," Rudy said. "They put a great deal of pressure on us and played extremely physical. The field turf played fast and we adjusted to it by playing a longer game in the second half."

Walker has only allowed four goals this season while spending every minute in net for UMass. Walker recorded four saves and shut down the eight corner kicks that Albany had in the game. Rudy was more than pleased with her performance.

"Walker radiates confidence in net and that trickles down to the rest of the team," Rudy said. "She handled the pressure around the net with authority and held her composure. It's nice to see her get the shutout tonight."

In all, Rudy was just pleased to get out of Connecticut with the win.

"Our team was resilient tonight," Rudy said. "We played smart tactically. We fought hard tonight, but it wasn't pretty. Sometimes you just take the victory any way you can get it."

Sophomore midfielder Michael Connolly (No. 8) started 17 games as a freshman in 2005. He ranked second among true freshmen in minutes played.

Smith and Ginn eye Heisman Trophy

By Rusty Miller
Associated Press

COLUMBUS, Ohio – It's one thing to compete for the Heisman Trophy with someone a couple of time zones away. It's quite another when that other person is in the same locker room.

USC's Reggie Bush and Matt Leinart know what that's all about. Leinart won the Heisman two years ago, Bush last season.

Now, Troy Smith and Ted Ginn Jr. take their turn. And Bush has some advice for the two Ohio State stars, who could put their candidacies into overdrive with big games when the No. 1 Buckeyes play at No. 2 Texas on Saturday night.

"Matt and I weren't competing against each other," said Bush, now with the New Orleans Saints. "There was no animosity or anything like that. We were just two guys trying to win a championship."

Smith and Ginn – good friends and high school teammates in Cleveland – say all the Heisman talk is secondary to team goals and victories.

"It's cool," said Ginn, a lightning-quick junior wide receiver and kick returner. "But I'm not going to base my season on the Heisman. I'm going to base my season on playing hard for my seniors and trying to win the national championship."

Smith, the Buckeyes' big-play quarterback, denied there was a competition between the two.

"The funny thing about that is I feel that if Ted wins it, then I'll feel that I also won it. You know what I mean? And I hope, vice versa. Because you can't have one without the other," the fifth-year senior said. "He's my vote to win it because I really, really think he's the most exciting player in college football. He's the best college football player there is."

The two remain close and spend an inordinate amount of time together. They insist there's no jealousy. Still, coach Jim Tressel is keenly aware of how outside factors can divide a team. He's keeping an eye on how Smith and Ginn handle the pressure.

"You have to, for their sakes," Tressel said. "They've got to handle that hype. They have to make sure that it doesn't take over any of their thinking."

Teammates haven't noticed any changes in either player. Then again, neither seems to have a need to command the spotlight.

Smith is always careful to credit

MA senators make stop at UMass

Kennedy attends ground-breaking

By Derrick Perkins and Emily Reynolds

Sen. John Kerry speaks to students Sept. 8 at the UMass Campus Center Auditorium about the importance of grassroots campaigning.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (right) and UMass Chancellor John Lombardi break ground on the new $92.7 million Integrated Science Building.

Equipped with shovels and hardhats, politicians and administrators, including Sen. Edward Kennedy, took part in a groundbreaking ceremony at the University of Massachusetts on Friday for the new $92.7 million Integrated Science Building.

Along with Kennedy in attendance were UMass President Jack Wilson, Chancellor John Lombardi, Congressmen John Olver and Richard Neal and Ellen Story, the state representative for the towns of Amherst and Granby.

Kennedy highlighted the overall impact the new construction would have on the region. The research done in the new building would attract technology companies from eastern Massachusetts, according to Kennedy. Kennedy called the building a "strategic investment" designed to encourage "companies to look down the [Mass] Pike."

The new building is critical to the economic future of the state, allowing the region to "tap into the extraordinary research revolution," said Kennedy.

Olver added that the building would "enhance the workforce in the state and the region."

The Integrated Science Building, designed to facilitate the collaboration between chemical, physical and life sciences, will become, "the cornerstone of science education on campus," according to Lombardi.

Complete with a 300-seat auditorium, 85-seat classroom, computer resource center, science labs and an entire floor dedicated to research, the Integrated Science Building "demonstrates the University's commitment to research and teaching," according to Olver.

Dr. John Armstrong, a member of the UMass Board of Trustees, added that for the campus, "the building will improve the work and study conditions."

The site of the building, located on Stockbridge Road where the Marshall Annex once was, was selected to allow for future expansion of the structure. Overall, the building is expected to provide 155,000 square feet of space, while allowing for 40,000 square feet of existing teaching space on campus to be freed up.

Construction of the building, according to the UMass Campus Planning Web site, is expected to finish in the fall of 2008.

The building is part of a $2.1 billion project over five years for UMass. Twenty-two percent of the funds for the project will come from the state, while the other 78 percent will come from UMass. The University will collect its portion of the funds from grants, fees, private companies and donations, according to Lombardi.

"This building will transform the way we teach science," said Dr. George Langford, Dean of the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics, in his remarks to the audience during the cer-

Kerry rallies young voters

After removing his jacket to accommodate the informal setting, Sen. John Kerry abandoned the stage for more personal interaction with the over 400 students who showed up last Friday at the Campus Center auditorium at the University of Massachusetts.

The rally touched on voter registration and volunteering for the Democratic Party including the Victory '06 campaign, which focuses on electing a democratic governor in Massachusetts and the political conquest of the legislative branch across the nation.

"There is nothing that equals the power of people who start organizing and going out and knocking on doors, talking to their neighbors and breaking through the apathy, getting people to understand you have to connect the dots," Kerry said. "We have too many people in America who vote against their own interests."

Kerry also spoke of the current administration's handling of the Iraq war and issues that have caused great public distrust within the young voter category.

"We've been misled on global pocket change, misled on public healthcare, misled on what's happening in education, misled on a tax structure that's unfair to the average American while it gives unbelievable breaks to the wealthiest people in the country and misled above all on a war on terror which is not in Iraq; it is everywhere else," Kerry said.

There was also mention of media rumors which have accused the Democratic Party's grassroots campaigning as being based on mudslinging instead of genuine ideas to fix problems like the national debt and the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq.

Sen. Kerry was adamant about the lack of Democratic ideas being put into play due to a shortage of influence, something he urged be fixed in the September and November elections.

At the end of his speech, Sen. Kerry opened up the floor for questions, during which an audience member mentioned the lack

Students look back at 9/11 tower attacks

By Caitlin Quinn
Collegian Correspondent

September 11, 2001 is more than just a date to the students of the University of Massachusetts. It is a trigger that propels them back into vivid memories of one of the most tragic acts of terrorism in American history.

Five years after the attack, students at UMass are remembering 9/11, and recounting how that day changed their lives.

Nafias Jiddawi, a sophomore at UMass, was a freshman in high school when she found out airplanes had crashed into the Twin Towers in New York City, as well as the Pentagon in Washington, D.C. and a field in Pennsylvania. Jiddawi recalls her teacher running out of the classroom and then moving the class to a room to watch the live coverage on television.

"At first I didn't think it was real," said Jiddawi. "When reality set in I was really shocked."

Emily Love, a freshmen, had a similar initial reaction. Love, who was in eighth grade at the time, first became aware of the event when she overheard other students discussing rumors of an attack in the hallway.

"I thought that they were talking about a video game," she recalled.

"When all the televisions in the school came on, the images looked like a crude Hollywood film."

UMass freshman, Jill Furman was not informed of the events by her middle school. She had to travel to a nearby Catholic high school to find out the news. She remembered hearing an announcement over the loudspeaker asking students to say a prayer.

The day was even more intense for UMass senior, Tim Murphy, who was attending high school in Flushing, N.Y. during the attack.

"Ironically, I was sitting in my 'History of New York City' class, when the teacher came in and said one of the Twin Towers had been hit by a plane," said Murphy.

He said he remembers the hallway of his school erupting in chaos.

"People were running around like headless chickens," Murphy said. "Someone told me you could see the towers from an upstairs lab room. I ran upstairs and witnessed it all with my own eyes."

Murphy said he remembers when the first tower collapsed.

"I knelt down on the floor and covered my eyes," Murphy said. "I needed a moment to collect my thoughts. When America suffered the worst terrorist attack in its history yesterday morning when a trio of hijacked commercial aircraft was crashed into three nationally recognized buildings in New York City and Washington D.C.

The World Trade Center's Twin Towers were both leveled and a portion of the Pentagon was destroyed by the attacks, which began shortly before 9 a.m. and concluded roughly an hour later. A count of casualties from the incidents has yet to be determined, though officials have speculated that tens of thousands of people may have perished in the attacks.

"I have a sense it's a horrendous number of lives lost," said New York City Major Rudolph Giuliani. Reporters have stated that upwards of 50,000 people were in the towers on a daily basis, while New York City officials have reported at least 78 police officers missing and 200 firefighters presumed dead in the aftermath of the attacks.

The incident began at approximately 8:45 a.m. when American Airlines Flight 11, originally routed from Boston to Los Angeles, struck the northern tower of the Trade Center. The Boeing 767 was reportedly carrying 88 passengers and an 11-person crew when it took off from Logan Airport.

A second plane, identified as United Airlines Flight 175, collided with the Trade Center's southern tower roughly 19 minutes later. That plane, also a 767 and also routed from Boston to L.A., has been reported by the airline as carrying 56 passengers and a nine-person crew.

Both 11-story towers collapsed within roughly 90 minutes of the initial crashes. There were reportedly explosions from within the buildings before the final collapse, though there has been no confirmation yet of their cause.

A third hijacked aircraft, identified as American Flight 77 from Washington Dulles to L.A., crashed into the Pentagon at around 9:38 a.m. That 757 was listed as carrying 58 passengers and a six-person crew, and is reported to have crashed into the Army Command Center portion of the Pentagon. As of 6:00 p.m., over 30 casualties from that attack have been admitted to hospitals in Washington D.C. and northern Virginia.

A fourth hijacked plane, United Flight 93 from Newark to San Francisco, crashed in a rural area of Pennsylvania about 80 miles south of Pittsburgh. Thirty-eight passengers and a seven-person crew were reportedly aboard that 757. It is suspected that Flight 93 was headed toward the presidential retreat at Camp David. Officials have listed no survivors from that crash.

President George W. Bush curtailed an education trip in Florida upon hearing news of the attacks, flying under military fighter escort to Barksdale air Force Base in Louisiana. There, the President announced the U.S. military had been placed on "high-alert status" in the wake of the incident.

The president then reportedly flew on to Offutt Air Force Base in Nebraska, where the nation's Strategic Air Command Headquarters is located, to convene an emergency session of the National Security Council. In an address to the nation some five hours later, Bush assured the American public that an act meant to "frighten our nation into chaos and retreat" will only serve to further unite it.

"Terrorist attacks can shake the foundations of our biggest buildings, but they cannot touch the foundation of America," Bush said. "These acts shatter steel, but they cannot damage the steel of American resolve."

He added that the United States would treat the terrorists and those that harbor them on equal terms. Pundits have suggested that Bush was making a veiled threat at Afghanistan. The Islamic nation has previously hidden Osama bin Laden, a noted anti-American and a possible suspect in yesterday's terrorist attacks.

Retaliatory action was thought to have occurred less than nine hours later, when explosions were reported in the Afghan capital of Kabul. Subsequent wire reports reported that the U.S. military has denied any domestic link to the explosions.

"In no way is the United States government connected to those explosions," Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said in a statement. Revolutionary groups within Afghanistan later claimed responsibility for the helicopter attacks.

World leaders joined Bush in his denunciation of terrorism. Britain's Tony Blair said, "as for those that carried out these attacks, there can no adequate words of condemnation. Their barbarism will stand as their shame for all eternity."

"France has just learned of these monstrous attacks – there is no other word for it," French President Jacques Chirac said. German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder conveyed his own national security council, as unprecedented act.

The attacks on both Pentagon and Washington D.C. were preempted by cellular phone distress calls from passengers on board the two hijacked planes. A man allegedly called an emony. According to Langford, the class of 2010 will be the first class to utilize the building.

Robert Mahoney, UMass alumnus and trustee, was credited for beginning the project with a contribution of $2 million in 2003, along with his brother Richard, a fellow UMass alumnus. Mahoney said the project was "11 years in the making."

Planning for the building began in 1995 between Mahoney and a few members of the UMass faculty to bring together the Biology and Chemistry Departments for mutual cooperation and research. In 1995, "these departments did not know each other," Mahoney said.

"Aspiring scientists flock to universities," Neal said, also citing the economic strength the building would bring to Western Massachusetts, as well as its advantages for the University. Bay State Medical Center, another major contributor of funds to the project, is expected to continue its partnership with UMass with the research done in the Integrated Science Building. According to Neal, BSMC and UMass are the top two employers in Western Massachusetts.

Armstrong concluded by saying there is "no more rewarding cause that we could be engaged in than to create better opportunities for the commonwealth."

Kennedy called the new UMass science building a "strategic investment" designed to encourage "companies to look down the [Mass] Pike."

I looked out the window again, one of the towers had vanished."

"The stench of the debris was so thick, you could chew it," says Murphy. As for the people he saw around him, he describes, "You've never seen faces so expressionless in your life. It was as if they were staring at nothing."

Tim Murphy's personal connection didn't end there. His brother's best friend lost his father that day. Lieutenant Raymond Murphy of the Bronx went missing after the planes crashed into the World Trade Center.

"It was the worst night of my life," said Murphy. "I couldn't sleep because my older brother was crying so loud throughout the entire night."

The Lieutenant's body was later recovered from Ground Zero.

UMass students also remember the mass amount of media coverage surrounding the September 11th attacks.

Freshman Nick Di Bella said, in regards to the graphic material shown on television: "They didn't have a choice. It's something people needed to see."

Nafisa Jiddawi remembers when the media began singling out Muslims.

"I'm Muslim, and it really hurt me. Everybody was looking at Muslims like they were the enemies…it increased racism," He said.

"Flight 93" and "World Trade Center" are two movies about the attacks that have since been released in theaters. "I refuse to see World Trade Center. I am appalled. The events are too fresh in people's memories," Murphy said.

Like Murphy, freshman Mala Marken, who has seen the movie feels that it didn't rightfully portray the heart of the events. Others, like Jill Furman, believe that viewing the movies are strictly up to personal choice.

Personal safety is now an issue that UMass students have reconsidered since the attacks. Love and Di Bella feel safe in Amherst because of their distance from large cities, while Jiddawi feels "the government is under control."

"I don't allow myself to feel unsafe, because then they've won," said Murphy. "You can't live in fear."

The lives of UMass students have been changed forever by this national catastrophe. Murphy was inspired by the firemen and police officers who showed heroism at Ground Zero in New York, but he's taking the matter a step further.

"I'm seriously considering becoming a firefighter," He said. "I see the camaraderie that the FDNY has, and it attracts me. You can't put a price on that."

Some UMass students were unaware of the fifth anniversary of the September 11th attacks, but others, like Love, are planning to pray in church in memory of those who lost their lives. Also in remembrance, The Center for Student Development and the Office of Student Affairs and Campus Life will be showing "Flight 93."

emergency operator from a bathroom aboard Flight 93 and repeatedly said "we are being hijacked" shortly before the plane crashed in Pennsylvania.

Former federal prosecutor and conservative, political commentator Barbara Olson reportedly called her husband, U.S. Solicitor General Ted Olson, on a cell phone from Flight 77 and said: "Can you believe this… we are being hijacked" prior to the plane's crash into the Pentagon.

Collateral damage in New York City has been extensive. Ten thousand rescue personnel rushed to the scene as buildings within and surrounding the Trade Center network caught fire. One of those, a 47-story structure designated "Trade Center Building Seven," collapsed shortly after 5:30 p.m.

The nation's oldest public health care facility, Manhattan's Bellevue Hospital, has been designated 'command central' for the N.Y.C. relief efforts. The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) have enacted massive efforts to import emergency service personnel and medical supplies into the disaster area.

All manner of transit away from Manhattan Island was temporarily stalled in the wake of the incident. The New York Port Authority initially closed all bridges and tunnels leading into and out of the city, though the outbound lanes of most major bridges have since been reopened. Mass transit has also resumed after a several-hour lapse in service.

Nationally, the Federal Aviation Administration shut down all airports in the U.S. just before 10 a.m. and routed international flights bound for New York to Canada.

Yesterday's attacks are not the first waged against the World Trade Center, which was targeted by terrorists in a much less intricate plot in February of 1993. That incident resulted in a single blast that killed six people, injured over 1,000 more and caused millions of dollars in structural damage to the center.

Justice was meted out swiftly in that instance, as the trio of Ramzi Yousef, Mahmud Abouhalima and Mohammad Salameh was arrested and convicted. Salameh was nabbed while trying to return the group's getaway van to a Ryder office in Jersey City, NJ.

SGA President Mendez calls for UMass students to register of democratic governors in the state despite its high percentage of politically Liberal adults eligible to vote.

According to Sidnie Davis, the Campaigns Coordinator at Smith College, the Democratic Party has a chance at reclaiming its former political influence but must present a more united front to achieve its goals.

"I don't want to be divisive, we are still going to win because of college students and because we [the Democratic Party] are right, but we need to be more focused," Davis said.

Student Government Association president Elvis Mendez, who introduced Sen. Kerry, spoke of the high percentage rates of college students who protest new features on social networking sites like Facebook, yet have either never registered or never voted.

"It takes as much time to register for Facebook as it does to register to vote," Mendez said.

The rising cost of secondary education also played a part in Friday's rally, as it has become a concern among students like Mendez who distrust the University's financial policies, which have closed what Kerry called, "the doors of opportunity."

"We have a group of CEOs and business leaders running the University, and yet, we ask why institutions like this one act more like businesses than schools," Mendez said.

Issues like the high cost of education are being used to urge the younger demographic of eligible voters to register and show up at the polls this September. For the first time in UMass history, voting stations will be located on campus to facilitate and encourage a higher voter turnout.

"We have to reclaim for everybody the responsibilities of citizenship," Sen. Kerry said. "There is no more important word and there is no more important obligation that any of you can exercise [than voting]."

Sen. John Kerry, while speaking at the University of Massachusetts, addressed the current administration's handling of the Iraq war and issues that have caused great public distrust within the young voter category.

Cracking down or cracking up?

Kevin Dooley

The terrorists have won. Now how can an American like me utter such words? I'll tell you how I can, and it's not that difficult to understand.

In the wake of September 11th, our wonderful Vice President Dick Cheney said that another September 11th style attack on the U.S. was inevitable. Never has a man reassured people like Cheney did on that day.

When comments like this are made, the terrorists have executed their jobs to perfection. They don't have to blow up a car in Manhattan every other day to be doing their jobs. As long as every time someone goes into a subway thinking that an underground attack is possible, we are living in fear, and fear is what a terrorist strives for.

During the summer, a tragedy was prevented when London police were able to prevent a large-scale attack by terrorists who were looking to blow up at least three London planes in midair between Britain and the United States. After the attack was thwarted, it was suspected that the terrorists could have ignited a bottle of shampoo or a bottle of baby formula to blow up the planes. As a result, no longer can we carry onto a plane any concealed liquids.

What kind of way of life is this supposed to be? We're now supposed to feel safer because airport officials are cracking down on grandma bringing hairspray on the plane? Give me a break. We can crack down on everything from toe clippers to Boy Scout switchblade knives, but it's not going to win the war on terror.

Just so we're clear, the war on terror has now become a big joke. You can't wage a war against a concept or a way of social thought. You don't make matters any better when you invade the country and then insert a puppet government that promotes democracy but hasn't figured out how to feed their citizens or keep them safe.

Fact of the matter is, and I'm not revealing anything new here, 9/11 was a result of the U.S. government and other western democracies constantly sticking their heads in the affairs of nations in the Middle East. Not to mention full-pledged support for Israel.

For some people (President Bush) to say that the terrorists and ideological dictators, like the one in Iran, are freedom haters and evildoers is um, stupid. No one is born a freedom hater or evildoer. Something must have to happen to make these people so bitter and so ruthless to take the lives of thousands and their own. Obviously, they're intent on making a point.

So, instead of waging a war that will never end – read George Orwell's "1984" and you'll know what I'm talking about – how about we try to get to the root causes of why some, in the name of a God who lives up in the sky, kill innocent people.

The answer is not difficult to figure out. In fact, the answer lies right below us, and it's oil.

As much as we like to imagine oil is an infinite resource, it will one day run out, and we might have to get accustomed to a very different lifestyle unless we find an alternative energy resource. It won't be easy, but it is necessary. According to the Electronic Green Journal, the peak of world oil production will be reached by at least 2020. After that, oil will be an increasingly declining product, but we will have an increasing demand. That is not good news.

Forget the war on terror, it should be called the war on oil. Oil has been the official drug of the United States, and the people (not the governments) of the Middle East have been victims of its cruel side effects since it was found in commercial amounts. Ever since then, the people of the Middle East have been pawns in a strategic game of chess by imperial nations hungry for a fix.

The addiction to oil has forced this nation to have to constantly stick our heads in the Middle East in order to lay claim to its buried treasure. Unfortunately, the quest to gobble up that buried treasure has built up so much resentment in the region that we are now at the mercy of an oppressed people who have turned to religion as a means of escape.

The solution to this problem is to put money into getting the brightest people (not me) who can work together to develop technology that will one day have the potential to harness alternative energy sources, such as solar and wind power. That money right now is being used to fight a useless war in Iraq that has devastated the nation to no end and has left thousands of Americans and Iraqis dead in the name of freedom.

A good friend once told me the situation in the Middle East is like stretching a rubber band. If we (the United States) keep extending the rubber band into the Middle East, it's eventually going to snap back and hurt, a lot. That should be enough reason to begin the war on oil.

Honoring those lost

Greg Collins

How should Americans honor Sept. 11th, a horrific day in United States history? This important question became relevant recently in Amherst after a local businessman, Larry Kelley, issued a proposal to the town Select Board to fly 29 American flags in Amherst center to commemorate the lives of those who perished that day (Kelley has also made this request in previous years).

One year ago, the Board rejected Kelley's proposal. Instead it complied with President Bush's order to fly the Stars and Stripes at half mast in honor of Hurricane Katrina victims and the deceased Supreme Court Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

According to the Daily Hampshire Gazette, the Select Board, with different members, approved flying the commemorative flags from 2001 through 2003.

The controversy started when Rod Raubeson, Amherst's Veteran Agent and former Marine, placed 29 commemorative flags, bought by taxpayer funds, on public utility poles in August of 2001 without consent from local town officials.

Undoubtedly the man should have obtained authorization from Amherst administrators before displaying the flags in public areas, since, as the town manager at the time of the controversy noted, the Select Board has jurisdiction over public property. Evidently, the Board decided to take down the flags the day before the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The resurgence of American patriotism following Sept. 11th led to increased sales and displays of American flags, evidenced by the rapid ascension of sales of flags at Wal-Mart and other retail stores, and the playing of "God Bless America" during the seventh inning stretches of Major League Baseball games. Amherst itself displays American flags in the town center, as well as the local police and fire stations, throughout the whole year.

But the explanations given by Select Board members and local residents who argued against flying the additional flags, which can be viewed on youtube.com (keyword search "Amherst" and "American flags"), seem to be an incoherent mix of justifications for not flying them.

For instance, Anne Awad, the Board chairwoman, said, "There are many dates when our citizens have suffered," reasoning that flying the flags would set a precedent for additional cases of flying the Stars and Stripes. Precisely because there are many dates in which American citizens have shown courage in the face of suffering is sufficient enough reason to exhibit, on occasion, symbols of American ideals of liberty and virtue. There are few days so emotionally resonant in the minds of American citizens than Sept. 11th, such that it's wrong to claim that flying 29 commemorative flags is brazenly nationalistic or that it would create a precedent.

Precisely because there are many dates in which American citizens have shown courage in the face of suffering is sufficient enough reason to exhibit, on occasion, symbols of American ideals of liberty and virtue.

Other debaters against the proposal noted the demerits of American foreign and domestic policy. While vigorous debate of American foreign policy is consistent with democratic traditions, there are better times to engage in such a discussion than during consideration of a proposal concerned primarily with commemorating American courage and patriotism.

Of course patriotism can be exploited to justify the actions of one's own country, whether they are inherently good or bad. For instance, calling someone unpatriotic for offering alternative viewpoints to President Bush's foreign policy should be condemned.

But just as blind patriotism is reprehensible, so is blind dissent for dissent's sake. To me there is a clear line between 1.) Responsible criticism of the current administration and 2.) Properly honoring Americans who perished and Americans who performed acts of heroism and bravery on Sept. 11th.

That being said, the Select Board decision was baffling, to say the least. If the controversy was a debate over public safety or zoning restrictions, then there would be a legitimate argument to limit the display of American flags.

Judging by the comments made by the opposition of the proposal, this was not the case. Perhaps the Select Board members would have come to a different conclusion if they had lost a loved one on Sept. 11th or knew a firefighter or police officer responsible for the safety of American citizens in its immediate aftermath.

In essence, denouncing the Select Board members for refusing to pass the initiative calls into question not their patriotism but their judgment. The Select Board decision epitomized the personal agenda of certain people to allow feelings about American foreign policy trump recognition of bravery, suffering, and the willingness to die for a cause greater than oneself. Such commemoration would have sent the message that all Americans should live for a purpose which transcends personal satisfaction of one's own existence.

STRATEGIC TERRORISM

In Mr. Freeman's Thursday editorial he stated that, "With the horrific exception of September 11, the United States is mostly untouched by Islamic terrorism." I would like to remind Mr. Freeman, and the rest of the student body here at UMass, that September 11th was not an isolated event. It was a bold exclamation point on a long list of other horrific terrorist attacks aimed at hurting this great nation.

There was the U.S.S. Cole which killed 17 sailors. There were the embassy bombings in 1998 which killed 22 Americans. There was Pan Am 103 in 1988, 189 Americans were killed. In 1983 the Marine barracks in Beirut was bombed, resulting in the death of 241 United States Marines.

These, and many other terrorist attacks that Mr. Freeman seems to ignore, are not isolated events. In the future I would appreciate that you please give the victims of these terrorist attacks the respect that they deserve.

REMEMBERING WHERE YOU WERE

Five years ago, today was a Tuesday, the first Tuesday of my freshmen year in college. Classes at the University of Massachusetts had begun, as they always do, the Wednesday following Labor Day. That morning, my only class was a discussion section for Physics 171. I had no homework yet; I felt sleeping late would be a better use of my Tuesday morning.

I didn't wake until after the first tower collapsed. I woke when my then-roommate returned to our room and the sound of the latch stirred me. I rolled over and said "hey." He looked up at me and matter-of-factly remarked, "They blew up the World Trade Center."

I shot up in the top bunk and shrieked for an explanation. He had none. I jumped from the top bunk and fell into my desk chair. I was desperate for news. We didn't have a television and the Internet connection serving UMass was too congested for CNN.com to fill my laptop's screen.

I dressed frantically into pants and a t-shirt and headed into the hallway of Washington's 17th floor to find someone with a TV. I cut through the lounge and saw an open door with several of my floormates sitting on the bottom mattress of a bunk bed staring wide-eyed ahead. I joined them.

They'd seen the plane hit the South Tower. They'd seen that tower collapse. I was there, mouth gaping, stammering for an explanation when the North Tower began to crumble. We tried to make sense of this, the reports of planes crashing in fields in Pennsylvania and the Pentagon, one heading for the White House or the Capitol.

My parents called at some point. My roommate fetched me. We talked for only a few moments. I had thought my dad might be on one of those planes out of Boston, but he had flown the day before. We were lucky. I went back to Jared's room and cable news.

That evening there was a vigil on the lawn in front of the Student Union next to the Campus Pond. The Old Chapel's bells tolled, professors and student leaders spoke, candles were lit. We carried them back to Southwest, and the pyramids there became an impromptu shrine.

For weeks, I remember, candles were lit and placed on the pyramids as they were slowly entombed in wax. I think we sang "God Bless America," but I could be wrong; there was a sharp breeze and the candles were relit over and over.

The campus was brought together by grief and shock; what stands out, five years on, are not memories of angry statements but those of feelings of despair and helplessness, as well as earnest hopes for peace and justice. It has been said frequently that the world changed on that Tuesday. I don't know.

There were people that hated the United States on September 10, 2001, and there are people that hate the United States today. There were people who practiced terrorism, some of whom were Islamists, then, just as there are now.

Our perceptions changed. We went to war twice, and whether you agree with it or not, the War in Iraq was made possible that Tuesday. For many, it marked the beginning of their adult life and the beginning of their university careers. For us, for our generation, it will be our indelible moment.

Our parents had Kennedy's assassination. Those a few years older then us had the Space Shuttle Challenger disaster or perhaps the crumbling of the Berlin Wall. For us it will be September 11th. The day, our reactions and its consequences will be with us for the life of our generation, perhaps for many generations to follow.

So, where were you on 9/11? I was at UMass, sleeping and skipping school on my first Tuesday there, and watching in horror as the war on terror began.

Constructive profiling

Alex Maslow

After September 11th, 2001, an Arabian man and his store were attacked. His attackers thought he was Arab. This is one of those situations where "sorry" just doesn't cut it, and it isn't the only one in our history. To make matters worse, he wasn't even an Arab. He was Indian. From the 1500s to the 1800s, Africans were enslaved on plantations. In the 1770s, anyone who remained loyal to the Crown was run out of the country. In the 1940s Japanese citizens were placed in internment camps, and let's not even get into the Native Americans.

We, as a country, do not have a good record of dealing with foreigners. Understandably, we are cautious not to make the same mistakes twice, but is it possible to go too far? Is it possible to look out for the little guy so much that the country paralyzes itself entirely? Democracy is often described as inherently having one hand tied behind its back – must we also tie our shoelaces together?

The attacks on September 11th, 2001, were carried out by 19 hijackers. They were all male, Arabian, Islamic fundamentalists with one-way tickets and little, if any, luggage. We can narrow this down to five criteria: Male, Arab, Islamic fundamentalist, one-way ticket and little if any luggage. It is, therefore, a logical step to believe that the more of these criteria a person fulfills, the more likely they are to be a terrorist. No, I'll take that a step further: It is irresponsible to find someone who fits the description and not be suspicious of them.

You might say this is stereotyping. I would agree. Here we come to the heart of the debate: Is it ever Ok to stereotype? The first reaction to this question is generally so immediate it is like an instinct, an instinct that screams no. This begs the question, "why not?" The answer is, usually, "because it is politically incorrect," but consider the following:

We have grown up in a stranglehold world. A world where you might be politically incorrect to call someone a female because, despite having breasts and long hair, they actually associate themselves as males. We have been taught to call anyone who looks black an African American, when they may not be African (or American, for that matter).

If we are to say, as a whole, that it is reasonable to place Arabs as a higher security priority, we need to, individually, as ourselves, what if it was us?

Jamaicans are black, but since when was Jamaica part of Africa? And all Whites being Caucasian? Caucasia is the geographical region otherwise known as Eurasia and North Africa. I'm British. I'm pretty sure Britain isn't in Eurasia.

Keeping our criteria in mind, presume you are a security guard in an airport. If you saw a family of Asians with two-way tickets and two bags per person, it would be ridiculous to believe them to be a threat. Conversely, if you saw a group of three Arabian males in Muslim religious-wear with one-way tickets and two bags between them, it would be ridiculous to let them go without further investigation.

While it may appear on the surface as if I am condoning racism, I am not. There is a very distinct difference between bigoted racism and what I will call constructive profiling. If a crime is committed in a town, and it is reported that the culprit was a white male with a mustache and red hair, who would claim it reasonable to arrest a black male with a mustache and bleached hair, or an Asian male with no facial hair and black hair, or a white male with a beard and red hair? Who would claim it reasonable to arrest every white male with a mustache and red hair? Clearly there must be some balance between the extremes.

As a nation, we need to have standards. Further, as individuals, we need to be willing to keep those standards. If we are to say, as a whole, that it is reasonable to place Arabs as a higher security priority, we need to individually ask ourselves, what if it was us? For myself, while I would never thoroughly like it, if Jews had carried out the 9/11 attacks, I would understand the national need to place Jews as a higher security priority.

I'm not saying every Muslim is a terrorist, nor am I saying every terrorist is a Muslim. I am, however, extremely confident in saying that we can use these criteria to responsibly raise or lower our level of suspicion. There is a difference between higher security priority and an infringement on civil liberties.

If every Arab is subjected to a body cavity search just because they are Arab, then that is of course wrong. But if every Arab donning Muslim religious-wear with a one-way ticket cross country is subjected to slightly more questioning, I believe that is reasonable. Subjecting Granny Bessie and her seeing-eye dog to the same security procedure as an Arab with a one-way ticket and no bags is not politically correct, it's national suicide.

A pre-show sit down with Saget

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau, Alex Butler and Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

When talking to Bob Saget it's hard to believe you are not talking to his former television alter ego Danny Tanner. That is until he drops the f-bomb, and instantly, the clean-cut Tanner is gone and the real Saget appears before your eyes.

He's battled the clean-cut, house dad image of the ABC family sitcom "Full House" since it first aired in 1987. On top of that, Saget's corny humor on "America's Funniest Home Videos" situated him as a wholesome family comedian, but once Saget said goodbye to both shows, he exposed the darker side of his comedy – raunchy humor.

In an interview with the Collegian prior to his performance at Curry Hicks Cage Friday night, Bob Saget opened up.

"Stand-up gives you a rush like nothing else. It's nothing but fun," said Saget, who says he feels he is welcomed by a college audience like UMass.

"I think that's one of the reasons people like me, because I appreciate that we have great, amazing young people," said Saget.

Saget is a father to three teenage daughters, and when asked about how they respond to his lewd comedy routine he danced around the answer.

"They are supportive," he said, but it was clear he wanted to keep his comedy and real life separate. Of course, no one wants their daughters to honestly believe they are milestones in the raunchy comedy business.

Saget's risqué style of humor was arguably best depicted in the 2005 film "The Aristocrats," in which he tells the infamous dirty joke of the same name. He admits the joke is so risky that when he tells it at stand-up shows he usually loses 90 percent of laughs in the room. Needless to say, he told it Friday night.

"It depends on the audience. If I look down from the stage and see a 10-year-old kid sitting there, I'm going to clean it up a little bit. I mean, I won't start talking about his mom's fies, because – well, because he shouldn't be having thoughts like that about his mom, anyway."

But going out on a limb is what fills the seats, particularly if it's a college-aged audience. College venues are now his forte, or so his tour schedule says. He was right at home with the depraved

In his trailer before the show on Friday night Bob sits down with the Collegian Arts and Living editors to discuss his comedy and career.

An estimated 3,500 students greeted Saget's comedy show "This Ain't Full House" at the Curry Hicks Cage on Friday night. The comedian's R rated animated film "Farce of the Penguins" is soon to be released.

humor of the average male college student who has daily doses of "Family Guy" and "Opie and Anthony."

This might account for why "This Ain't Full House" sold out the Curry Hicks Cage on Friday night and packed hordes of excited students chanting, "Saget, Saget."

As these chants radiated through the Cage and into Saget's trailer, the comedian could only sit back and say, "I'd love to go out drinking with everyone here tonight, but I don't want to get half the campus pregnant. It's a joke."

Young people eat up a chance to hear a 50-year-old Danny Tanner – who we thought we knew so well – spewing a rainbow of profanity and talking about Uncle Jesse's pubic hair, or lack there of.

Somewhere in the middle he grabbed a guitar and toyed around with it, swearing like a belligerent child, as he said with the audience as his Ritalin. He was just too excited to be up there, it seemed, and his act was all over the place. He would start a story that wouldn't draw to a close for another 40 minutes, or so. Tangents were a-plenty Friday night, and Bob Saget was dishing them out like a crazed porn-addict. He intermittently named off some of the Internet's most heinous adult Web sites; this was where male humor took over.

The manner of his stand-up is simple: swear constantly, be blunt and to the point and be quick about it. But what is most important is not the message, but the confidence in which it is delivered. Anyone can try it and fail miserably, but Bob Saget knows he is Bob Saget, and he is confident in every sense of the word. As we all saw Friday night, it is hard to stop a man who thinks he is The Man. It's like try ing to talk to a Republican about empowering women in society. It is impossible.

Friday's stand-up routine also consisted of UMass students screaming

> "I was interested in acting but never thought I'd be good. But I worked for free six years at The Comedy Store, and got to meet and become friends with some of the best comedians."

it. Saget said. "I made all the cliche effects and showed them off. It was like 'America's Funniest Home Videos.'"

He went on to study film at Temple University, where he won a Student Academy Award for a documentary he made in 1977 titled "Through Adam's Eyes." After college Saget went to work at the Comedy Store in Los Angeles, where he met some of the most successful comedians in history, including Rodney Dangerfield, Richard Pryor and Robin Williams.

"I was interested in acting but never thought I'd be good," said Saget. "But I worked for free six years at The Comedy Store, and got to meet and become friends with some of the best comedians."

In the 1980s the comedian turned to acting, and because of the popularity of his stand-up he gained roles in television shows, like "Bosom Buddies." He also had a small role in Richard Pryor's 1987 movie, "Critical Condition."

"I'd land small roles in television shows, but at the end I'd be edited out, and the credits would still say 'guest Bob Saget' at the end," Saget joked.

But it's the role in "Full House's" as Danny Tanner that made the difference in his career. Saget said it was just a matter of good timing that he was cast in "Full House" because the guy they had originally cast was recently fired, and they wanted him to shoot the pilot. He didn't expect the show to run eight years.

With his success in "Full House" ABC offered him the role of the host of "America's Funniest Home Videos" and Saget accepted. Later on his dad jobs would make him the first person in television history to have two top rated shows in the same week.

Since leaving his role as the host of "Home Videos" and the ending of "Full House," Saget has remained busy with directing, playing small roles in movies and doing stand-up. He has also tried having his own show again called "Raising Dad," but it did not last more than one season. In the meantime, he's in the process of putting up his own Web site.

"My Web site is going to be www.thebobsaget.com. The woman who owns www.bobsaget.com wants $10,000 for her domain, and I refuse to give it to her," he said.

Look for him later this fall, as he will be returning to television as host of NBC's new game show "1 vs. 100."

"The show has been on Europe, but now we are bringing it to America. It's kind of like 'Hollywood Squares' but its one person answering against 100," he said. "It's Hollywood squares with diarrhea."

Man Man to exorcise demons in Noho

By Allen Hornbeck

White tennis outfits, face paint, sweatbands and rather dramatic facial hair. A lesser rock band might use these things to distract the audience from weak stage presence or lack of musical skill. With Man Man's live show, though, it's no gimmick. These guys can play, and they know it. On Wednesday night they're bringing their wholly unusual act to Pearl Street Night Club.

Sept. 13

Man Man's sound is routinely compared to that of Tom Waits, Captain Beefheart, and Frank Zappa. It's true, front man Honus Honus' gravelly bark is sometimes reminiscent of that of Waits, the instrumental arrangements occasionally hearken back to those of Beefheart's band and the often nonsensical lyrics rival some of Zappa's best. But the music here is inarguably unique and Man Man's own. The greatest link between the group and Waits, Beefheart and Zappa lies not in the occasional common musical sound but in a shared intense creativity.

The band hails from Philadelphia, and since their debut album "The Man in a Blue Turban with a Face" arrived in 2004, the group has gone through an almost complete lineup change, save for Honus Honus. The other musicians now include Alejandro "Cougar" Bjorg (stage named by the band as "Evolutionary Theorist"), Sergei Sogay ("Correlated Corrections"), Chang Wang ("Quesadilla Special") and Pow Pow ("Thunderous Clap"). All are very talented multi-instrumentalists with a flair for theatricality – hence the borderline ridiculous stage names.

This year has been a busy year for the band. "Six Demon Bag," their second album, arrived in stores in late February to enthusiastic reviews from both big names (Billboard, Spin and Uncut) and independent online publications (heavy-hitter Pitchfork Media, PopMatters and Stylus Magazine).

Man Man has embarked upon a number of tours since then – a headliner that brought them to the Flywheel in Easthampton, a supporting position with the Fiery Furnaces, a gig at the Pitchfork Media Music Festival in Chicago and now another extensive headlining tour that will see the group across the country and briefly into Canada.

This week they'll be playing in Pearl Street's clubroom – a perfect opportunity to experience the group in an intimate setting. Opening for the band are the groups New London and The Can Kickers, a band hailing from Connecticut known for their self-described "old time riot music for dancing." They are common guests at The Flywheel and the (now-defunct) Shed. Also opening is Philadelphia's experimental rock band Coyote.

Doors open at 7:30 p.m., and the show starts at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $9 in advance and $11 at the door. It's sure to be one of this year's most exciting shows in the area. Believe the Pitchfork hype this time – these guys are worth the trip.

Man Man is a Philadelphia-based art-rock quartet known for their theatrical live performances.

The tribute trio is known for closely capturing the original sounds of Sublime. Band members consist of Joel on bass guitar, Scott on drums, and Dave on guitar and vocals.

Badfish set to bring Sublime sound to Pearl Street Night Club

By Lauren Modisette

Another year in Amherst is upon us all: new classes, faces, and opportunities flood our agendas as the days fly by. Sometimes it can be difficult to find an escape from all of the bus lines, text books and endless walks across campus.

Take a night off this week, and make your way to Northampton's Pearl Street Night Club, where you can sing along with Sublime's cover band, Badfish.

They will be jamming out this Thursday at 8:30 p.m. in the Ballroom. Doors open at 7:30 p.m., so get there early and score a spot upfront. Tickets are $15 in advance and $18 at the door.

Even if you're not familiar with Sublime, it's guaranteed that you'll recognize at least one of their songs. If you have any doubts about Badfish's abilities, visit their Web site www.badfish.com and check out their Music link to preview some of their covers and discover more about the minds behind the music.

The band they cover, Sublime, started out as a small garage punk band landing gigs at local parties. They scored their first gig in 1988 and soon became the renowned group with their feel-good, reggae beats that many young Americans are familiar with. Sublime originated in Long Beach, Calif. and were lead by Brad Nowell's one of a kind voice and guitar skills. Badfish plays their famous songs, which range from "What I got," "Date Rape" and "40-oz to Freedom."

Badfish is Sublime's only touring tribute band that attracts between hundreds and thousands of fans to each performance. The trio successfully captivates the same energy that Sublime did back in the Brad days.

It goes without saying that a great band never dies, and Sublime will always be a group that people are familiar with. So share your love for them by joining your fellow fans supporting Badfish, who are making their wonderful music alive again.

Camping with Bisco

Hunter N.Y. greets Disco Biscuit followers at Camp Bisco

By Lauren Modisette
Collegian Correspondent

Anyone who's ever seen the Disco Biscuits live knows that it can be a rather shady scene for the fans. It isn't surprising to come across some particularly faded or spun individuals.

At Camp Bisco this year, held annually at Hunter Mountain Ski Lodge in Hunter, N.Y., fans of the Disco Biscuits and other popular bands were partaking in what could be described as one of the sketchiest festivals in a long time.

For the weekend of August 25, fans and festival goers from all over New England joined together for a cold, rainy adventure on a small ski mountain in the middle of the Catskills. The weather wasn't welcoming, and there were even a couple of incidents with some over-friendly bears on the campground, but that didn't keep the fans from pressing on.

The Disco Biscuit's eclectic live shows have distinguished them as popular figures in the jam and groove music scene.

It wasn't a park-side event, like many festivals usually are, and all Thursday night there were campers trudging through mud the color of burnt sienna with all of their belongings including coolers, tents, chairs, food and drinks. For most campers this is not unusual because the thick mud is a common downer at festivals every year.

Over 100 individuals were arrested the night of Thursday, August 24 while entering into the festival. The biggest surprise people came across was the incredibly high security that was mandatory to pass through upon entering and exiting the camp ground. On that rainy Thursday night, police officers were searching everyone and everything. This made it nearly impossible to bring anything into the camp ground that could be potentially dangerous to the minds and bodies of the fans, but even so, if you were looking for a certain fix, you could manage to find it easy enough.

There was an extensive check point at the entrance of the campground, and my bag must have been searched over 20 times. Officers were patting people down and searching through their pockets to see what little mysteries they were hiding. Many fans positioned themselves just before it warning everyone who passed that they were searching wallets, pockets and shoes. If you had drugs you would be arrested.

While waiting in the line to get back into the venue you could feel the anxiety of those who were praying they wouldn't be searched and others who were convincing themselves they needed to "stay cool" so they wouldn't be questioned as to whether they were under the influence or not. It was a "Hotel California" kind of scenario where you could bring anything into the campground, but you couldn't bring anything out.

Apart from the mere sketchiness, the bands themselves were incredible. On Friday, well known artists like RJD2, The New Deal and The Roots put on a remarkable performance. Some fans said that the show The New Deal put on was one of the best they had ever seen. The Disco Biscuits followed up with an equally amazing performance for their most loyal fans who were willing to subject their minds, feet, and wallets to this one of a kind gathering.

> "The Disco Biscuits [gave] an equally amazing performance for their most loyal fans who were willing to subject their minds, feet, and wallets to this one of a kind gathering."

The Disco Biscuits formed in 1995 when the four members met at the University of Pennsylvania. Their music is a combination of techno, rock, trance, jazz, soul and blues. They have even been known to throw a little classical in the mix.

At their festival they played songs ranging from "42" to "Therapy." Both nights the crowd was wired, dancing and screaming the songs along with the band, but the crowd lost their heads when they jammed out to "I-Man" as their encore treat for their fans on their last night. They also played "Crickets," "Chemical Warfare Brigade" and "House Dog Party Favor."

There was no doubt that the crowd was pleased with the line-up and the amazing show the artists presented their most loyal fans with.

You can download their many concerts at disclogic.com, or try rummaging through archive.org to find a specific show. This was a one of a kind festival, and everyone who attended will remember it forever, if they remember it at all.

UMass SOM student 'plugs' product for smelly dorms

By Morgan-ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

Does your room smell horrible?

Anthony Volpe's does — at least it did when he lived on campus.

"There's lots of smells in your typical dorm room," said Volpe. "Everything from dirty laundry, body odor and stale beer to your filthy roommate's lucky bong water he refuses to change. I couldn't take it anymore — something needed to be done."

His solution was simple: an odor remover called "Just Plug It In." The odor remover works by ionizing the air in your room, and is comparable to a Glade Plug-In. There are many similar products around, but Anthony says those are more expensive.

"This one is good because it is designed for smaller areas, and dorm rooms here at UMass happen to be the perfect size," said Anthony, who also says that ionization is the most effective way to treat air if you have allergies or asthma.

As a senior in the Isenberg School of Management and Manager of The Vac Store in Hadley (CEO/President of the Air Treatment Division), Anthony says he has the skills and product knowledge to take the "ass" out of "UMass."

"My friends were spending $10 or more per week on things like "Glade Plug-Ins" or "Febreze," but so many people are allergic to those chemicals and cover-up fragrances, or just don't like them — plus they're expensive. This way is simple: just plug it in and it basically lasts forever," said Anthony.

Anthony was introduced to "Just Plug it In" at his work; he says this kind of a product is perfect for students because they're small, they require little maintenance and they are inexpensive.

According to Volpe, the only maintenance required is a simple wipe-down of the collector plate on the inside of the unit from time to time.

"I wanted to find something inexpensive for students to use that actually works. This product is just $29, including free delivery. It just makes sense. I think everybody should have one. People have even told me that they sleep better due to the ionization and cleaner air. Plus it has a night-light, which is comforting," said Anthony.

Anthony also has special student packages available for everyday cleaning needs.

"The big-box stores don't cater to college dorm rooms — or students in general," he said. "Everyone likes to save money by shopping there, but a lot of the products we have at The Vac Store are less expensive, and obviously they're all better."

Volpe says similar products have become main-stream over the past few years from places like Sharper Image, but he considers them larger and over priced.

"If you're trying to do areas larger than a small bedroom or dorm room, there are much better options out there. In those cases I would prefer a HEPA filter, and for larger areas HEPA units aren't much more expensive than ionizers," Volpe said. "But for getting rid of smells, especially smoke and laundry kinds of stuff in smaller spaces, ionization is effective and cheap."

Besides the cheap price, the nice thing about these is there is no cover up smell, and you never have to buy more.

Minutemen lose close game

Late in the fourth the Minutemen had another chance to take control of the game. David Burris recovered another fumble in Navy territory, this time starting quarterback Brian Hampton lost the ball.

Two Steve Baylark carries lost seven yards, but Coen then found him for 11 yards on a swing pass on third down. That put Brown in a tough spot. On fourth-and-six and UMass down by four, the coach opted for the field goal to get his team some points.

"It was just a little bit too long to try [and go for it]," he said. "I figured with six minutes to go, let's get some points, we'll get another stop and get another chance."

On the next Navy drive, the Minutemen defense forced the Midshipmen into a three-and-out. After a punt, UMass got the ball back at their own 30 yard-line with 3:57 to go in the game.

Lawrence gained five yards on the first play before Rob Caldwell stripped the ball and it was recovered by teammate Tyler Tidwell.

The Midshipmen missed a field goal attempt, but three straight incompletions effectively ended the Minutemen's shot at the upset.

UMass struggled throughout the game in short-yardage situations. That can be attributed to Navy's defense and the absence of wide receiver Brandon London. He and linebacker Brad Anderson were suspended for the game to due violations of undisclosed team rules.

The Maroon and White came out in the first quarter looking to surprise the home team. On the opening kickoff, Lawrence received the ball and handed it off to Chris Robinson who took it all the way, but a clipping penalty nullified the score.

Baylark and the rest of the offense weren't phased by the penalty.

"I don't think it set us back that much," he said. "We were really excited that we went out and opened up on the reverse. I didn't even know we were going to do the reverse."

After the penalty, UMass took the ball down the field and scored on eight plays in only 3:15. They hit on back-to-back big plays from Rasheed Rancher and Baylark.

Coen found Rancher up the right sideline for a gain of 39 on first-and-10. Rancher stretched out his six-foot-five frame to bring the ball in.

Then Baylark broke free on an off-tackle play. He went 20 yards before Clint Sovie and Jeremy McGown brought him down.

"When we got down to the red zone we just didn't finish some of our drives," Baylark said. "It's all about the guys being on the same page and executing the plays."

In the first quarter, Baylark carried the ball eight times for 42 yards. He ended with 21 touches and 84 yards. Coen began the game seven-for-eight with 102 yards and a score, but ended 17-of-29 with only 85 more yards and an interception.

"I don't think it came as easily for us, period," Brown said. "I'm sure when we look at the tape there will be enough of those areas [to work on] to go around on both sides of the ball."

Navy uses many options on offense

The first option is the fullback, who, for Navy, was a two-headed back, usually Matt Hall (four rushes, 66 yards on Saturday) or Adam Ballard (13 rushes, 48 yards).

It is either a play-fake or a handoff to the fullback, who charges straight up the gut to start the play. If the ball is handed off, the back has a full head of steam going towards the line of scrimmage, good for short-yardage situations.

Even after the ball is handed off, the quarterback springs to the outside, followed by one of the running backs that swung around from the opposite side of the line of scrimmage. Several linebackers and safeties could be staring at the QB and RB while the fullback rumbles up the middle for a good chunk of yardage.

If the hand-off to the fullback is a play fake, the QB either drops back to pass (a rarity on Saturday) or pops to the outside with blockers ahead and the RB behind and to the left or right, depending on which side the play was on.

Now the QB and RB might have an open field, especially if some linebackers bit at the fake to the fullback, but if they don't, then there are a couple of ways to run the play.

This part takes an unholy amount of discipline from linebackers and cornerbacks.

The QB – usually a quick and elusive runner in this type of offense – is charging at the LB's with the ball. It would be easy to bite and attack the ball, but if that happens, a simple flip to the RB and an open field awaits.

For the second option, the QB can simply keep the ball, which will be effective much of the time because the defenders are waiting for the pitch to the running back.

The third option is the RB, and his yards depend entirely on how well the QB sells the play. If the QB gets defenders to think he's keeping the ball, then the defense will be drawn to him, leaving the RB with some running room.

So the linebackers and the cornerbacks need to stay put, even if that means giving up a few yards. Then again, that's exactly what the offense is hoping for.

"I thought we did a nice job boxing them in and keeping the option attack on the ground," Brown said. "That's really what our goal was when we played this thing, was to create as much havoc as we can. Most people just try to sit there and take it in the face opposed to trying to attack it."

The Minutemen allowed just 21 points on Saturday, tied for the fewest points allowed in two seasons at Navy-Marine Corps Memorial Stadium. UMass tried to break down the option by getting into the backfield early and shutting down the QB's wiggle room.

They succeeded, for the most part, and – with the exception of a 53-yard touchdown run by Hall – kept Navy's big plays to a minimum.

"Early on in the week, I think you're still trying to figure [the option offense] out," Hatchell said. "But by Wednesday I think everyone had it down pat. We knew we were going to play them differently than anybody else that played them, and aside from a couple of plays I thought we were pretty successful for the most part."

Navy fumbled seven times and threw one interception in Saturday's game. Looks like the UMass defense will return to Amherst in one piece.

UM extends winning streak to four games

DeSantis was robbed of a penalty kick in the 28th minute after sophomore Prince Ofosu was on the receiving end of a vicious trip in the box.

The Minutemen almost prevented overtime when Ofosu caused a turnover and came in all alone with 20 seconds left, but his shot was wide to the left, setting up a wild finish to another successful weekend in Amherst.

UMass started the weekend with a 1-0 win over Siena on Friday, thanks to the heroics of one Bryan Hogan. Hogan's goal (second of season) in the 60th minute lifted the Minutemen over the Saints. However, Koch's squad did not perform at its highest level.

"We just didn't play well," Koch said after Friday's win over Siena. "We're fortunate. In the second half we played better, but still, we just didn't finish our chances like we need to. We didn't play well [on Friday], but we got a good result."

"Our first touch was awful," Koch added. "We played very slow. It was like two, three touches, and then we'd pass the ball, and then everything's off. And so we've got to play quicker. We have to move the ball quicker because if we don't, then the passing lanes close down, open players close down and we can't move the ball the way we need to in order to create good chances to finish."

UMass has allowed only one goal all season (1-1 draw against Boston University on Aug. 27). Yesterday's win marked the fifth shutout for the Minutemen.

Their stellar 5-0-1 start is the best since the 1971 season. With conference play only five games away, the Maroon and White are in good shape.

"The defense is making it really hard for teams to score," Koch said on his team's success thus far. "And when it does break down, Zack [Simmons] has been able to pick up the slack and keep the door shut on the opponent.

"In all honesty, it's great to be 5-0," Koch added. "We got a game on Friday against Hartford which is going to be tougher. I think as we go, each game gets tougher, and the games that really count are the conference games. Our goal is to get better and better each week, and I think today, we certainly improved over Friday. So that's a big plus, and we just have to keep doing that."

Junior Kenny Cook and the UMass defense have allowed only one goal this season. Cook was named to the 2006 A-10 Preseason All-Conference Team.

Milestone news to Koch and company

Conference, and his last came just four years ago, in 2002, when he received the same honor for the A-10.

Koch is happy for the win, but it has more to do with his team's standings than his own records.

"We've got to play each game at a time," Koch said. "Friday's game we didn't play well, but we found a way to win. Today we played a very good St. Bonnies team. They made it really tough. They made it hard for us to play. I think we played well against a good opponent, so I'm very pleased with the result."

Sophomore Mike DeSantis – who netted the game-winner in overtime – was surprised to find out he had also secured a landmark victory for his coach.

"I actually did not [know]," DeSantis said. "It's great. I'm very happy. I'm proud of my coach. He's a good guy; he deserves it. I'm glad I could do it for him."

When asked which win was the most memorable, it turns out Koch has a very short memory.

"Today," Koch said, referring to yesterday's win. "And hopefully the one that will be the next [win] will be the one that I'll be thinking about next."

The wins have been piling up for both Koch and the Minutemen recently. Dating back to Oct. 21 of last season, UMass is undefeated in its last 12 regular season games, with the only loss during that span coming in the postseason to Rhode Island in the 2005 A-10 Tournament.

The Minutemen were undefeated in six straight games to finish the 2005 season and repeated that feat to start the 2006 season. Koch believes it is the chemistry in the young players that has made it possible.

"What's great right now is that this is a young team that is playing together better, and they're finding ways to win games," Koch said.

The resilience of this team is a reflection of how Koch has earned so many victories through the years. It's something Koch expects to continue this season.

"Even when we're not finishing all of our chances, we're still finding ways to [win]," Koch said. "If we can keep that up every week from now on, then I'll be very happy."

Villarroel scores game-winner in overtime

W. SOCCER from page 10

"Stoll is a really good one-on-one player," Rudy said. "In the second half she was getting in on the left side an awful lot, but she's a right-footed player, and she's much better taking on [the other team from the] right than the left."

Another adjustment Rudy made was substituting freshman Meghan Gould for junior Christina Nunes at midfield.

"Nunes was getting gassed just running up and down, up and down [the field]," Rudy said. "So, I figured, 'Let's get [Gould] in there. She's very good with the ball and she served some really nice [passes] when she came in.'"

Rudy concentrated on keeping the ball near Albany's endline in an attempt to create more close-range shots and corner kick opportunities.

"[We always say] get to the darn endline, because it produces positive things," he said.

Rudy admits that he is very relieved that his team was able to come away with the victory.

"Any win is good," Rudy said. "All of our opponents are going to be difficult in some way. It's just nice to get [this win]. I'm glad we didn't lose it, and I'm glad we didn't tie it."

As the victorious Minutewomen walked off the field, each helping to carry some team equipment, almost all of them had a bag of ice taped to a limb in order to ease the swelling of post-game sores.

Rudy said the team's philosophy is that just because a game has ended, it does not mean the work is over. They know they have to get the equipment off the bench, get home and prepare for whatever game is next on the schedule.

The Minutewomen's next game will be against nationally-ranked Yale University on Sept. 15.

UMass men and women place third

By Steve Gambs
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts men's and women's cross country team started the season Saturday morning on the road at the Hanover Country Club. The Minutemen and women both finished third at the 2006 Dartmouth invitational.

The top eight UMass men's runners are all underclassmen with a young core of freshmen and sophomores. Of the 14 Minutemen runners in the event, 10 of them are either freshmen or sophomores. Leading the pack, freshmen Nicolai Naranjo (Essex Fells, N.J.) placed sixth overall and first for the Minutemen with a time of 26:24.10. Junior Nils Fischer (Stow, Mass.) finished right behind Naranjo in seventh place, 26:30.20.

The Minutemen finished third in the eight-kilometer race. They took places six, seven, 19, and 23 to give them a total score of 78. Dartmouth College won the event by placing two through five and 11-13. Dartmouth finished with 25 points, second place went to Marist with 61, UMass in third 78, fourth and fifth place Keene State 86 and Central Connecticut State 125, respectively.

Sophomore Kevin Quadrozzi (Pittsfield, Mass.) placed 19th 27:15.80, freshman Ryan DiOrio (Bridgewater, N.J.) placed 23rd 27:20.20 and freshmen Daniel Moriarty (North Kingston, R.I.) 28th 27:27.90. Rounding out the top 35, junior Matt Klypka (Oakland, N.J.) 30th 27:29.50, freshman Andrew Mulvaney (South Hadley, Ma.) 31st 27:33.50 and freshmen Andrew McCann 33rd 27:46.20. Junior Mark Kenwood (Cumberland R.I.) finished out the top eight for the team 37th 27:54.90. The young men's team improved upon last years fourth place finish at Dartmouth.

The UMass women's team also finished third in a 5K invitational with 68 points. The Dartmouth women won despite not having a top four finisher. They took places five through 11 in a field of 40. Dartmouth finished first with 27 points, Keene State College in second place 51, UMass third with 68 and Central Connecticut State finished fourth 100.

UMass Junior Christina Derosa (Sound Beach, N.Y.) led the UMass runners with a fourth place finish time of 20:54.70. Derosa is off to a great start, continuing to improve each year finishing 10 places better than her 14th place finish last year at the Dartmouth Invitational. The Minutewomen's second and third place finishers, Junior Amber Sayer (Amherst, Ma.) 16th overall 22:20.40 and freshmen Lauren Liuzzo 17th overall 22:21.90 respectively. Finishing out the top five for the team Cuisle Kierans (Newbury, Ma.) 19th overall 22:32.70 and Taryn Trapp (Nampa, Idaho) 21st overall 22:39.10. Last year the Minutewomen finished fifth overall at Dartmouth.

The UMass teams return home for the next event Saturday 9/23 against Boston College and Maine. Last year at home the Minutemen won the 8K race over Maine and Vermont. The Minutewomen finished third last year at the home meet.

The meet will feature an alumni race at 9:00 a.m. and following the football game against Stony Brook the new track and field complex that was built last fall will be presented.

Badfish set to bring Sublime sound to Pearl Street Night Club

By Lauren Moddisette
Collegian Correspondent

Another year in Amherst is upon us all: new classes, faces, and opportunities flood our agendas as the days fly by. Sometimes it can be difficult to find an escape from all of the bus lines, text books and endless walks across campus.

Take a night off this week, and make your way to Northampton's Pearl Street Night Club, where you can sing along with Sublime's cover band, Badfish.

They will be jamming out this Thursday at 8:30 p.m. in the Ballroom. Doors open at 7:30 p.m., so get there early and score a spot upfront. Tickets are $15 in advance and $18 at the door.

Even if you're not familiar with Sublime, it's guaranteed that you'll recognize at least one of their songs. If you have any doubts about Badfish's abilities, visit their Web site www.badfish.com and check out their Music link to preview some of their covers and discover more about the minds behind the music.

The band they cover, Sublime, started out as a small garage punk band landing gigs at local parties. They scored their first gig in 1988 and soon became the renowned group with their feel-good, reggae beats that many young Americans are familiar with. Sublime originated in Long Beach, Calif. and were lead by Brad Nowell's one of a kind voice and guitar skills. Badfish plays their famous songs, which range from "What I got," "Date Rape" and "40-oz to Freedom."

Badfish
Pearl Street Ballroom
Doors at 7:30 p.m.
Show at 8:30 p.m.
Tickets $15 in advance $18 at the door
Sept. 14

Badfish is Sublime's only touring tribute band that attracts between hundreds and thousands of fans to each performance. The trio successfully captivates the same energy that Sublime did back in the Brad days.

It goes without saying that a great band never dies, and Sublime will always be a group that people are familiar with. So share your love for them by joining your fellow fans supporting Badfish, who are making their wonderful music alive again.

For ticketing and other information visit the venue's Web site www.iheg.com or call Iron Horse Entertainment at (413) 584-7810.

Camping with Bisco

Hunter N.Y. greets Disco Biscuit followers at Camp Bisco

By Lauren Moddisette
Collegian Correspondent

Anyone who's ever seen the Disco Biscuits live knows that it can be a rather shady scene for the fans. It isn't surprising to come across some particularly faded or spun individuals.

At Camp Bisco this year, held annually at Hunter Mountain Ski Lodge in Hunter, N.Y., fans of the Disco Biscuits and other popular bands were partaking in what could be described as one of the sketchiest festivals in a long time.

For the weekend of August 25, fans and festival goers from all over New England joined together for a cold, rainy adventure on a small ski mountain in the middle of the Catskills. The weather wasn't welcoming, and there were even a couple of incidents with some over-friendly bears on the campground, but that didn't keep the fans from pressing on.

It wasn't a park-side event, like many festivals usually are, and all Thursday night there were campers trudging through mud the color of burnt sienna with all of their belongings including coolers, tents, chairs, food and drinks. For most campers this is not unusual because the thick mud is a common downer at festivals every year.

Over 100 individuals were arrested the night of Thursday, August 24 while entering into the festival. The biggest surprise people came across was the incredibly high security that was mandatory to pass through upon entering and exiting the camp ground. On that rainy Thursday night, police officers were searching everyone and everything. This made it nearly impossible to bring anything into the camp ground that could be potentially dangerous to the minds and bodies of the fans, but even so, if you were looking for a certain fix, you could manage to find it easy enough.

There was an extensive check point at the entrance of the campground, and my bag must have been searched over 20 times. Officers were patting people down and searching through their pockets to see what little mysteries they were hiding. Many fans positioned themselves just before it warning everyone who passed that they were searching wallets, pockets and shoes. If you had drugs you would be arrested.

While waiting in the line to get back into the venue you could feel the anxiety of those who were praying they wouldn't be searched and others who were convincing themselves they needed to "stay cool" so they wouldn't be questioned as to whether they were under the influence or not. It was a "Hotel California" kind of scenario where you could bring anything into the campground, but you couldn't bring anything out.

Apart from the mere sketchiness, the bands themselves were incredible. On Friday, well known artists like RJD2, The New Deal and The Roots put on a remarkable performance. Some fans said that the show The New Deal put on was one of the best they had ever seen. The Disco Biscuits followed up with an equally amazing performance for their most loyal fans who were willing to subject their minds, feet, and wallets to this one of a kind gathering.

> "The Disco Biscuits [gave] an equally amazing performance for their most loyal fans who were willing to subject their minds, feet, and wallets to this one of a kind gathering."

The Disco Biscuits formed in 1995 when the four members met at the University of Pennsylvania. Their music is a combination of techno, rock, trance, jazz, soul and blues. They have even been known to throw a little classical in the mix.

At their festival they played songs ranging from "42" to "Therapy." Both nights the crowd was wired, dancing and screaming the songs along with the band, but the crowd lost their heads when they jammed out to "I-Man" as their encore treat for their fans on their last night. They also played "Crickets," "Chemical Warfare Brigade" and "House Dog Party Favor."

There was no doubt that the crowd was pleased with the line-up and the amazing show the artists presented their most loyal fans with.

You can download their many concerts at disclogic.com, or try rummaging through archive.org to find a specific show. This was a one of a kind festival, and everyone who attended will remember it forever, if they remember it at all.

UMass SOM student 'plugs' product for smelly dorms

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

Does your room smell horrible?

Anthony Volpe's does — at least it did when he lived on campus.

"There's lots of smells in your typical dorm room," said Volpe. "Everything from dirty laundry, body odor and stale beer to your filthy roommate's lucky bong water he refuses to change. I couldn't take it anymore — something needed to be done."

His solution was simple: an odor remover called "Just Plug It In." The odor remover works by ionizing the air in your room, and is comparable to a Glade Plug-In. There are many similar products around, but Anthony says those are more expensive.

"This one is good because it is designed for smaller areas, and dorm rooms here at UMass happen to be the perfect size," said Anthony, who also says that ionization is the most effective way to treat air if you have allergies or asthma.

As a senior in the Isenberg School of Management and Manager of The Vac Store in Hadley (CEO/President of the Air Treatment Division), Anthony says he has the skills and product knowledge to take the "ass" out of "UMass."

"My friends were spending $10 or more per week on things like "Glade Plug-Ins" or "Febreze," but so many people are allergic to those chemicals and cover-up fragrances, or just don't like them — plus they're expensive. This way is simple: just plug it in and it basically lasts forever," said Anthony.

Anthony was introduced to "Just Plug it In" at his work; he says this kind of a product is perfect for students because they're small, they require little maintenance and they are inexpensive.

According to Volpe, the only maintenance required is a simple wipe-down of the collector plate on the inside of the unit from time to time.

"I wanted to find something inexpensive for students to use that actually works. This product is just $29, including free delivery. It just makes sense. I think everybody should have one. People have even told me that they sleep better due to the ionization and cleaner air. Plus it has a night-light, which is comforting," said Anthony.

Anthony also has special student packages available for everyday cleaning needs.

"The big-box stores don't cater to college dorm rooms — or students in general," He said. "Everyone likes to save money by shopping there, but a lot of the products we have at The Vac Store are less expensive, and obviously they're all better."

Volpe says similar products have become main-stream over the past few years from places like Sharper Image, but he considers them larger and over priced.

"If you're trying to do areas larger than a small bedroom or dorm room, there are much better options out there. In those cases I would prefer a HEPA filter, and for larger areas HEPA units aren't much more expensive than ionizers," Volpe said. "But for getting rid of smells, especially smoke and laundry kinds of stuff in smaller spaces, ionization is effective and cheap."

Besides the cheap price, the nice thing about these is there is no cover up smell, and you never have to buy more.

Late in the fourth the Minutemen had another chance to take control of the game. David Burris recovered another fumble in Navy territory, this time starting quarterback Brian Hampton lost the ball.

Two Steve Baylark carries lost seven yards, but Coen then found him for 11 yards on a swing pass on third down. That put Brown in a tough spot. On fourth-and-six and UMass down by four, the coach opted for the field goal to get his team some points.

"It was just a little bit too long to try [and go for it]," he said. "I figured with six minutes to go, let's get some points, we'll get another stop and get another chance."

On the next Navy drive, the Minutemen defense forced the Midshipmen into a three-and-out. After a punt, UMass got the ball back at their own 30 yard-line with 3:57 to go in the game.

Lawrence gained five yards on the first play before Rob Caldwell stripped the ball and it was recovered by teammate Tyler Tidwell.

The Midshipmen missed a field goal attempt, but three straight incompletions effectively ended the Minutemen's shot at the upset.

UMass struggled throughout the game in short-yardage situations. That can be attributed to Navy's defense and the absence of wide receiver Brandon London. He and linebacker Brad Anderson were suspended for the game to due violations of undisclosed team rules.

The Maroon and White came out in the first quarter looking to surprise the home team. On the opening kickoff, Lawrence received the ball and handed it off to Chris Robinson who took it all the way, but a clipping penalty nullified the score.

Baylark and the rest of the offense weren't phased by the penalty.

"I don't think it set us back that much," he said. "We were really excited that we went out and opened up on the reverse. I didn't even know we were going to do the reverse."

After the penalty, UMass took the ball down the field and scored on eight plays in only 3:15. They hit on back-to-back big plays from Rasheed Rancher and Baylark.

Coen found Rancher up the right sideline for a gain of 39 on first-and-10. Rancher stretched out his six-foot-five frame to bring the ball in.

Then Baylark broke free on an off-tackle play. He went 20 yards before Clint Sovie and Jeremy McGown brought him down.

"When we got down to the red zone we just didn't finish some of our drives," Baylark said. "It's all about the guys being on the same page and executing the plays."

In the first quarter, Baylark carried the ball eight times for 42 yards. He ended with 21 touches and 84 yards. Coen began the game seven-for-eight with 102 yards and a score, but ended 17-of-29 with only 85 more yards and an interception.

"I don't think it came as easily for us, period," Brown said. "I'm sure when we look at the tape there will be enough of those areas [to work on] to go around on both sides of the ball."

The first option is the fullback, who, for Navy, was a two-headed back, usually Matt Hall (four rushes, 66 yards on Saturday) or Adam Ballard (13 rushes, 48 yards).

It is either a play-fake or a handoff to the fullback, who charges straight up the gut to start the play. If the ball is handed off, the back has a full head of steam going towards the line of scrimmage, good for short-yardage situations.

Even after the ball is handed off, the quarterback springs to the outside, followed by one of the running backs that swung around from the opposite side of the line of scrimmage. Several linebackers and safeties could be staring at the QB and RB while the fullback rumbles up the middle for a good chunk of yardage.

If the hand-off to the fullback is a play fake, the QB either drops back to pass (a rarity on Saturday) or pops to the outside with blockers ahead and the RB behind and to the left or right, depending on which side the play was on.

Now the QB and RB might have an open field, especially if some linebackers bit at the fake to the fullback, but if they don't, then there are a couple of ways to run the play.

This part takes an unholy amount of discipline from linebackers and cornerbacks.

The QB – usually a quick and elusive runner in this type of offense – is charging at the LB's with the ball. It would be easy to bite and attack the ball, but if that happens, a simple flip to the RB and an open field awaits.

For the second option, the QB can simply keep the ball, which will be effective much of the time because the defenders are waiting for the pitch to the running back.

The third option is the RB, and his yards depend entirely on how well the QB sells the play. If the QB gets defenders to think he's keeping the ball, then the defense will be drawn to him, leaving the RB with some running room.

So the linebackers and the cornerbacks need to stay put, even if that means giving up a few yards. Then again, that's exactly what the offense is hoping for.

"I thought we did a nice job boxing them in and keeping the option attack on the ground," Brown said. "That's really what our goal was when we played this thing, was to create as much havoc as we can. Most people just try to sit there and take it in the face opposed to trying to attack it."

The Minutemen allowed just 21 points on Saturday, tied for the fewest points allowed in two seasons at Navy-Marine Corps Memorial Stadium. UMass tried to break down the option by getting into the backfield early and shutting down the QB's wiggle room.

They succeeded, for the most part, and – with the exception of a 53-yard touchdown run by Hall – kept Navy's big plays to a minimum.

"Early on in the week, I think you're still trying to figure [the option offense] out," Hatchell said. "But by Wednesday I think everyone had it down pat. We knew we were going to play them differently than anybody else that played them, and aside from a couple of plays I thought we were pretty successful for the most part."

Navy fumbled seven times and threw one interception in Saturday's game. Looks like the UMass defense will return to Amherst in one piece.

DeSantis was robbed of a penalty kick in the 28th minute after sophomore Prince Ofosu was on the receiving end of a vicious trip in the box.

The Minutemen almost prevented overtime when Ofosu caused a turnover and came in all alone with 20 seconds left, but his shot was wide to the left, setting up a wild finish to another successful weekend in Amherst.

UMass started the weekend with a 1-0 win over Siena on Friday, thanks to the heroics of one Bryan Hogan. Hogan's goal (second of season) in the 60th minute lifted the Minutemen over the Saints. However, Koch's squad did not perform at its highest level.

"We just didn't play well," Koch said after Friday's win over Siena. "We're fortunate. In the second half we played better, but still, we just didn't finish our chances like we need to. We didn't play well [on Friday], but we got a good result."

"Our first touch was awful," Koch added. "We played very slow. It was like two, three touches, and then we'd pass the ball, and then everything's off. And so we've got to play quicker. We have to move the ball quicker because if we don't, then the passing lanes close down, open players close down and we can't move the ball the way we need to in order to create good chances to finish."

UMass has allowed only one goal all season (1-1 draw against Boston University on Aug. 27). Yesterday's win marked the fifth shutout for the Minutemen.

Their stellar 5-0-1 start is the best since the 1971 season. With conference play only five games away, the Maroon and White are in good shape.

"The defense is making it really hard for teams to score," Koch said on his team's success thus far. "And when it does break down, Zack [Simmons] has been able to pick up the slack and keep the door shut on the opponent.

"In all honesty, it's great to be 5-0," Koch added. "We got a game on Friday against Hartford which is going to be tougher. I think as we go, each game gets tougher, and the games that really count are the conference games. Our goal is to get better and better each week, and I think today, we certainly improved over Friday. So that's a big plus, and we just have to keep doing that."

Junior Kenny Cook and the UMass defense have allowed only one goal this season. Cook was named to the 2006 A-10 Preseason All-Conference Team.

Conference, and his last came just four years ago, in 2002, when he received the same honor for the A-10.

Koch is happy for the win, but it has more to do with his team's standings than his own records.

"We've got to play each game at a time," Koch said. "Friday's game we didn't play well, but we found a way to win. Today we played a very good St. Bonnies team. They made it hard for us to play. I think we played well against a good opponent, so I'm very pleased with the result."

Sophomore Mike DeSantis – who netted the game-winner in overtime – was surprised to find out he had also secured a landmark victory for his coach.

"I actually did not [know]," DeSantis said. "It's great. I'm very happy. I'm proud of my coach. He's a good guy; he deserves it. I'm glad I could do it for him."

When asked which win was the most memorable, it turns out Koch has a very short memory.

"Today," Koch said, referring to yesterday's win. "And hopefully the one that will be the next [win] will be the one that I'll be thinking about next."

The wins have been piling up for both Koch and the Minutemen recently. Dating back to Oct. 21 of last season, UMass is undefeated in its last 12 regular season games, with the only loss during that span coming in the postseason to Rhode Island in the 2005 A-10 Tournament.

The Minutemen were undefeated in six straight games to finish the 2005 season and repeated that feat to start the 2006 season. Koch believes it is the chemistry in the young players that has made it possible.

"What's great right now is that this is a young team that is playing together better, and they're finding ways to win games," Koch said.

The resilience of this team is a reflection of how Koch has earned so many victories through the years. It's something Koch expects to continue this season.

"Even when we're not finishing all of our chances, we're still finding ways to [win]," Koch said. "If we can keep that up every week from now on, then I'll be very happy."

Villarroel scores game-winner in overtime

W. SOCCER from page 10

"Stoll is a really good one-on-one player," Rudy said. "In the second half she was getting in on the left side an awful lot, but she's a right-footed player, and she's much better taking on [the other team from the] right than the left."

Another adjustment Rudy made was substituting freshman Meghan Gould for junior Christina Nunes at midfield.

"Nunes was getting gassed just running up and down, up and down [the field]," Rudy said. "So, I figured, 'Let's get [Gould] in there. She's very good with the ball and she served some really nice [passes] when she came in.'"

Rudy concentrated on keeping the ball near Albany's endline in an attempt to create more close-range shots and corner kick opportunities.

"[We always say] get to the dam endline, because it produces positive things," he said.

Rudy admits that he is very relieved that his team was able to come away with the victory.

"Any win is good," Rudy said. "All of our opponents are going to be difficult in some way. It's just nice to get [this win]. I'm glad we didn't lose it, and I'm glad we didn't tie it."

As the victorious Minutewomen walked off the field, each helping to carry some team equipment, almost all of them had a bag of ice taped to a limb in order to ease the swelling of post-game sores.

Rudy said the team's philosophy is that just because a game has ended, it does not mean the work is over. They know they have to get the equipment off the bench, get home and prepare for whatever game is next on the schedule.

The Minutewomen's next game will be against nationally-ranked Yale University on Sept. 15.

UMass men and women place third

By Steve Gaus
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts men's and women's cross country team started the season Saturday morning on the road at the Hanover Country Club. The Minutemen and women both finished third at the 2006 Dartmouth invitational.

The top eight UMass men's runners are all underclassmen with a young core of freshmen and sophomores. Of the 14 Minutemen runners in the event, 10 of them are either freshmen or sophomores. Leading the pack, Freshmen Nicolas Naranjo (Lasses Fells, N.J.) placed sixth overall and first for the Minutemen with a time of 26:24.10. Junior Nils Fischer (Stow, Mass.) finished right behind Naranjo in seventh place, 26:30.20.

The Minutemen finished third in the eight-kilometer race. They took places six, seven, 19, and 23 to give them a total score of 78. Dartmouth College won the event by placing two through five and 11-13. Dartmouth finished with 25 points, second place went to Marist with 61, UMass in third 78, fourth and fifth place Keene State 86 and Central Connecticut State 125, respectively.

Sophomore Kevin Quadrozzi (Pittsfield, Mass.) placed 19th 27:15.80, freshman Ryan DiOrio (Bridgewater, N.J.) placed 23rd 27:20.20 and freshmen Daniel Moriarty (North Kingston, R.I.) 28th 27:27.90. Rounding out the top 35, junior Matt Klypka (Oakland, N.J.) 30th 27:29.50, freshman Andrew Mulvaney (South Hadley, Ma.) 31st 27:33.50 and freshmen Andrew McCann 35th 27:46.20. Junior Mark Kenwood (Cumberland R.I.) finished out the top eight for the team 37th 27:54.90. The young men's team improved upon last years fourth place finish at Dartmouth.

The UMass women's team also finished third in a 5K invitational with 68 points. The Dartmouth women won despite not having a top four finisher. They took places five through 11 in a field of 40. Dartmouth finished first with 27 points, Keene State College in second place 51, UMass third with 68 and Central Connecticut State finished fourth 100.

UMass Junior Christina Derosa (Sound Beach, N.Y.) led the UMass runners with a fourth place finish time of 20:54.70. Derosa is off to a great start, continuing to improve each year finishing 10 places better than her 14th place finish last year at the Dartmouth Invitational. The Minutewomen's second and third place finishers, Junior Amber Sayer (Amherst, Ma.) 16th overall 22:20.40 and freshmen Lauren Liuzzo 17th overall 22:21.90 respectively. Finishing out the top five for the team Cuisle Kierans (Newbury, Ma.) 19th overall 22:32.70 and Taryn Trapp (Nampa, Idaho) 21st overall 22:39.10. Last year the Minutewomen finished fifth overall at Dartmouth.

The UMass teams return home for the next event Saturday 9/23 against Boston College and Maine. Last year at home the Minutemen won the 8K race over Maine and Vermont. The Minutewomen finished third last year at the home meet.

The meet will feature an alumni race at 9:00 a.m. and following the football game against Stony Brook the new track and field complex that was built last fall will be presented.

Navy Blues

Turnovers and miscues hurt UM on the road

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

ANNAPOLIS, Md. – In a game where Massachusetts forced seven fumbles and four turnovers, a costly holding penalty led to it coming up short in its latest bid to defeat an I-A opponent. The Minutemen settled for a field goal and ultimately lost to Navy, 21-20, before 30,117 at Navy-Marine Corps Memorial Stadium.

With the score tied at 14-all, David Burris recovered a fumble at the Navy 31 yard-line. UMass (1-1) then drove the ball to the four. On third-and-goal, sophomore quarterback Liam Coen found Tim Washington on a screen pass to the left side.

Navy	21

Washington broke a tackle and reached the end zone, obviously not pleased with the yellow flag that rested on the one yard-line. The hold forced the Minutemen into third-and-goal from the 11 where Coen was sacked, bringing up fourth down.

The ensuing field goal was the first career attempt and make for sophomore Chris Koepplin.

Poised to take advantage of the miscue, Navy's Reggie Campbell took the kickoff and returned it 72 yards and into Minutemen territory. The Midshipmen (2-0) ran the ball four times and capped the drive with quarterback Kaipo-Noa Kaheaku-Enhada's 19-yard touchdown scamper.

"Obviously I was really disappointed with the touchdown called back at the end which could have been the difference in the game," UMass coach Don Brown said. "When you don't win then you have to go back to the drawing board and move on. There's no moral wins when Senior running back Steve Baylark broke a 20-yard run on UMass' third play from scrimmage in Saturday's 21-20 loss to Navy. He gained 42 of his 84 yards in the first quarter.

Midshipmen use tough option attack

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

ANNAPOLIS, Md. – The option offense is old-school. The pick-and-roll of football.

Navy ran an option offense this weekend against the Massachusetts football team. The Midshipmen ran the ball 51 times for 268 yards in Navy's 21-20 edging of UMass. The Mids went to the air for just seven passes.

"I thought we put up a pretty strong effort against [the option]," defensive end John Hatchell said after the game. "We knew that the lowest score [that Navy's opponents] allowed last year was 21 against the option. We matched that number, but I think it could've been lower. There were a couple of big plays here and there. But obviously that's the way that offense operates."

Operate is the appropriate word for the Mids' offense. Mechanical, yet improvisational.

There is hardly any way to prepare for their plays. You either have the discipline to defend it, or you don't.

"When things don't go well, which they won't at times, most [defenders] will fracture, and they won't go back to their keys," UMass coach Don Brown said. "They'll be done for the day. I thought our guys were great about getting back on their keys and battling for 60 minutes."

Fractures. That's what the option offense can create in defenses, even one as disciplined as the Minutemen's.

When the Mids line up it looks like the field-goal unit.

The offensive linemen take their spots at the line of scrimmage. The tight ends line up on the outside of them. Then two halfbacks line up outside the tight ends. There's only one wide-out on the field, and the fullback is alone in the backfield.

DeSantis, Hogan carry UMass

BY DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There weren't many everyday occurrences at Rudd Field this past weekend. Whether it was the unusual "chicken noodle soup" celebration by freshman Bryan Hogan, or a coach tallying his 225th career win, the only thing that wasn't atypical over the weekend was that the Massachusetts men's soccer team kept winning.

UMass (5-0-1) opened up a five-game homestand with a pair of wins over Siena (0-2-1) and St. Bonaventure (0-5). The Minutemen followed their 1-0 victory over the Saints with a thrilling 1-0 overtime victory, yesterday, against the Bonnies.

Sophomore Mike DeSantis kicked the ball out of mid-air and into the back of the net with four minutes remaining in the first overtime. His game-winning shot from the top of the box sealed the deal on the Minutemen's fourth consecutive victory.

St. Bonaventure	0

"We had a lot of momentum, and I just wanted to be the hero today," DeSantis said on yesterday's game-winning overtime goal. "Our team was playing good at the end, so we knew it was coming.

"We didn't play as good of a game on Friday," DeSantis added. "We definitely picked it up a little bit today, but it could be much better. We haven't showed our best yet, and we hope to play much better in the future. We're going to turn a lot of heads. We're a good team."

Yesterday proved to be more than just another bright spot in UMass' young 2006 season. It also marked UMass coach Sam Koch's 225th career win (167 with UMass). Koch has well established himself as the greatest men's soccer coach in UMass history, but he's more concerned with the task at hand.

"It feels good to win this one," Koch said after UMass' 1-0 overtime win against St. Bonaventure. "Whatever number it is, I don't know. This is the fifth win for us this season, and that's what we're focusing on."

DeSantis' goal ended the game, as well as a UMass shot drought. After two shots in the first half, the Minutemen were held to zero shots on goal until DeSantis put the game away in the extra frame.

"We didn't create the chances we needed to," Koch said on having no shots in the second half. "I give [St. Bonaventure] credit. They were very good at closing down the angles, shutting down the passing lanes and making it very difficult for us to get that ball through to the next touch."

"It's clear that one thing we need to keep working on is our finishing," he added. "We're not a good finishing team right now. We have to work on that if we're going to keep playing at the end of the year."

Koch tallies No. 225 in win over Bonnies

The Massachusetts men's soccer team earned its fifth victory of the 2006 season Sunday with a win over Atlantic 10 rival St. Bonaventure, continuing one of the best starts in program history. However, the win was also a landmark for one of the most successful coaches in UMass athletics.

UMass coach Sam Koch notched his 225th career win Sunday when the Minutemen defeated the Bonnies, the same team Koch knocked off for his first win as a UMass coach.

"Two hundred, or whatever it is, it just means I'm old," Koch said. "It doesn't mean anything [for the team]."

Koch is now 225-151-40 in his career and is the winningest men's soccer coach in UMass history (167 wins) with a winning percentage of .641. The win moves him into 33rd on the active coaches' list for victories. He is one of just six coaches in UMass history to record 200 wins, a feat he accomplished in a win over George Washington in 2003.

If you told him anything about those numbers, however, it would be news to him. No one on the team, player or coach, was aware that Koch was nearing the milestone.

"I didn't know anything about it," Koch said after the game.

Before coming to UMass in 1991, Koch was the men's soccer coach at Stanford for six years. Koch also spent time as an assistant at Boston University and Boston College.

He has been named Coach of the Year six different times spanning his entire career. Koch's first honor came in 1987 with Stanford in the Pacific Soccer

Minutewomen take down Albany in OT

The Massachusetts women's soccer team improved its season record to 4-1 with a 1-0 overtime win over the Albany Great Danes. The victory kept UMass' winning streak alive, stretching it to four straight.

It was the second shutout in as many games for red-shirt junior Kristin Walker. The New Jersey native has been solid between the posts for the Maroon and White, despite coming off of surgery to treat a torn ACL in January. She recorded three saves in the shutout, her 12th as a Minutewoman.

The game-winning goal was scored by senior defender/midfielder Nadia Villarroel with 8:25 remaining in the first overtime. It was the co-captain's first goal of the season and the sixth of her collegiate career.

Junior Britt Canfield and freshman Sydney Stoll both recorded assists on the decoding play.

Close calls and lip-biters were the theme of the game during regulation.

There were 14 shots on goal made throughout the course of the game, with the Minutewomen contributing 11 of them.

Several times the ball bounced off of various shinguards and fast-swinging legs mere yards from either goal. Both squads were unable, however, to put any of them into the back of the net.

At one point early in the game it looked as though the scoreless tie would be broken, but a UMass goal was called back due to a penalty, ultimately eliminating any hope of an early finish.

In the 57th minute, a foul to UMass in the Albany penalty area set up a penalty kick.

Rudy called on sophomore Melissa Toulouse to take the shot, but she hooked it wide left. At the end of regulation Toulouse was visibly shaken and distraught, fearing that her missed shot may lose her team the game.

Freshman Sydney Stoll quickly put her arm around her teammate, assuring her that it was not her fault and that they would get through the rest of the game together. After Villarroel scored the winning tally, Toulouse's relief was evident as she flashed a bright smile and received hugs from her teammates.

That great camaraderie does not surprise UMass coach Jim Rudy, however.

"That's the strength of this team," Rudy said. "That's why I like this team so much. They genuinely play for each other."

After 90 minutes of scoreless regulation, Rudy altered his strategy slightly in overtime.

Democrats push new 'netroots' campaign

U.S. Sen. John Kerry speaks to students in the Campus Center Auditorium of the University of Massachusetts, Sept. 8, 2006.

BY MATTHEW O'ROURKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Since the 1960s, college campuses have typically been farming grounds for Democrats, looking to turn out new voters. However, in recent elections, Republicans have been far more successful in mobilizing the electorate.

In a midterm election-year where control of the U.S. Congress is on the line, a new form of grassroots campaigning has emerged, aptly named "netroots" – internet-based campaigning – which Democrats hope will help them turn the tide.

Social networking groups such as Facebook.com now offer "Election 2006" issue groups which allow users to meet and get involved with topics they share concerns about.

Mark Zuckerberg, the founder of Facebook.com, recently formed a group named "Free Flow of Information on the Internet," one of over 500 groups dedicated to election issues.

"In the upcoming election, the free, unrestricted and unmanipulated flow of information is also vital to democracy," Zuckerberg wrote in an online posting.

This election year, the Rothenberg Political Report, a non-partisan newsletter which analyzes U.S. House and Senate races, states that Democrats are expected to gain 15 to 20 seats in the House and three to five in the Senate. They only need 15 seats to regain the majority in the House, six in the Senate.

Since former Gov. Howard Dean, D-Vt., was appointed to be the Democratic Party Chairman, the Democrats have increasingly focused on grassroots campaigning in an effort to mobilize young voters to get to the polls, especially in "red" states.

"Netroots" campaigning has been integrated into the Democratic Party's 50 State Strategy. Dean's plan to obtain votes through local activism. The plan states the Democrats can create a stronger party base by hiring "experienced local activists who know their communities."

On the party's official Web site, grassroots meets "netroots" through PartyBuilder, a political-social organizing program where users can create a blog and organize events locally. The Republican National Committee's website features similar web tools called MyGOP.com.

However, the "netroots" movement has not meant an end

UMass student dies in Iraq

BY ELIZABETH BEAMER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts lost one of its own on Sept. 4, 2006.

Lance Cpl. Eric P. Valdepenas, 21, of Seekonk, Mass. was killed while deployed with his Marine unit in Iraq.

His vehicle was hit by an improvised explosive device (IED) in the Al-Anbar province of Fallujah and two other servicemen were also killed in the attack, according to the United States Defense Department.

The team had been conducting combat operations against anti-Iraqi forces in the area, according to the Marine Corps. Valdepenas was a machine gunner in the 1st Battalion, 25th Marine Regiment reserve unit, also known as "New England's Own," based at Fort Denvens, Mass.

He was also a student who put his academic career on hold when his unit was called to duty last December. They were scheduled to return home next month. He had enrolled at UMass in 2003 and left in Sept. 2005.

During his time at UMass, Valdepenas had been enrolled as a pre-major in mechanical engineering. Valdepenas graduated from Bishop Hendricken School in Warwick, R.I. in 2003. A memorial scholarship fund has been established at the school in his remembrance.

His friend and platoon partner, Cpl. Andrew Gordon, who was in the vehicle behind Valdepenas when the fatal attack occurred, said Veldepenas will be missed.

"I know it is an old cliche that it's always the really good kids, the studs, that seem to die, and it's true in this case," said Gordon. "Eric was an awesome kid. He was the best machine gunner in the platoon. He knew his job inside and out. He was a great kid to be around to and was so easy to talk to nobody had any problems with him. We will all miss him terribly."

Valdepenas was the youngest of eight children. He's survived by his parents, Dr. Jesus Bernal Valdepenas and Anne-Marie Valdepenas; two brothers and five sisters. Valdepenas was honored with several military decorations throughout his deployment, including a Global War on Terrorism Service Medal, a National Defense Service Medal, a Combat Action Ribbon, a Sea Service Deployment Ribbon, an Armed Forces Reserve Medal, an Iraq Campaign Medal and a Purple Heart.

As of Tuesday, at least 2,657 U.S. military members have died since the beginning of the war in March, 2003, according to a recent Associated Press count.

Valdepenas was among two other Southern New England soldiers to be killed in about the last 10 days.

U.S. observes 5-year anniversary of 9/11

President George W. Bush and first lady Laura Bush place a wreath in a reflecting pool at the spot where the south tower of the World Trade Center once stood during a visit to ground zero in Manhattan, Sunday, September 10, 2006.

BY ASTY WESTFELTH AND ERIN MCCLAM
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK—Clutching photos to their hearts and blowing kisses to the sky, tearful loved ones of Sept. 11 victims recited a 3 1/2-hour litany of the lost Monday, the names echoing across an expanse still largely barren five years after terrorists destroyed the World Trade Center.

At the Pentagon and on a windswept Pennsylvania field, and in simpler, quiet moments in airport security lines, at churches or by themselves, Americans paused to reflect on the worst terrorist act on U.S. soil.

The centerpiece of the commemorations was the mostly barren 16-acre expanse at ground zero, where four moments of silence were observed to mark the precise times jetliners crashed into the twin towers and the skyscrapers crumbled to the ground.

The achingly familiar task of reading the names of the 2,749 trade center victims fell this year to their husbands, wives and partners, who personalized the roll call with heart-breaking tributes to the loves of their lives.

"If I could build a staircase to heaven, I would, just so I could quickly run up there to have you back in my arms," said Carmen Suarez, wife of city police officer Ramon Suarez, killed five years ago at the World Trade Center.

And this from Linda Litto, who lost husband Vincent Litto: "As I said 31 years ago tomorrow, I will love you and honor you all the days of our life. Happy anniversary, my love."

On a crisp, sunny day not unlike the morning of the attacks, family members descended into the pit 70 feet below ground where the towers stood, tearfully laying wreaths and roses in the skyscrapers' footprints.

The mournful sound of bagpipes, so familiar from the seemingly endless funerals that followed Sept. 11, echoed across ground zero after a choir performed the national anthem. The ritual has changed little since the first anniversary of the attacks, and in many ways the site has remained the same as well.

Squabbles over design and security have caused long delays in the project to rebuild at ground zero. Only this year did construction start on a Sept. 11 memorial and the 1,776-foot Freedom Tower, which is not expected to be finished for five more years.

President Bush laid a wreath at the Shanksville, Pa., field where United Flight 93 crashed, and privately greeted relatives of the 40 people killed there. Standing without umbrellas in a cold rain, he and first lady Laura Bush bowed their heads for a prayer and the singing of "Amazing Grace."

"One moment, ordinary citizens, and the next, heroes forever," retired Gen. Tommy Franks said, alluding to the Flight 93 passengers who apparently fought the hijackers and forced them to crash the plane into the ground. "We mourn their loss, to be sure, but we also celebrate their victory here in the first battle on terrorism."

The president ate breakfast with New York firefighters, and a day earlier walked ground zero and laid wreaths in reflecting pools that symbolized the north and south towers.

After visiting Shanksville on Monday, the president and first lady placed a wreath near a plaque on the outside of the Pentagon, where American Airlines Flight 77 claimed 184 lives and tore a gash in the building. Bush appeared tears-eyed as he greeted victims' family members around him, and he could be seen mouthing "God bless you" as he embraced them.

At an observance near the Pentagon, Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld strode side-by-side to a speaker's platform.

Rumsfeld appeared to struggle with his emotions as he recalled the day of the attacks, and Cheney vowed resolve. "We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power."

The day was marked with reminders of the sometimes tense new reality that settled on the nation, and particularly its transportation systems, after the attacks five years ago.

Students protest Iraq President's speech

BY KEN MAGUIRE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAMBRIDGE, Mass – On the eve of the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, former Iranian president Mohammed Khatami condemned Osama bin Laden and suicide bombing, but defended groups such as Hezbollah for what he characterized as resistance against Israeli colonialism.

Under tight security at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government, Khatami repeatedly praised the concept of democracy but said American politicians, in the wake of World War II, have been infatuated with "world domination."

In his 30-minute speech, "Ethics of Tolerance in the Age of Violence," the former president said he was one of the first world leaders to condemn "the barbarous acts" of Sept. 11.

Police estimated about 200 people showed up to protest. Some carried signs that read "Iran supports terror," others addressed the crowd with a bull horn.

Many protesters blamed Khatami for failing to stop government crackdowns on student activists in Tehran during his two terms in office. Several human rights organizations say the crackdowns are believed to have been initiated by his rivals and approved by Iran's ruling Muslim clerics.

Khatami was considered a reformist during his two terms as president that ended last year. But his visit to the United States drew criticism from some politicians and others because of the bitter dispute now under way between Iran and the United States over actions of his successor, Mahmoud Ahmedinejad.

"His speech is on ethics and violence. It would be very bizarre if the came here to speak on ethics and violence and did not acknowledge and discuss his own record in Iran," said 21-year-old Harvard student Eric Lesser. "Students were arrested and thrown in prison for speaking their mind in the same way we're doing right now."

Lesser is president of Harvard College Democrats, who teamed with their Republican peers for the protest.

Joshua Levin, 42, of Sharon, said he was angered by Khatami's presence at Harvard. "When someone this evil comes to your city you must oppose him. He's a fascist. He sponsors terror," Levin said.

Levin said he doesn't buy Khatami's reputation as a reformer. "Where's his courage to speak up? Look at his record."

There were no major problems, but police presence was heavy, according to Cambridge police spokesman Frank Pasquarello. One man was detained, although it was not immediately clear why.

Responding to a question from the audience about bin Laden, Khatami said he had two problems with the al-Qaida leader behind the terror attacks.

"First, because of the crimes he conducts," Khatami said, "and second because he conducts them in the name of Islam, the religion which is a harbinger of peace and justice."

Welcome back, students ... I hope we never meet!

When I meet you and your classmates, it's often one of the worst days of your lives.

That's because I'm the First Justice of the Eastern Hampshire District Court and we're probably seeing each other in my courtroom on Route 9 in Hadley … just a short trip from campus, but a seemingly endless ride when you're in the back seat of a police cruiser.

When you're making decisions, it's important to know what's at stake. For example, you may not realize that:

- A drug conviction can jeopardize your federal financial aid.
- Urinating in public is a form of indecent exposure and cause for arrest.
- Altering a driver's license is a felony; a felony conviction immediately disqualifies you from many jobs.
- Operating a motor vehicle under the influence carries a mandatory loss of license.

Remember that the legal drinking age is 21. If you're under 21 and in possession of alcohol, you'll be fined and lose your license for three months. Don't use a fake ID to buy alcohol, and don't commit a felony by altering a driver's license. If you're of age, don't purchase alcohol for those who aren't.

Never drink and drive. Because the risks are high, so are the consequences. If you're stopped by police and refuse to take a breath test, you'll lose your license just for refusing. Convictions for operating under the influence may include jail time and will definitely increase your insurance rates for years to come. First offenders don't get off easier, either. Penalties usually include mandatory substance abuse treatment, fines of more than $1,000 and loss of your license for between 45 days and a year. If you're under 21, your license will be revoked for at least 210 days.

If you get in trouble, your parents will find out. Under the law, you're considered an adult if you're over 18, which means you'll be charged differently than a juvenile. However, most students are still supported in part by their parents and are required to have them here to sign financial statements if requesting court-appointed lawyers.

Here are some other "do's" and "don'ts" for avoiding my courtroom.

Don't:

- host open parties in off-campus housing. If your guests are loud and unruly, you can be held responsible for violating noise bylaws, which can mean fines or even arrest. Remember that noise levels you think are reasonable may not seem so for neighbors who have young children, are elderly, or need to get up for work the next morning.
- argue with police officers at the scene of an arrest. The officers are doing their jobs, so be respectful, obey their lawful commands and air any grievances later with the Chief of Police. Remember, these are the first people you'll call if you need help.

Do:

- respect yourself and others. The majority of student cases in my court involve drugs and/or alcohol, and the majority of assaults, injuries, thefts and accidents can be traced back to illegal or excessive substance use. If you're receiving federal financial aid, a drug conviction can jeopardize your award until you complete treatment. Conviction for morals offenses like public urination, indecent assault or annoying and accosting members of the opposite sex can require registration as a sex offender.
- respect property on campus and in town. Property damage cases comprise a large part of my caseload. Destroying property, stealing, tagging and breaking into other students' rooms (a felony) are often tied to excessive substance use.
- come to court if you need the protection of a restraining order or wish to sue someone for monetary damages. Our staff is here to help you.
- visit us to learn about the Constitution, criminal and civil law and the jobs performed by court officers, probation officers, lawyers and judges. We're happy to share our career knowledge and guidance.

Enjoy your time in school, avoid a criminal record and protect your future by obeying the rules of the University, the town and the state. The majority of UMass Amherst students never cross the threshold of my courtroom, and I like it that way!

The Honorable Nancy R. Dusek-Gomez
First Justice, Eastern Hampshire District Court

Global warming tied to hurricanes

A driver passes around a fallen tree in Devonshire Middle Road, Bermuda, after Hurricane Florence hit the island, Sept. 11, 2006.

By Randolph E. Schmid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Most of the increase in ocean temperature that feeds more intense hurricanes is a result of human-induced global warming, says a study that one researcher says "closes the loop" between climate change and powerful storms like Katrina.

Series of studies over the past year or so have shown an increase in the power of hurricanes in the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, a strengthening that storm experts say is tied to rising sea-surface temperatures.

And most of that temperature increase can be blamed on global warming caused by human activities such as automobile and industrial pollution, scientists report in Wednesday's issue of Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences.

"The work that we've done kind of closes the loop here," said Tom Wigley of the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo., a co-author of the paper.

"The important conclusion is that the observed (sea-surface temperature) increases in these hurricane breeding grounds cannot be explained by natural processes alone," said Wigley. "The best explanation for these changes has to include a large human influence."

Benjamin Santer of Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory, Livermore, Calif., plus Wigley and their team studied the relationship of climate and hurricanes using 22 different climate models at 15 institutions around the world.

Climate models are complex sets of mathematical equations that high-speed computers use to simulate weather and climate and to forecast changes. The researchers used them to run 80 different simulations analyzing the response of sea-surface temperatures to a variety of factors and then compared the results from the independent models.

While previous studies have looked at entire oceans, this work focused on the smaller areas of the Atlantic and Pacific where tropical storms form.

This study builds a connection between the theoretical foundation of global warming and changes that are being observed in those areas where hurricanes are born, said Robert Corell of the American Meteorological Society, who moderated a briefing on the work.

While they reported the connection between rising ocean temperatures and increasing storm power, the researchers declined to predict future changes.

Asked if they would recommend changes in public policy, Greg Holland of the National Center for Atmospheric Research said, "It is important to note that we're not policymakers. Our role is to present the best possible conclusions from the available evidence."

Kerry Emanuel, a hurricane expert at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, added that regardless of global warming, the United States does need to address problems in dealing with hurricanes ranging from insurance to disaster response.

Not so sure of the findings was William M. Gray of Colorado State University, a longtime hurricane expert who issues forecasts each year of the expected number of storms.

Gray said the models do not deal with all necessary ocean processes and called the report "a desperate attempt to keep the bandwagon going. They've kept it going with global warming and now they want to keep it going with hurricanes."

"I am very sure over the test of time it will not hold up," said Gray, who was not part of the research team.

Philip Klotzbach, also of Colorado State, said that "sea-surface temperatures have certainly warmed over the past century, and that there is probably a human-induced component."

"To me, the big challenge is still determining what percentage is natural and what percentage is caused by humans. This paper sheds some light on that question; however, there is still a considerable amount of uncertainty," he said.

Christopher Landsea, a meteorologist at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's Hurricane Research Division in Miami, praised the new paper as very well thought out.

Anna Nicole Smith's son dies in Bahamas

By Jessica Robertson
Associated Press

NASSAU, Bahamas — The 20-year-old son of Anna Nicole Smith died while visiting his mother in the hospital where the reality TV star and former Playboy playmate had given birth last week, a Bahamas police official said Monday.

Daniel Wayne Smith died Sunday in his mother's room at Doctors' Hospital in Nassau, Reginald Ferguson, assistant commissioner of the Royal Bahamian Police Force, said in an interview with The Associated Press. He said an autopsy was under way.

Smith arrived Saturday night in the Bahamas and apparently went directly to the hospital where he spent the night, Ferguson said.

"It would appear from our report that the mother had gotten up, saw him in the chair and he appeared to be sound asleep," he said. "She tried to wake him up, he was unresponsive, and she sounded the alarm."

Medical personnel arrived and pronounced him dead at the scene, Ferguson said.

Anna Nicole Smith, 38, gave birth to a healthy 6-pound, 9-ounce girl at the hospital Thursday, her Web site said.

"Anna Nicole is absolutely devastated by the loss of her son. He was her pride and joy and an amazing human being," a statement on the site said. It said that drugs or alcohol were not believed to be a factor.

Her son had traveled to the Caribbean country "to share in the joy of his baby sister," the statement said. "Please do not make any press inquiries at this time so that Anna Nicole can grieve in peace."

Daniel Smith was the product of Smith's 1985 marriage to Billy Smith. The couple, who met while working together at Jim's Krispy Fried Chicken in Mesita, Texas, divorced in 1987.

The son had small roles in her movies "Skyscraper" and "To the Limit."

Robin Bonifaci, a spokeswoman for Trimspa, the diet products company that has been endorsed by Smith, said she did not know the name of the baby girl's father.

Bus company reaches agreement with state

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — A company that runs a low-price bus service between Boston and New York reached an agreement with state inspectors on Monday that keeps their fleet on the road, at least for now.

The owners of the Fung Wah Bus Transportation bus line were ordered to appear before state regulators today after one of their buses rolled over in Auburn on Sept. 5, injuring 34 people.

Under a consent agreement with the Transportation Division of the Department of Telecommunications and Energy, Fung Wah buses will be subject to scheduled and unscheduled inspections and driver checks over the next 30 days.

The company has also agreed to steps to improve safety, including immediately ceasing to use buses that have not been maintained in a safe and sanitary condition.

Under the agreement, the company also said it would cease "from operating buses without properly trained drivers who are not sufficiently able to read and speak the English language and to converse with the general public."

The agreement was signed by Fung Wah President Pei Lin Liang and Brian F. Cristy, director of DTE's Transportation Division.

According to a statement issued by Cristy, state inspectors, the State Police Truck Team and staff from the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration will ramp up inspections of the company's buses over the next 30 days, both at the company's garage and the South Station Bus Terminal.

I-ang entered and left the closed door hearing Tuesday, bypassing reporters camped in front of the agency's front door.

As part of the agreement, the company also agreed to produce more documents, including any written safety policies distributed to drivers, written emergency procedures for drivers and drug and alcohol test results for the driver involved in the accident.

Back-to-school rush cost billions

By Sarah Daugherty
Daily Pennsylvanian (U. Penn)

PHILADELPHIA — The back-to-school crunch will result in at least $26.6 billion spent by college students, but forget long lines at Target as you put the finishing touches on your dorm room. College students are spending their money online.

And they're a group Internet merchandisers are increasingly interested in targeting.

Students will spend those billions on products ranging from furniture to books to office supplies, and almost one third of them will make their purchases online, according to the National Retail Federation — a 6.3 percent increase from last year.

Retailers are responding by using more and more online forums to target college students.

Bed, Bath and Beyond, for instance, features a "Shop For College" tab on its Web site. Walmart.com has a "Back to College" section and ad campaign with the slogan "College Happens."

Wharton senior Sebastien Hutchinson said he bought his computer monitor off the Internet and frequently shops online for clothing.

"It makes life a lot easier," he said. "There's a bigger selection online."

College and Wharton sophomore Clay Lechleiter had never actually seen the mattress he purchased for his new room before it was delivered when he moved in two weeks ago.

Ivan Saks, director of marketing for Dial-A-Mattress/1-800-Mattress — the company from which Lechleiter purchased his new bedding accessory — said the back-to-college rush offers them a significant business opportunity in a very narrow time frame.

During the back-to-college rush, Saks said, the percentage of mattress orders placed online spikes dramatically.

There is "definitely a willingness on the part of younger buyers to purchase through new e-commerce technology," Saks added.

Even the University of Pennsylvania is getting involved in the e-commerce phenomenon.

Campus Express, for example, allows incoming students to purchase computers and textbooks online before they arrive on campus.

This year saw a 20 percent increase in online textbook orders compared to last year, according to Rhea Lewis, a spokeswoman for Penn Business Services.

She declined to provide specific sales figures.

And spending large sums of money online on products like mattresses and televisions is also a new phenomenon, he said.

"To be able to [spend hundreds of dollars] over the Internet and feel comfortable is definitely a younger phenomenon," Saks said.

For college students traveling long distances to get to school, online shopping simply makes more sense than lugging large items from home.

"A lot of people who are sitting in their homes in Phoenix, or Paris, France — they're using the Internet because they're so unfamiliar with the local landscape," he said.

Sept. 11 families pay tribute to victims

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

BOSTON — A mother, a husband, a brother.

Carie Lemack, Christie Coombs and Caroline Duncan lost different people five years ago on Sept. 11. But they have all found ways to use their grief to pay tribute to their loved ones.

Lemack honors her mother, Judy Larocque, by lobbying for policies to prevent future terrorist attacks. Coombs memorializes her husband, Jeff, through a foundation that gives money to such people as parents who need wheelchair ramps for their handicapped children or widows who have lost their husbands to illness. Duncan honors her brother by telling her 3-year-old daughter stories about the Uncle Tim she never met.

These three women are among hundreds of people in Massachusetts who lost members of their families when terrorists hijacked two planes from Boston's Logan International Airport and crashed them into the World Trade Center in New York. In total, 203 Massachusetts natives or people with strong ties to the state were killed in the terrorist attacks.

In the five years since that day, the families' lives have changed in ways big and small, and in other ways they find difficult to put into words. At times, the grief feels less acute. Other times, it comes crashing down on them again, re-triggered by the release of a new 911 tape from the terrorist attacks, a child's high school graduation without his father, or a wedding anniversary.

Deborah Rivlin, a grief counselor who runs support groups for the Massachusetts families, said she's been amazed by the things people have done to not only cope with their own loss, but to help others. the two widows who organized an annual bike-a-thon from Boston to New York to raise money to help widows in Afghanistan, the country where Sept. 11 terrorists received their training; the woman who established a lecture series to promote peace, in memory of her husband, the more than 100 people who have established scholarships and charitable foundations in the names of their relatives.

"What has struck me the most is they did not fall apart and crawl into a hole and say, 'Life stinks, and I hate everyone.' They made meaning of their child's life or their sibling's life or their spouse's life, and said, 'How do I honor them?'" Rivlin said.

"There are so many stories like that," she said.

Friends and relatives of the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks gather during the playing of the national anthem at ground zero on the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center.

CHRISTIE COOMBS

Christie Coombs was happily raising three children with her husband of 17 years when she heard that his plane had hit the World Trade Center.

Four days later, she took their children to the town soccer fields where they played and her husband coached. League officials offered to temporarily cancel the soccer games out of respect for her husband, but Coombs thought the best way to honor him was to let the games continue and make her children's lives as normal as possible.

In the five years since Sept. 11, Coombs has kept those goals.

She devotes most of her time to raising her children, and spends the rest of her time raising money for the Jeffrey Coombs Memorial Foundation, which has given out $270,000 in scholarships and to various people Coombs hears about. Coombs recently made a grant to a widow so she and her 8-year-old son could go on vacation.

Jeffrey Coombs, a security analyst for Compaq, was traveling to Los Angeles on business on American Airlines Flight 11. He died a week before his 43rd birthday.

Coombs' children were 13, 11 and 7 when their father died.

Matthew, now 18, graduated from Abington High School this spring and is starting business classes at Fairfield University. Meaghan, now 16, is a junior in high school and recently organized a second annual memorial concert to raise money for her father's foundation. Julia, 12, still plays soccer — her father was her team's coach — and is about to start junior high.

Christie said she has come a long way in five years in her ability to cope with her grief. She is among about a dozen Massachusetts widows who meet once a month in an informal support group. In the beginning, they talked mostly about their loss, but these days, they talk about everything going on in their lives.

"We don't call it a widows' group anymore, we call it 'ladies going out to lunch,'" said Coombs.

Coombs, 45, said there are daily painful moments, like when she looks at her husband's picture the minute she wakes up.

"I cried on my son's graduation day. It should have been a happy occasion, but it just didn't feel right with him not there," she said.

Coombs, who works part-time as a freelance reporter and public relations specialist, has written extensively about Sept. 11 and its aftermath. She said she's never allowed her grief to turn into anger.

"I don't know who to be angry at. I could be angry at the government, I could be angry at Osama bin Laden, I could be angry at the airport personnel for not being more vigilant that day, but that would be a waste of energy," she said.

CAROLINE DUNCAN

Caroline Duncan has just gotten to the point where she can look at photographs of her older brother, Timothy Stout, a quality assurance analyst for Cantor Fitzgerald who worked on the 103rd floor of the World Trade Center.

There is one that shows the two of them in 1961 — Tim, a curly haired 2-year-old gazing adoringly at his newborn baby sister. Another shows brother and sister as carefree teenagers, smiling and soaking up the sun on the deck of a sailboat. Then there's Tim riding a horse with his son.

Duncan has put these family photos in albums she plans to give to her father, mother and brother on the fifth anniversary of the day Tim died.

She struggled trying to think of something she could do for her family to mark the somber occasion. She also looked for a way for others to remember her brother, a man who was devoted to his family.

Duncan says she worries that "9/11" has become a term to describe an event rather than the day her brother and 3,000 other people died.

"These beautiful people who were killed that day because they went to work," she says. "I wish people would spend more time remembering the individuals who died."

Tim Stout was 42 when he died. He'd been married for 10 years, and lived with his wife and three children in Dobbs Ferry, N.Y.

Stout was a natural athlete, an avid runner and cross-country skier, who was on crew teams in high school and college. He was funny, sensitive and sometimes quirky. While other kids were learning French or Spanish to satisfy language requirements in school, he made special arrangements to learn Norwegian.

But mostly, he was a family man, Duncan said.

"He was always the one to call, just to see how we were doing," she said. "For him, it was all about his kids and his family. If we wanted anybody to remember anything about him, it would be that he was a good dad."

Full speed ahead.

Bush: Set aside differences on terrorism

Station was briefly evacuated because of a suspicious duffel bag that turned out to be holding only trash. And a jet bound for San Francisco was diverted to Dallas after a backpack and handheld e-mail device were found on board. Both items were pronounced harmless.

And lest anyone forget the terrorists responsible for the day, al-Qaida's second in command warned of forthcoming strikes in the Persian Gulf and against Israel in a new video Monday.

It was one of three al-Qaida videos released around the 9-11 anniversary. One showed images of the fuel-laden jets striking the trade center, and in another Osama bin Laden smiled and chatted with the plotters of the attacks.

At Boston's Logan Airport, security screeners wearing wristbands that read "We will never forget" stopped checking passengers for a moment to mark the anniversary, and travelers waiting in line — another legacy of the attacks — paused to join the tribute.

At Dallas Fort-Worth International, speakers at a ceremony paused intermittently as jets roared overhead, and an employee choir sang "God Bless America."

Ceremonies around the country inevitably included salutes to police and firefighters.

Outside an elementary school in Mascoutah, Ill., not far from Scott Air Force Base, Lt. Col. Jim Williams attended a Sept. 11 ceremony but said the first responders were the true heroes of the day.

"I'm in the military and defend the country, but only in certain times," he said. "They do this every day."

In Akron, Ohio, firefighters rolled their trucks out of their garages and sounded their sirens for 30 seconds at the moment the south tower of the trade center collapsed, and again a half-hour later for the north tower.

Dave Johnson, a 69-year-old retiree, was completing his daily walk along Las Olas Boulevard in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and said he worried the nation had grown less vigilant over the five-year span.

"It changed everybody's life, even if they don't admit it," he said.

The families of the nearly 3,000 people killed five years ago made their way through the anniversary as best they could, the rituals now familiar but never easier.

Among them was the family of Candace Lee Williams, 20, who was on American Flight 11, the first plane to hit the trade center. Her mother, Sherrie Williams, remains haunted by the way her daughter died, but comes to ground zero every year "to keep her legend alive."

Sherrie Williams and her son begin the way by visiting Candace's grave in Danbury, Conn., covering it with yellow roses, her favorite. Then they get on a train and travel to lower Manhattan.

And so the mother found herself at ground zero on Monday morning, holding a large, framed photo of her blonde, blue-eyed daughter.

"It's so hard to believe the five years have passed," Sherrie Williams said. "She would have been 25. She wanted to do so much with her life."

World remembers 9/11, but many not crying

By Elaine Ganley
Associated Press

PARIS — The nations of the world joined Monday in solemn remembrance of Sept. 11 — but for many, resentment of the United States flowed as readily as tears.

Critics say Americans have squandered the goodwill that prompted France's Le Monde newspaper to proclaim "We are all Americans" that somber day after the attacks, and that the Iraq war and other U.S. policies have made the world less safe in the five years since.

Heads bowed in moments of silence for the 3,000 killed in the attacks on New York and Washington — while the No. 2 al-Qaida leader issued new warnings in a videotape. And dissident voices said the world has traded in civil liberties and other democratic rights in its war on terror.

In Europe, where Islamic terror has struck twice since 9/11, in the Madrid train bombings and the London transit attacks, the silent tributes were tinged with doubts and recriminations.

Even German Chancellor Angela Merkel — an advocate of repairing ties with Washington that were frayed under her predecessor Gerhard Schroeder — had veiled criticism of the United States, saying: "The ends cannot justify the means."

"In the fight against international terror ... respect for human rights, tolerance and respect for other cultures must be the maxim of our actions, along with decisiveness and international cooperation," she said.

The international landscape has changed irreversibly since terrorists hijacked four airliners in 2001, crashing two into the World Trade Center, one into the Pentagon and another into a Pennsylvania field.

Adding to the global jitters, a senior al-Qaida leader issued a new warning.

"You gave us every legitimacy and every opportunity to continue fighting you," said Ayman al-Zawahiri, addressing the United States. "You should worry about your presence in the [Persian] Gulf and the second place you should worry about is Israel."

Another video posted on the Internet by al-Qaida showed previously unseen footage of a smiling Osama bin Laden and other commanders in a mountain camp apparently planning the Sept. 11 attacks.

Allies in the U.S.-led war on terrorism renewed their resolve Monday to fight fanaticism, while skeptics countered that they can no longer follow a superpower they say has relinquished its right to lead.

"Right after Sept. 11 the world was united with Americans. Their moral leadership was unquestioned," Pawel Zalewski, head of the Polish parliament's foreign relations committee, wrote in the Gazeta Wyborcza. "However, this strong moral authority was abused as a result of the Iraq war."

Exactly five years after its message of solidarity, Le Monde titled its lead editorial "The Mistakes of Bush."

In Caracas, Venezuela, about 200 marchers protested what they called "imperialist terrorism" carried out by the United States since the 9/11 attacks. Demonstrators — many of them supporters of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and some of Arab descent — carried Lebanese, Syrian and Palestinian flags. Many criticized the U.S. invasions of Iraq and Afghanistan.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani wrote President Bush on behalf of the Iraqi people, expressing condolences to the families of Sept. 11 victims.

"On this sad and memorable day, I would like to reiterate the gratitude of the people of Iraq for the people of America and for your leadership," Talabani wrote. "The people of Iraq will never forget those who helped them in getting rid of the most brutal and terrorist regime of Saddam Hussein."

New Zealand's Prime Minister Helen Clark joined many when she said: "No, we're not more secure since 9/11."

Clark said more should be done to reach out to moderate states and leaders in the Islamic world to encourage understanding between different peoples, and to help end the sense of alienation and exclusion among some young Muslims that fuels extremism.

In Europe, bells tolled in Rome's city hall square. Bouquets of white roses and yellow carnations were piled in a memorial garden where the names of 67 Britons killed in the New York attacks are inscribed. Relatives tearfully remembered their dead.

"It doesn't get any easier, but our minds are much calmer, and we can think through all the events without being flooded by tears and sadness," said Adrian Bennett, whose 29-year-old son, Oliver, was killed.

to grassroots campaigning. At a Friday rally in the Campus Center Auditorium at the University of Massachusetts, which was co-sponsored by the Massachusetts Victory '06 campaign, the UMass College Democrats set up voter registration tables and held a training session for new grassroots activists.

Student Government Association President Elvis Mendez, a speaker at the event, acknowledged the power of the Web to influence, citing a recent petition on Facebook.com which nearly half a million people signed in a day.

"You're telling me we can get 500,000 students behind a social networking site but we can't get 500,000 to vote?" Mendez said. "It takes as much time to register for Facebook as it does to register to vote."

U.S. Sen. John F. Kerry, D-Mass., who was the keynote speaker at the event, acknowledged that the Republicans' ability to get people to the polls has hampered the Democrats and might have been a key reason as to why he lost the 2004 Presidential election.

"We didn't win because they've also learned how to turn people out," Kerry said. "That's why this street battle is so critical. That's why having you involved is so much a part of this fight."

The "netroots" movement has already had some success this year. In Connecticut, Greenwich businessman Ned Lamont upset three-term U.S. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman for the Democratic nomination for U.S. Senate in July, which has been largely attributed to liberal bloggers and online activists.

The Massachusetts Victory '06 campaign, as part of a larger grassroots effort by the Democratic National Committee, is enlisting "Precinct Captains," neighborhood leaders in charge of voter turnout.

Kerry said students should "do more than simply vote themselves, but should also organize in groups and head into neighborhoods, particularly ones that traditionally vote for Republican candidates.

"Nothing is more powerful than going and knocking on doors," Kerry said. "Just get out and have a conversation with an American who doesn't agree with you."

Getting into college may get easier, study says

By Julie Steinberg
Daily Pennsylvanian (U. Penn)

PHILADELPHIA — University of Pennsylvania freshman Douglas Halperin got in to Penn during the most competitive admissions season in the University's history.

His mom — Debra Halperin — faced much better odds when she was admitted in 1979.

And when Douglas' sister Katie applies to colleges in 2008, her chances of getting in might be much better than her brother's and could look more like her mom's.

This is because Katie will apply to college during a steep decline in the number of graduating high school seniors, a decline that will likely change the face of higher education.

For the past 10 years, a swell in the number of students applying to college has made the admissions process extremely competitive.

All that is about to change.

Most of the "baby boomletter" generation — those born in the 1980s and early 1990s — will have degrees by 2009. After that, the number of new high-school graduates will start to decline.

And a shrinking applicant pool means that getting into many colleges will get easier.

Though the number of new high-school graduates is projected to drop 4 percent in 2009, Northeastern states will experience an even steeper decline. The Department of Education predicts a 10-percent decline in Pennsylvania, a figure that could spell trouble for schools that aren't exactly awash in applicants today.

Yet University officials say the decline will not affect the competitiveness of Penn's admissions.

"Penn will not be affected much since Penn already has more than seven applicants for every one student we admit," said Bernard Lentz, who is responsible for analyzing statistics about Penn.

Lentz added that the schools most affected by the decline would be those "that already have difficulty filling their incoming class."

Large numbers of students are still likely to apply to the nation's top schools, leaving Penn with a comfortable number of applicants.

Schools that will face challenges will likely be smaller, private colleges.

But some of these universities have already implemented strategies to stave off the coming decline in applicants.

Chestnut Hill College, for example, went co-ed in 2003, increasing its number of potential applicants.

The University of the Arts also foresaw the problem and enacted measures to combat the effects.

"In 2001, we realized what would happen after 2009, when less kids would be graduating," Director of Financial Aid Chris Pesorski said. "We've tried to extend our geographical presence in the South and the Midwest, where the decline won't be as high."

Views from the other side of the globe

How do Chinese people see America? What do Americans think of China? These two questions were the topic of discussion on "Up Close," an hour-long news talk program that aired on the Chinese broadcasting station CCTV9 on July 30. I happened to catch it while visiting family in Shanghai this summer.

The featured guest of the show was Professor Sun Zhe, deputy director of the Center for American Studies at Fudan University in Shanghai. When you're an American living in America, it's not often that you hear outsiders analyzing your country from a completely foreign perspective, the way we have Middle Eastern Studies or East European Studies at our schools. Catching a glimpse of this process can really be enlightening, but the thing is, whenever groups of people study each other from opposite sides of an ocean, they tend to get some parts wrong.

For example, the folks at American Studies in China believe that most of the power in our government still lies in the legislative branch, particularly those concerning foreign policy decisions. Little do they know how things have changed; do a search on Bush, presidential statements and cherry-picking for just one example.

On the other hand, American audience members of the talk show (mostly exchange students and some teachers) mentioned China's government and economic policy as areas of concern, echoing many politicians and pundits back home.

Professor Zhe told a story about Sen. Joe Biden's visit to China in 2001. He was received as a guest speaker at Fudan University, where a dialogue was held with the professor's students in American Studies. At one point, Biden reportedly commiserated with the students about their having suffered 20 years of oppression under the communist government, and likely having to suffer 20 more.

The senator went on to ask the students whether they believed it possible for capitalism and socialism to ever coexist, at which point one replied, "Mr. Biden, I suggest you visit Xin Tian Di (an entertainment-shopping hotspot in Shanghai), and you will see that capitalism is alive and well here. In fact, if you visit one of the bars, they will probably treat you to a free beer."

Comments like Biden's come off sounding like Americans still think of China the way they did during the Cold War era — grimy buildings and uniform blue worksuits, soldiers goose-stepping down the street. Not so anymore.

There are no soldiers in sight, no Big Brother breathing down your neck. Young adults dress in the latest fashions, tout the newest cell phones and have access to all the modern conveniences of the developed world.

Urban development progresses at a breakneck pace, with new apartments, shopping malls, movie theaters, restaurants and recreation centers rising from sprawling cityscapes by the month. There are no soldiers in sight, no Big Brother breathing down your neck. Young adults dress in the latest fashions, tout the newest cell phones and have access to all the modern conveniences of the developed world. The commercial district in Shanghai, filled with gleaming skyscrapers and multiplexes, perfect, but when one views the other, it is often through a one-way lens that enlarges its target's flaws, while rarely turning around to look at itself.

Caffeine relaxes them

Michael Toomey

This summer, as you all well know, Massachusetts weather was establishing itself as the atmospheric Cliff's Notes to "Dante's Inferno," or at least it was until I took off. Just about when I had unwillingly clunked into the groove of a toiling grocery job, where at every and any opportunity I'd wander off to sit down somewhere, anywhere, usually aiming to squander at least two hours hanging out in the men's room, I got the hell out of there.

Career-wise, this was an advisable choice to have made, because as far as I know, bowing out looks better on one's work record than being terminated for a work-ethic comparable to the combined efforts of both Beavis and Butthead. But my dubious repertoire might appear intact elsewhere, as the lifestyle of my Aegean destination might suggest, but you be the judge.

I arrived on Friday, and although I wasn't visiting the infamously decadent Greek Isles, dubbed wildly hedonistic by a guy we call the off-the-hook guy because he's quite the excitable fellow, the night life was nearing hedonistic, in its ubiquity that is. Everyone and their mother were out, or so it seemed.

Imagine Boylston Street in Boston on New Year's Eve or Kenmore Square during the play-offs, and that's what the streets were like on that obscure Friday I arrived in Thessaloniki. OK, so that alone is nothing. A bustling nightlife does not qualify the majority of a nation as complacent or as lazy.

It's in my estimation that the Greeks are a people well aware of the virtue, but more importantly, the necessity in taking it easy. After the initial hubbub, which is more or less universal to the weekend around the world, my girlfriend and I set out to see the weekday proceedings of the city. Flabbergasted as I was, the cafes that practically took up all the leased commercial space were also packed by a pretty comprehensively aged patronage. My girl, a dual Greek-American citizen, tells me this is nothing new, and it manifests to a mostly impartial viewer as a whole lot of people sitting, lounging around with frappes when you'd think they'd likely be working.

Greece is coincidentally Nescafe's first leg on their way to world domination.

As if that wasn't relaxed enough, at around six or so everything is closed, save the cafes. So, more frappes are in order of course, by the thousand mind you. I later discovered the largely taken-advantage of quiet hours of two to five in the afternoon, which are astonishingly similar to my own back in my American schedule.

Now, the obvious congruities between myself and the Greeks could lead me to several rational conclusions: maybe I am, in fact a Greek? No way. Maybe the Greeks have been keeping a watchful eye on my lifestyle to match up step for step, nap for nap? Also rather unlikely. OK, well then maybe the Greeks are just lazy? Brushing word choice aside, perhaps we're onto something here.

Everything's pointing in that direction. They seem to have more days off than on (if any at all.) They close shop early but are never late to hang out, be it at a cafe during the day or a techno-thumping bar at night, and don't even mention Sunday to a Greek worker unless it involves the beach.

Seeing all of this unfold over the course of my substantial, month-long stay, I was beginning to regard the whole matter as one of national emphasis. Where I, the American, have been largely conditioned to consider myself the center of the universe, but the catch is that I'm also taught getting there is simply a matter of working hard enough for long enough.

I realize this column is entirely speculative into what made my summer so hectic in the States. People in the U.S. push me for 40 hours of torture, ironically for my betterment. My summer in Greece was wonderfully lazy, and I wasn't perched richly on a beach resort either, with people inviting me for coffee thrice daily. At the same time, I realize it could simply be that Greece is coincidentally Neseafe's first leg on their way to world domination.

If we just take a look at the bare-boned observables I noticed during my stay we have these: The Greek work force appears to be laxly scheduled, allowing them to patronize restaurants and enjoy frappes; there seems to be a consensus between business competitors to jointly acknowledge a semi-official siesta and close relatively early leading to increased frappe consumption.

That's a conspiracy if I've ever seen one. So we must be wary for the first signs of invasion, perhaps the first surfacing of advertisement, because it's only a matter of time before it reaches the Western shore. I guess frappe centered lifestyle isn't too bad, if you're lazy that is.

Neo Liberal policies in Latin America

Wesley Miller

As of late, the eyes of American economists have largely turned to Asia. Latin America remains an area of major economic and political change worthy of our attention. While so-called Neo Liberal economics have taken the forefront in Mexico, Central America and Chile, the regional trade bloc MERCOSUR seesaws between becoming a regional superpower likened to the European Union or an unstable left-wing enterprise.

For those of you unfamiliar with the idea of Neo Liberal economics, allow me to clarify the idea with a brief history, though I suggest if this really piques your interest to read up on the idea yourself. The Neo Liberal economic period in Latin America marks a shift from formerly protectionist economic policies to an increased involvement with foreign interests such as the import of foreign capital, free trade agreements (such as NAFTA) and the political intervention of foreign interests.

While certain countries such as Mexico, Chile and, to a lesser extent, Columbia and Peru have opened their markets to foreign investment, others have encouraged regional trade and protectionist policies, notably the MERCOSUR trade group consisting of Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay, Uruguay and the possible inclusion of Venezuela and Bolivia.

A recent case study jointly performed by The University of Texas at Austin and Princeton University followed the recent developments in major Latin American cities as a result of Neo Liberal economic policy. Research found a marked transition from and recession centers rising from sprawling cityscapes by the state to a focus on mobilizing groups bottom up, starting with the individual. At the heart of this transition is a shift of responsibility from the state to non-governmental organizations, such as neighborhood, business and regional groups. They argue that the shift of home capital to foreign investment has turned central government into a massive bureaucracy. At the local level, Neo Liberal economics lifts the burden of a large bureaucracy, but charges the state with more responsibility and a loss of overall autonomy.

The study shows that the effectiveness of these new policies largely depends on the individual history of each country. Though Argentina saw a large economic downturn in 2001, it is likely to show a quick recovery due to a long history of relative economic and political stability, not to mention its location as a natural port for international trade.

Unfortunately, areas that have long been subject to violence and illegal activity have shown a marked downturn, particularly those areas with corrupt police forces and weak local governments. Areas of Brazil and Peru have reverted to neighborhood watches and communal living in order to function normally.

The recent rise of Hugo Chavez and Bolivia's Evo Morales have shown us that despite the success of Neo Liberal economic policies in some areas, revolutionary discourse is alive, well and potentially subversive of U.S. policies in Latin America. Chavez is reportedly in talks with Russian oil giant Gazprom to expand pipelines into Bolivia and potentially as far as Argentina through the MERCOSUR trade bloc. Chavez is particularly well known for his anti-imperialist agenda, including anti-U.S. propaganda. In Bolivia, with the support of Venezuela, indigenous militias are working to regain control of national resources including oil. Though MERCOSUR is considering the admission of both countries, it has not shown support for Chavez' revolutionary ideas, including, but not limited to, military mobilization.

MERCOSUR itself has proven a precarious arrangement. Brazil tends to dominate the trade bloc, enforcing its own policies over the collective. Unlike the EU, bureaucracy in MERCOSUR is small and potential unity is hindered by the presence of protectionist policies. According to the Guardian Unlimited, Brazil, Paraguay and Uruguay have shown disappointment with the arrangement and pursued trade agreements with Washington. Though Bush's Free Trade of the Americas agreement was a resounding failure and met with popular opposition, countries in the MERCOSUR have shown reasonable cooperation with U.S. trade with reluctance to pursue official policy.

It is in our national interest to keep abreast of developments in Latin America. If anything, we need to acknowledge that as we stand on the brink of a global age, we need to be extremely conscious of its effects. Though Neo Liberalization has shown marked economic growth for these countries, I would hope it goes without saying that it brings enormous economic disparity between the rich and poor. Whether that plays out at a national (Chavez) or local (terrorism, militias) level is hard to say. After all, economic reforms have produced a resilient economy in Chile and parts of Central America. If we want to prevent the negative reactions we've seen in developing nations throughout the world, knowledge and diplomacy are essential to our relations with Latin America in the coming era.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

RACISM USED TO JUSTIFY WAR

Andrew Freeman's article, "Winning the War of Ideas," concludes that the "war on terrorism has many fronts around the world, but shares one face, Fundamentalist Islam." This assumption, borrowed from the discriminatory and racist argument that Mr. Freeman puts out is that there is something unique about Islam, which makes Muslims prone to terrorism.

That notion comes straight from the rulers of society, with the likes of President Bush declaring a war on Islamic Fascism, which effectively means the War on Terror has become synonymous with a war on Arabs and Muslims.

What's worse is that this hate seeps into the rest of society. A recent USA Today and Gallop Poll, for example, found that 39 percent of responders said they felt some prejudice against Muslims. Another 22 percent said they wouldn't want Muslims as neighbors.

Racism has historically been used to justify imperial adventures. The rise of "Islamophobia" is not a unique occurrence, but a calculated measure both to dehumanize the victims of the wars in the Middle East and to crackdown on domestic dissent. Recently, for example, an Iraqi-American wearing a t-shirt with the slogan, "We Will Not Be Silent," in both Arabic and English was not allowed to board his plane until he had covered his T-shirt.

Airport officials, who seem to have been unaware that the slogan itself originated with a group of German students attempting to arouse resistance to the Nazis' persecution of the Jews, did not rebut his argument that he had a right to express dissent. Rather, after the manner of tyrants everywhere, they merely suppressed his speech.

This is just one incident of discrimination and persecution Arabs and Muslims face across the country, not to mention the numerous hate crimes committed each year that go unreported. Scapegoating has become an essential stepping stone to achieve the objectives of U.S. foreign policy. U.S. officials have relied on it recently in their support of Israel's invasion and occupation of Lebanon, an atrocity which has killed over 1,000 Lebanese civilians and displaced close to a million.

However, the United States can't be relied on as a force of progressive social change. With 63 percent of Americans disapproving of the occupation of Iraq, more and more people understand that the War on Terror is actually a war of terrorism. The United States has a blood-stained history of supporting terrorist efforts, from funding and arming apartheid South Africa and the Indonesian military dictatorship under Gen. Suharto, to training the mujahideen, led by Osama Bin Laden, in Afghanistan.

This is just the tip of the iceberg, lest we forget the current atrocities carried out in Iraq (Abu Ghraib, the massacres in Fallujah and Haditha, etc.) to the strangulation of the Palestinian people. The Bush Administration has its eyes set on breaking the back of any resistance that rises to its hegemony in the Middle East. The United States is the biggest threat to peace and security in the world.

It's time we unite in solidarity with our Arab and Muslim brothers and sisters to stand up to racist scape-goating and to resist U.S. and Israeli wars of aggression and occupation in the Middle East.

NEW MUSIC TUESDAY

'Peeping Tom'

Over the past 20 or so years, Mike Patton has developed a reputation for his ability to explore his artistic potential in seemingly limitless genres of music. The former Faith No More and Mr. Bungle singer has a habit of not sticking to one path and despite, or more likely because of, this has accumulated a massive cult. His latest project, Peeping Tom, has been in the works for years while hoards of drooling fans have followed every inkling of detail about the band.

Promised to be Patton's experiment in modern pop music, the self-titled debut from Peeping Tom is the mix of accessibility and psychosis that was expected from that description. Far more likely to appeal to fans of Patton's more relatively mainstream projects (Lounge Jonathaxk, Mr. Bungle's "California" album, than to the pop charts, "Peeping Tom" does still offer plenty for a wide audience.

While the fact that Patton collaborated with a number of different musicians on each track means that many songs have different feels to them, "Peeping Tom," as a whole, has a trip-hop feel with dalliances with big rock moments. It's crossover music that can be sultry and lounge ("Sulcker," which features Norah Jones!, hip-hop ("Getaway" with Kool Keith), or hard rock ("We're Not Alone" with the Dub Trio), but always has a vaguely futuristic feel to it. The diversity and consistent quality of the album means that any song can pack as much of a punch as the next, and each song could be anybody's favorite. "Your Neighborhood Spaceman" starts laid-back with a strong groove, launches into the passively twisted middle, turns into a tight hip-hop track, then starts all over. However, the diversity all operates with the range of the project's basis, songs Patton would imagine on the radio.

While people who exclusively enjoy the more hard-hitting, earth-shaking moments in Patton's discography probably won't find too much to like about "Peeping Tom," there are plenty of vocal acrobatics, perverse lyrics and miscellaneous musical oddities. Nothing that Peeping Tom does on this album pushes boundaries quite like other Patton projects but it sets up and executes its purpose well.

As always, Patton's work requires patience, but it always pays off. "Peeping Tom" comes out of the gate strong and proves to be a grower, though it may not have the conceptual depth of some of his other work. In the lexicon of Patton, "Peeping Tom" should be able to stand up to most of his stronger works, even if it's not a classic. Between the guest stars and the more accessible sound, though, Peeping Tom has the ability to reach an audience – though still fringe – that may have otherwise overlooked an extremely talented artist. "Peeping Tom" should fit perfectly into the warped kaleidoscope that is Patton's discography and will no doubt entice more people to look further.

Bob Dylan 'Modern Times'

Rock 'n' Roll and folk music would never have been what it is today if it wasn't for Bob Dylan. Dylan changed the landscape of music with his early folk protest songs such as "Blowin in the Wind" and "The Times They Are A-Changin'." Dylan's influence also single handedly helped The Beatles change their pop sound and influenced John Lennon to stop wearing his matching suit with the band, soon after the rest of the band followed.

Dylan also challenged almost every other performer out there by always mixing up his vocal style and song arrangement every few years to keep him fresh.

But what makes Dylan truly amazing is the fact he is still releasing music after 40 years. It is hard to fathom any musician from today's rock 'n' roll or folk scene having the ability to create more music in 40 years, not even Conner Oberst, who some view as the next Dylan – but Oberst is not the next Dylan, the only next Dylan is Dylan himself.

Dylan's new album, "Modern Times," is one Dylan's best albums in the past 20 years, if not the best. The LP covers more ground then his previous albums about love and love lost, but at the same time he is back at singing about war and destiny.

While Dylan did get religious at points of his career and one could argue the albums of those points were his worst, this one covers an aspect of religion to it, but not in Christian or Jewish sense. The album even showcases Dylan's past dabble with religion. The song "Spirit on the Water" Dylan sings about the idea of paradise and heaven, but also goes into detail about love lost as well.

BOB DYLAN

MODERN TIMES

CAPITAL RECORDS

The entire album was recorded just under a month, which could be argued as a downside, but why did it take so long to come about?

The answer is Dylan took his time writing his songs to make sure they were as perfect as they can be before going to record them. Originally, Dylan never planned on recording again after "Love and Theft," but, like he has done countless times in his career, he changed his mind and went into the studio with his recent touring band as his backing band. Dylan and his backing band sound great together on this record as the songs flow from one to the other.

The only major fault of this album is he has had his entire career, his voice. But when you realize that Dylan's voice has been worse and the voice you hear on this record is only due to the ingenuity of his career, it only adds to the album's charm.

Tim McCall

Cursive 'Happy Hollow'

Cursive, the band who is mostly known as "the band with the cello," lost its cellist Gretta Cohn Cohn, who was a key figure in the band's album "The Ugly Organ," decided to leave the band last year.

Colin's departure lead Tim Kasher to put the band on hiatus while he decided if they should go on or if he should just work with his side project, The Good Life. Luckily for fans, last year Kasher decided Cursive will continue for now.

Kasher is one of the best lyricists out there in today's music, and if he ever reaches mainstream success, he will also become one of the most controversial. Cursive's latest album "Happy Hollow," covers anti-Christian themes such as Christians doubting science theory and the fact some Christians are against the lifestyles of homosexuals. Other themes on the album are faded views towards suburbia and the American Dream.

The most faded song on the album is "Dorothy at Forty," which is spun off the idea that the storyline of the Wizard of Oz is a metaphor for the American Dream. Kasher sings, "Dorothy, I know you've had amazing dreams. We can't go chasing down each golden street."

CURSIVE

SADDLE CREEK RECORDS

The major aspect of the orchestration of the album sounds just like every other by Cursive, which is by no means a bad thing. Typically by the fifth album, bands of any genre tend to grow soft, but here the band sounds as rocking as ever except for the fact they added a horn section to accompany some of the music.

But the best part is that the horns do not create a ska feeling to the album and they flow quite well with the rest of the music.

The production quality and budget of "Happy Hollow" has dramatically increased because of the success of the band's label, Saddle Creek, since their other major act, Bright Eyes, gained attention from the mainstream music business. One could only hope that Cursive follows in Bright Eyes' footsteps out of Nebraska and into mainstream music.

Each and every rainbow, each passion, each unattainable goal. We're not in dreamland anymore."

Sonic Youth 'Rather Ripped'

Sonic Youth has perhaps been able to balance being a fresh, ever-growing artistic outfit with being a modern day legacy act the best of anyone else around. It seems with every few albums comes something of a resurgence for the band that never quite hit the mainstream and never quite tried. However, for the past few releases, Sonic Youth has been on something of a hot streak. 2002's "Murray St." and 2004's "Sonic Nurse" were loved by critics and fans alike and the band was still exploring new territory. The laid-back haze of those albums found Sonic Youth alternately developing more concise songs and exploring long, winding jams, and are highlights in an incredibly strong discography.

This summer's "Rather Ripped" is sure to divide fans – although with a band that has done so much in such a span of time, it seems inevitable that any new album will do just that – but this shouldn't be a warning. "Rather Ripped" just might be Sonic Youth's best album since 1995's "Washing Machine." While it might not be a surprise that a band who is writing a second (or is it third, or fourth) wave of creativity is hitting a peak, it is the fact that "Rather Ripped" is arguably the band's most straightforward, pop-rock oriented collection that is sure to cause controversy.

It's still Sonic Youth, though. There is no mistaking Thurston Moore's slacker drawl, Kim Gordon's ferocity, or Lee Ranaldo's bohemian poetry heard, as usual, only once on this album, but with a track that easily stands amongst his best. Even the music itself is still pure Youth, guitars that are bashed up and tuned in all sorts of manners, thumping bass lines, and a knack for experimenting and making something new. The big difference is a lack (or rather, a relative lack) of guitar noise, and songs that are the most straight forward thing the band has unleashed. Oddly though, it is not that Sonic Youth has gone soft. "Rather Ripped" has the most pure energy then anything they have released in years. The band, fact, sounds significantly younger. "Rather Ripped" isn't a complete left turn for Sonic Youth, but it is certainly off the beaten path.

SONIC YOUTH

RATHER RIPPED

GEFFEN RECORDS

Opening with a set of propulsive tracks, "Reena" and "Incinerate," the former a Gordon-sung track, the latter one of Moore's catchiest, and oddly fascinating. In fact, aside from being uniformly excellent, the other thing that every song shares in common is its tractor-like pull through the speakers. From the down-tempo, harmonic-and-atmosphere driven "Do You Believe In Rapture" and the lengthy, perverse journey of "Pink Steam" (both of which share the more obvious experimental elements known to Sonic Youth fans) to songs like "Sleeping Around" and "What A Waste" (which are fairly simple pop numbers, despite the fact that the former features perhaps the purest burst of noise on the whole album) every song has something different to offer. "Rats," the previously-mentioned contribution from Ranaldo, is something of an alternate universe within the album. With Moore grabbing the bass to lay a dark, grooving line while fuzz and noise crackle and duel each other, and a truly great performance from Ranaldo, "Rats" is easily one of the standouts.

Sure, there's going to a pocket of Sonic Youth fans that feel a little alienated by "Rather Ripped," but a song-based record does not necessitate a late-game grab for the mainstream. Sonic Youth is and always will be Sonic Youth, and "Rather Ripped" may be a little easier to swallow, but it still refuses to bow to convention. It shows the markings of an experienced, but still exciting group and, as always, it is the Youth's talent and fearlessness that has helped to make a fantastic album. Fans of guitar rock and true alternative music should rush out for "Rather Ripped." It's not just a highlight amongst Sonic Youth albums – it's one of the best releases of the year.

Dance movie steps up for review

By Katrina Rose
Collegian Correspondent

If you were to combine "Save the Last Dance" and Eminem's "8 Mile," you would get "Step Up," the unwanted result of a one-night stand gone wrong. Following the fairly unoriginal plot line of "good girl meets gangsta," this summer's dance movie falls short of all the commercial hype.

The story begins when bad-boy loner Andy Tyler, played by newcomer Channing Tatum, gets robbed for vandalizing a high-scale arts school in Baltimore and gives the price by taking over the janitorial duties. The new headsman catches the eye of prima ballerina Nora (Jenna Dewan), when her partner for the life-doubling senior showcase injures his ankle and Tyler is the only possible replacement. You would think her classmates would be able to handle the job, but apparently you don't need talent to get accepted to the Maryland School of Arts.

While Tatum's character is trying be noble by helping Nora with her piece, he is so apathetic and distant that it's hard to see him as a likeable person. Even as his commitment to his community service strengthens, he is torn between the thug life he's always known and his newfound passion for dance, wavering constantly in his decisions. Although these acts of indecision are meant to make him seem troubled, he comes off as annoying.

Nora plays the part of the sad little rich girl, distraught by her mother's lack of support and encouragement. If she doesn't land a job from the showcase, she'll find herself trapped in a Cornell dorm room, fixing out Mommy's dreams. If only everybody's alternatives were so inviting. Besides dancing, her only purpose in the film appears to be dishing out corny lines and quick retorts – not to mention causing unnecessary drama between the two men vying for her attention.

Once the music stops it becomes increasingly clear that both Tatum and Dewan are fairly inexperienced actors. Off the dance floor they share little, if any, believable chemistry. Their fights, kisses, and even normal conversation come across as forced and phony. Considering director Anne Fletcher is an acclaimed choreographer, it's no surprise that the emphasis on casting was placed on dance skills.

It you're looking for a love story with substance, then step away from the ticket booth because this isn't your movie. But if you can look past the unrelated sub-plots, bad acting, and all too predictable story line, the high energy dance scenes make the movie worth it, at least for any dance enthusiast.

Beyond a story of following dreams, "Step Up" is a film about romance.

Channing Tatum stars as the rebellious Tyler Gage, and Jenna Dewan stars as the privileged dancer Nora Clark in the new film drama about following your dreams in the world of music and dance.

Radio host Dr. Laura says she's the real thing on stage

By JOHN SMYNTEK
DETROIT FREE PRESS

Radio talk show host Laura Schlessinger has a lot to say, and she can still surprise you when she speaks.

"Many, many, many years ago, I was inspired by Lily Tomlin and seeing her one-woman show 'The Search for Signs of Intelligent Life in the Universe.' She was incredible, and it was enthralling, and I remember sitting there and thinking I'd like to do that someday," says the woman known as Dr. Laura on her nationally syndicated radio advice show.

Wait a minute. Can this be the same Laura Schlessinger who has been labeled as intolerant by many gays and lesbians, who said the need to love someone of the same sex isn't as benign as they and many others believe it is — saying her own one-person onstage effort was inspired by Tomlin, the openly gay comedian who has been in a long-term relationship with "Intelligent Life" creator Jane Wagner?

Life is full of irony, is it not?

Before she can talk about her one-woman autobiographical show — "Dr. Laura: In My NEVER to Be Humble Opinion" — Schlessinger takes a detour.

Asked what it's like to go through life as such a polarizing figure, Schlessinger says "It's the people who attack me who are polarizing.

"I only have opinions, and we've become a society which makes it very difficult for people to express opinions if they tend to be more traditional. Nontraditional types can be quite vicious. They're the ones who are polarizing. I'm not polarizing anybody. I'm just expressing my point of view."

She doesn't stay on that road for long. Schlessinger is barely restrainable as she sets off to talk about her show. First off, it really is a one-woman show. "I do my hair. I do my makeup. I do my wardrobe. I am everything," she notes.

But why pay to hear what you can hear her talk about free weekdays on the radio?

Because it's not the same thing, Schlessinger parries.

"The first act, which is the major part, about 60 percent of the whole show, people don't know anything about. That was the point of doing this show — that people would actually get to know me, what my life has been about, what goes into being me and living me.

"It's quite personal. It's the first time I've been personal. They can't hear this on the air. I don't do this on the air."

So amid wardrobe changes in spangly sweats and jeans, pumping iron onstage barefoot and wearing "too much jewelry — I believe in a lot of bling," she says — and later some snazzy cowboy boots, she gives the audience Act One, which, according to a show summary, "mixes humor with true-life stories, plus current events pulled from the top stories of the day. Dr. Laura shares her opinions on everything from childbirth to death and all things in between, including her own childhood."

In Act Two, she takes questions submitted earlier by that night's audience and solves their dilemmas lickety-split. "They bring in stacks. I quickly go through and pick about 50," she says.

So let's serve up this question: What's the biggest problem in American domestic life today?

"Men and women no longer respecting what it means to be masculine and feminine in themselves or each other," she says. "I think that's probably been the most disruptive and destructive force, which is why my last book ("The Proper Care and Feeding of Husbands") was such a huge smash. ... People needed to understand what the heck was wrong in their homes and didn't quite get it."

And what was it? Husbands "aren't the enemy; he's not a girl with extra parts," she said. They're unique beings that have to be treated that way.

So, with an answer for every problem, why not Schlessinger for president — or other political office?

"Absolutely not," she says. "Because I can't compromise. I have been asked and I realized I'm totally unsuited because I can't compromise. And you have to. A woman's got to know her limitations."

Ward embraces his 'Post-War' dream

COURTESY MERGE RECORDS

Ward is a self taught musician out of Portland who has recently released his album entitled "Post-War."

By GREG KOT
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

When Matt Ward was 15, he taught himself to play guitar by learning the chords in a book of Beatles songs.

"I soon realized that if you learn all the chords that the Beatles ever played, you've pretty much learned all the chords you'll ever need in life," Ward says with a laugh.

Some of those chords can be heard on M. Ward's fifth album, "Post-War" (Merge), which is winning rave reviews and affirming his status as one of the best of the new wave of indie-rock singer-songwriters. His prowess as a guitarist may not be immediately apparent to the casual listener, because Ward folds his skills into songs of unusual depth and the kind of humid lived-in atmosphere once routinely found on old Roy Orbison, Billie Holiday and doo-wop records. Ward's albums live in the room in which they were created; the listener can almost feel the presence of the musicians through the speakers, the sound of fingers on strings and voices speaking rather than shouting the language of intimacy.

"All my songs start as experiments on a four-track recorder, and months, weeks and sometimes years go by before I pick them back up again," Ward says. "If the song still makes you feel a sensation that has worth after all that time has passed, then you bring the song to a bigger studio and the thicker tape. The most amusing part of the process is transferring the original

Actor Bosley makes a splash in 'Pond'

By MARK LOWRY
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

Tom Bosley isn't a man with Alzheimer's — he just plays one onstage.

"I don't think I have it, but once in a while I look in the refrigerator for the broom," jokes the actor best known as the sensible father, Howard Cunningham, on the '70s sitcom "Happy Days." "My wife and I try to remember who called on the telephone by running through the alphabet."

One call he didn't forget was the offer to play Norman, the ailing patriarch of the Thayer family in a national tour of Ernest Thompson's drama "On Golden Pond."

And then Bosley had his own call to make. He dialed up the actress cast as Ethel, the wife who holds it all together: Michael Learned, best remembered for her role as matriarch Olivia on "The Waltons."

Over four decades or so, Bosley and Learned's paths had often crossed without actually connecting.

"In that coterie of working people [in Hollywood], she knew who I was, and I knew who she was," says Bosley, 78. "But we never met."

So they and their spouses made a dinner date. Soon after, the two actors began working together on the play, even before New York rehearsals began.

"On Golden Pond" is the same Tony-nominated, Leonard Foglia-directed production that was revived on Broadway last year with interesting casting choices: James Earl Jones and Leslie Uggams as the aging couple spending what is probably their final summer together at their Maine lake house.

Of course, in these roles, Bosley and Learned have other actors to look up to: Katharine Hepburn and Henry Fonda in the 1981 big-screen version, not to mention Tom Aldredge and the great Frances Sternhagen in the original 1979 Broadway staging.

Many actors, for obvious reasons, don't study performances that came before theirs.

"All I remember [about the movie] is [Hepburn] crying a lot," says Learned, 67. "I don't do that. I think this is a woman who tries to not let Norman know how upset she is. You want that release, but you don't want to be weeping when your husband's having a heart attack."

And Bosley, who was a friend of Henry Fonda's, considered the movie a little too personal in what it revealed about the relationship between Fonda and his real-life daughter, Jane, who played the Thayers' daughter in the movie.

"I thought, 'Is this Henry Fonda making peace with his daughter?'"

Not that either Bosley or Learned needs to examine how to do this stage thing. Though both are known more for television, they both had stage careers before — and after — their greatest TV fame.

Bosley has appeared in eight Broadway shows, winning a Tony in 1960 for the title role in the prize-winning musical "Fiorello!" Learned's Great White Way credits include Wendy Wasserstein's "The Sisters Rosensweig" and, most recently, Gore Vidal's "The Best Man."

Back when these two actors started TV careers, having stage acting experience was expected — unlike today, when actors often achieve instant fame just because they look good shirtless.

And although standards in Hollywood have changed, the fleeting nature of stardom never has. For actors like Bosley and Learned, long stage experience keeps the ball rolling.

"I always knew that being 'hot' was going to be temporary," says Learned, who won four Best Actress Emmys, three for "The Waltons" and one for "Nurse," "so I never stopped working."

As long as they keep getting calls for some kind of work, both actors will be happy as loons.

Flaming Lips take the stage in Boston

Psychedelic sounds and balloons fill the Pavilion

By NICK ROMANOW
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Flaming Lips have risen from humble origins to one of the biggest, and most acclaimed, cult acts in America. Certainly no one in 1983 would have guessed the noisy punk band from Oklahoma would become internationally loved maestros of weird, often referred to as heirs of the "Pet Sounds" symphonic pop sound. In the past 23 years The Lips have been incapable but endearing punks, noise-rock geniuses, parking-lot experimentalists, sophisticated psychedelics, 21 century robot fighters and much, much more.

With each phase their fan base has grown, and while they have dabbled in MTV and radio success, they owe far more to word of mouth and critical acclaim. Not to mention talent and imagination, which The Lips have to spare. The line-up of the band since 1997 has been, more or less, front man Wayne Coyne, bassist Michael Ivins, and drummer multi-instrumentalist Steven Drozd. With Coyne and Ivins the only two founding members, the band has shifted and morphed repeatedly, even since Drozd joined in 1992.

In recent years, Drozd has emerged as the unsung hero, credited with writing most of the songs and playing almost every instrument (Ivins still handles the bass and Coyne writes lyrics and sings, along with being the man at the center of shaping the sound, mood, and image of The Lips). As a band of uniquely talented, charismatic, and appealing artists, the Flaming Lips have worked hard and come a very long way. As soon as they seem to reach a peak, they top themselves. This years' "At War With The Mystics" has received generally enthusiastic reviews, even though it hasn't quite matched the deafening roars of approval that met 2002's "Yoshimi Battles The Pink Robots."

And so it is on the ever-growing wave of love that the Flaming Lips arrived at the Bank of America Pavilion in Boston on Sunday night. The packed audience often resembled the type of fanatic cult that Coyne, an outspoken atheist, might speak out against, but he didn't seem to have any problem keeping them going. In fact, The Lips, who have in recent years have become as known for their spectacle of a live show as they have for writing brilliant songs, may have become too engulfed in their own cult.

Playing for over an hour and a half, The Lips played only 14 songs (which includes an original composition that they walked out to and singing "Happy Birthday" to a member of the audience). Most of the balloon-and-confetti strewn set seemed to consist of Coyne explaining the meaning of each song, thanking the fans, and generally just hyping the crowd up — in fact, if Chuck D was looking to replace Flavor Flav, he might want to enlist Coyne, who has a shining charisma that makes his antics more tolerable than if other entertainers tried to pull them off. Not to mention that Coyne made three of those remaining 12 songs extended sing-along's ("Yoshimi Battles The Pink Robots" had an entertaining coda where Coyne led the crowd via hand puppet; "The Yeah Yeah Yeah Song" had a masturbatory opening chant).

For those enthralled with the cult, campy aspects of The Lips, it was captivating and addicting — Coyne kept huge balloons bouncing amongst the crowd while shooting confetti guns across the entire amphitheatre, while flanked by a group of aliens and a group of Santa Clauses on either side, not to mention the massive video screen, which flashed trippedout visuals. However a band that has two decades of brilliant material (and, to narrow it down more realistically, three full albums and countless EPs and b-sides worth of material with the current lineup) should play more then 50 or so minutes of material in a headlining set. Not to mention that, while Coyne's playing to the audience had a fun everyman vibe, stopping after literally every song meant that the set had a stutter-y flow. The concert was something of a love fest, and though it's always nice to see a band that really loves its fans, the show occasionally went a bit overboard.

Still, a great band is a great band, and if The Lips only played three songs it still would've been something to experience. Rather then throwing out a mere greatest hits set The Lips mostly played highlights from "Mystics," sprinkled with a few songs from "Yoshimi" and 1999's "The Soft Bulletin." However, it was indicative of the night that the highlight was also the most basic, rock 'n' roll track played, "She Don't Use Jelly." The track that once defined (and for some people, still does) The Flaming Lips as a one-hit wonder is now something of a relic of the past, but it hasn't lost any of its power. The absurd bubble-gum fun of that track shows that while The Lips may have become more instrumentally sophisticated and their budget for visuals has grown, they've always been The Lips.

The Flaming Lips are best known for constantly reinventing themselves. A lot of good can be said for their live performance now — for a four-man band (with touring drummer Kliph Scurlock), they sound amazing (even if a number of sounds are triggered electronically) and the visuals are impressive, to say the least. But here's hoping they continue the process of change. The world has seen

The Lips pay homage to their massive cult, and vice versa, it would be nice to see The Lips get down to business. There is certainly a value to the celebration of all that is Lips that is touring the world right now, but it can backfire when the reason for celebrating gets buried far beneath the ceremony.

"Post-War" sets Ward as a premiere singer-songwriter artist in his genre.

At the Flaming Lips show in Boston on Sunday, the audience was packed full of fanatic followers.

Ward releases new album to critical avail ideas to the bigger screen. I'm trying to create a hybrid of the way the four-track feels and the way that a bigger studio project like [the Beach Boys'] 'Pet Sounds' makes you feel."

Ward grew up with four siblings in Ventura County, Calif. He borrowed his brother Carlos' $45 guitar and stumbled into a career. He recorded music with Grandaddy's Jason Lytle, then began releasing solo albums in 2000 with the aid of Giant Sand's Howe Gelb. Then he toured with Bright Eyes' Conor Oberst in 2004, opened for the White Stripes in 2005, and co-produced and played on the acclaimed solo debut album by Rilo Kiley's Jenny Lewis, "Rabbit Fur Coat," released this year.

"Post-War," recorded with his touring band in his attic studio in Portland, Ore., finds Ward at the peak of his powers as a songwriter and singer, in part because he not only writes durable songs but also creates a rich atmosphere in which those songs can flourish. The disc's title in part stems from Ward's enduring passion for "post-war" sounds the blues, jazz and early rock 'n' roll records that he discovered as a youth and has cherished.

"We'd play Elmore James or Billie Holiday's 'Lady in Satin,' and use our imaginations to figure out how they got certain sounds," Ward says of the recording sessions. The songs themselves conjure mysteries. "If life is so short, why is the night so long?" the narrator in "Chinese Translation" asks. They aren't meant to produce definitive answers.

"All of the music is just a dream, and you don't want to take it too seriously," Ward says. "At the same time, dreams can change people's minds. I feel extremely fortunate to have this job. I would hate to jeopardize that feeling by thinking too much about it. I don't write songs because I have this burning desire to get something off my chest. I suffer my friends and family with that. I write songs out of a burning desire to create something good."

next level. Every year, the Walter Payton Award is given to the top I-AA performer in the nation. A watch list of 16 players is compiled in the preseason of possible award winners, and this season, four out of the 16 are A-10 performers. These four stars include last year's runner-up and UNH quarterback Ricky Santos, UNH wide receiver David Ball, Delaware running back Omar Cuff, and James Madison quarterback Justin Rascati.

The A-10 also showcases four running backs with over 2,000 career rushing yards, more than any other I-AA conference. UMass senior running back Steve Baylark, one of the four previously mentioned backs, is gunning for his fourth consecutive 1,000 yard season.

BALL IS IN GOOD COMPANY

UNH senior wide out David Ball — who collected 70-plus yards and two touchdowns in his match yesterday — now only needs four more touchdown receptions to surpass Jerry Rice's previous I-AA record of 50 touchdown catches. Ball, who was hardly recruited at all, now has made himself into a possible third or fourth round NFL draft pick next year. It's not every year a I-AA conference has the right to watch history like this unfold.

Pats trade Branch for first-round pick

By Greg Bell
Associated Press

SEATTLE — The New England Patriots ended the holdout of receiver Deion Branch on Monday by trading him to the Seattle Seahawks for a first-round draft pick.

Seahawks general manager Tim Ruskell called Branch "a known commodity," and added that a first-round pick "can be a crapshoot."

Branch was entering the last season of the five-year contract he signed as a rookie. He held out of the mandatory minicamp in June and all of training camp. He has been subject to a $14,000 fine for each day he held out from July 28, the start of training camp.

"It's been a long process," Patriots coach Bill Belichick said. "I think we tried hard to make it work out. I think Deion tried hard. We tried. It didn't work out and we've moved on."

Branch was eligible for arbitration after this season, but Belichick said the prospect of a potentially contentious arbitration process was not "that big a factor" in the Patriots' decision to trade Branch.

In the 2005 Super Bowl, Branch had 11 catches for 133 yards against Philadelphia, helping the Patriots win their third championship in four years. Last season, he caught 78 passes for 998 yards and five touchdowns, all career highs. In four seasons, he has 213 receptions for 2,744 yards and 14 touchdowns.

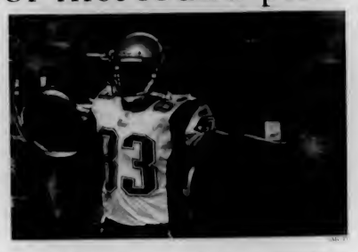
Branch joins a team whose leading receiver, Darrell Jackson, missed the preseason. Jackson had not practiced until last week following his second knee surgery in four months, in February. Jackson played far more than expected in Sunday's 9-6 win over the Detroit Lions.

The Seahawks are close to reaching a deal on a multiyear contract with Branch.

"His representatives are flying in today," Ruskell said. "Obviously, we wouldn't have done this without the gist of the deal getting done."

Seattle also has veteran Bobby Engram, former Minnesota Viking Nate Burleson and 2005 surprise D.J. Hackett in its receiving corps.

The last time the Seahawks traded their first-round pick for a veteran player was March 2, 2001, when then-general manager Holmgren traded for quarterback Matt Hasselbeck.



The New England Patriots traded wide receiver Deion Branch to the Seattle Seahawks for a 2007 first-round draft pick.

The Patriots are without their top two receivers from last season. David Givens signed with Tennessee as a free agent for five years and $24 million, including an $8 million signing bonus.

On Aug. 25, the Patriots gave Branch, who had been scheduled to make $1.045 million this year, permission to negotiate a contract with other teams and seek a trade until Sept. 1. The NFL Players Association filed a grievance on behalf of Branch after the Patriots did not trade him by the team-imposed deadline.

Federer and Woods chase history

By Howard Fendrich
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Two sets.

In the end, on paper, that's all that separated Roger Federer from a true Grand Slam this year.

Two sets.

And as he lived it up into the wee hours of Monday with his inner circle at a bistro in Manhattan's trendy Meatpacking District, celebrating the U.S. Open title that gave him three major championships in 2006, Federer took a moment to ponder what could have been.

"It hit me last night, you know, when I actually realized that I've been in all major finals in the same year. I was so close to winning a Grand Slam," Federer said Monday during a 20-minute interview with a small group of reporters at a Midtown hotel. "But I'm very happy with three, of course."

As well he should be.

Federer went 27-1 at tennis' four premier tournaments, winning the Australian Open and Wimbledon before his triumph at Flushing Meadows. The lone blemish? A four-set loss to No. 2 Rafael Nadal in the French Open final.

Remarkable as his year was, it's worth considering that if Federer had won three sets instead of one on that 90-degree day in June, he would have become the first man since Rod Laver in 1969 to complete a calendar-year Grand Slam.

"I knew that I had an opportunity. But it's so far-fetched that you don't want to put yourself under pressure. I'm never going to say openly, 'I'm going to go for the Grand Slam.' Because you have to first win the Australian Open, and then see what happens at the French," Federer said. "Before having won those two, no point in talking about it."

He has yet to conquer Roland Garros. But, still only 25, he's won Wimbledon the past four years, the U.S. Open the past three, and the Australian Open twice for a total of nine majors — five shy of Pete Sampras' record.

It's a pursuit that merits as close attention as Tiger Woods' chase of Jack Nicklaus' record of 18 golf Grand Slam titles. Woods owns 12, although unlike Federer, he can boast of a career Grand Slam.

Woods has done something else Federer hasn't: win four majors in a row. He did it from the 2000 U.S. Open in June through the 2001 Masters in April. And Woods, too, knows what it's like to fall a tad short of a true Grand Slam: In 2005, he won two majors and finished a total of four shots out in the other two.

The two superstars met Sunday, chatting before and sharing champagne after Federer beat Andy Roddick 6-2, 4-6, 7-5, 6-1 in the U.S. Open final. Woods and Federer began text-messaging a few months ago, but their schedules never allowed for a face-to-face conversation.

"I arrived in the States and everybody was again talking about us," Federer said Monday, referring to comparisons made between his success in tennis and Woods' in golf. "I was like, 'Wow. This is quite interesting.' I don't mind talking about Tiger, because I'm a big fan of his and everything. And then I thought, 'I'd like to finally meet him, not only just talk about him, like some stranger or something, because I feel so close and yet so far.'"

They are represented by the same agency, and Federer sent word he'd like something arranged. Woods sent word back, before the U.S. Open, that he'd show up for the final.

How's that for pressure? Well, Federer kept his end of the bargain, and Woods did, too, sitting in the front row of Federer's guest box Sunday.

In golf and tennis, greatness is measured at Grand Slams, though Federer does quite well elsewhere, too. He's 70-5 this year, with a tour-leading eight titles from 13 tournaments. Since replacing Roddick at No. 1 in February 2004, Federer has stayed on top, a 137-week run that's the third longest. Jimmy Connors, now Roddick's adviser, holds the record of 160.

"Obviously, he's the guy everybody's chasing," Connors said. "Certainly, Federer's record the last three, four years has been incredible."

And yet, Federer made the sort of admission Monday that one doesn't hear from Woods: "Doubt is always there for me."

"I get doubts once in a while, and early on in the tournament, they're always there," said Federer, who called his U.S. Open quarterfinal against James Blake the toughest test of the two weeks. "But it doesn't mean I'm going to play bad. It's just, like, all of a sudden, you have these five minutes where you think, 'Maybe I'm not going to win this thing.' Because maybe I just don't feel quite right or maybe the other guys are playing very well. It's just about turning that corner at the right moment and telling yourself, 'Well, I think you can do it again.' And that's what I did."

Simple as that.

He's won nine of the last 14 majors, but it's fascinating to look back and realize that Federer lost in the first round three times in a span of five Grand Slam tournaments right before his streak began.

The last of those early exits came to the unheralded Luis Horna of Peru at the 2003 French Open. In retrospect, Federer said, it was an upset that helped shape the champion he's become.

"I remember going into the tournament feeling so confident, going like, 'I could win this thing. I'm playing so well at the moment.' I lost the first set and thought, 'There's no chance I'm coming back in this match. And if I do, seven matches to play, there's no way I'm going to win the French Open.' All of a sudden, within 45 minutes, my whole dreams were shattered. I was so weak mentally," Federer recalled.

"When I lost the match, there was no need to explain what happened because I knew exactly what was wrong. I had to toughen up a bit, you know? It was just one of those moments when I finally realized I have to still change a few things because I thought I had everything figured out by then. But I didn't."

Roger Federer captured his third straight U.S. Open title on Sunday. His nine career major titles are only five behind Pete Sampras' record 14.

Koepplin kicking for keeps

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The score was tied at 14-all. UMass had the ball on its own 31-yard line. The offense had gone punt-punt-punt-interception in its last four drives.

The Minutemen went into halftime tied at two touchdowns apiece against the only Division I-A opponent on their schedule Saturday, and the offense looked desperate.

It was on the Minutemen's second possession of the second half that kicker Chris Koepplin finally had a chance to have an impact.

Koepplin transferred from Nassau Community College last year and arrived at football camp in the spring. This season, he was slated to back up Armando Cuko at the kicker position, but Cuko suffered a groin injury before the first game and Koepplin jumped right in.

Against Colgate on Sept. 2, Koepplin kicked four point-after attempts through the uprights but did not come off the sidelines for anything but extra points. He had never attempted a field goal at the Division I level before.

At Navy, on Sept. 9, he got his chance.

The game was tied and quarterback Liam Coen started his offense at the 31-yard line after defensive lineman David Burris recovered a fumble by a clumsy Navy offense.

Coen zipped a pass over the middle to tight end Brad Listorti, beating a Navy blitz and putting the Minutemen at the 17-yard line. Next was a run up the middle by transfer Tim Washington — good for nine yards — and a pitch to Washington, who rumbled up the right sideline for three more yards and another UMass first down.

It was 1st-and-goal from the four-yard line, and it looked like no field goal was necessary.

Running back Steve Baylark ran it up the middle. No gain. Second down.

A holding penalty in the end-zone pushed the Minutemen back to the 11-yard line. Third down.

Coen set up in the shotgun and the Midshipmen sacked him at the 20-yard line on a weak-side blitz. Fourth down.

Then it was Koepplin's opportunity. A 37-yard field goal might not seem like much. But on the road, at the Division I-A level, on his first attempt, 37 yards probably seemed like a mile.

No problem for Koepplin. He sent it through the uprights with authority and gave his team a three-point lead.

"Once I got that first field goal I kind of settled down," Koepplin said. "Last week [against Colgate] I didn't get to try any [field goals]. It's nice to get the first couple [of kicks] in on the first game."

And the pressure?

"On game days I'm pretty even-keeled," Koepplin said. "The night before is when I have the nerves."

They didn't show on Saturday.

His first field goal zipped through the uprights and Koepplin pumped his fist, a minor celebration for his first field goal at the Division I level. The scoring drive went 10 plays for 11 yards, eating 5:36 off the clock before Koepplin kicked home three points for UMass.

"I was looking forward to this game all year when I saw it on the schedule," he said. "I was telling all of my friends about being on TV and everything. So I was excited to do well."

When Armando Cuko went down with a groin injury, sophomore Chris Koepplin (No. 42) stepped in. He made his first career field goal Saturday.

But that wasn't the end of Koepplin's Saturday.

Navy took the lead on the next drive. A 72-yard kickoff return by the Mids' Reggie Campbell stole all enthusiasm from the UMass sideline. A 19-yard QB keeper on 3rd-and-1 and Navy went up by four.

On the Minutemen's fourth possession of the second half, Coen and company stormed down the field and had a 1st-and-10 on Navy's 32-yard line before a running back pass play was picked off at the Mids' two-yard line.

Another scoring opportunity squandered, the defense dug in and tried to stop the option offense one more time. On 3rd-and-1 at the 22-yard line, Navy fumbled the ball on a QB keeper play and UMass took over on the Mids' 23.

After two Baylark runs — one for no gain and another for an eight-yard loss — Coen hit Baylark in the flats for an 11-yard gain, setting up 4th-and-6.

Koepplin trotted out again. This field goal would put UMass within one point and allow the Minutemen to go for a field goal instead of a touchdown on the final drive.

He nailed the 36-yarder. Two-for-two on the day. Two-for-two in his UMass career.

"I thought [Koepplin] was excellent all day," UMass coach Don Brown said. "He gave us field goals in big spots."

And though Navy slid by with a 21-20 victory over its I-AA counterpart, it's been a while since UMass' kicking game looked this good.

New Hampshire atop strong Atlantic 10

BY MIKE WALSH
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

There are few reasons why the NFL has been so successful in generating interest over the last few years; the combination of team competitiveness and excellent individual play from star players.

A-10 Notebook

Of course, the Atlantic 10 is no NFL, in fact it's not even Division I-A college football, but one thing is for certain, no other conference in all of I-AA can boast those two qualities as well as the A-10.

With five teams in the national Top 25, a legitimate championship contender, and one wide receiver's quest to break a once thought to be unsurpassable record, the A-10 has plenty to be excited about for this coming season.

Week in and week out, the A-10 will offer exciting and competitive matchups and showcase individual athletes fighting for national recognition and even their chances to make the NFL.

New Hampshire will not be satisfied with anything short of a national championship, and every other A-10 team will not be satisfied with anything short of knocking off the heavily favored Wildcats. Whatever the case, there is a lot of football to be played and plenty of history to be made.

No other conference can boast as many nationally-ranked teams as the A-10. UNH — last year's conference champion — is once again the favorite to take home not only the conference title, but the national title as well. So far this season, the Wildcats are 1-0, as they pulled off an impressive win on Saturday over Northwestern — a tough Division I-A opponent — on the road. Following in line after the Wildcats is UMass (No. 9), Richmond (No. 10), James Madison (No. 12), and Delaware (No. 15) in the national rankings.

As the most represented conference in the country in the Top 25, it will be hard for each team's record to justify how good they really are, as teams are bound to beat up on each other over the course of the season. There really is no clear-cut favorite to finish second, and that will be something to watch for as conference play heats up.

BRING ON I-A

One of the reasons why the A-10 continues to dominate the national rankings is the fact that it is not afraid to take on I-A competition. In fact, A-10 teams have taken down opponents from a BCS Conference three straight years and in four of the last five. Already this season, Richmond overpowered Duke, 13-0, UNH pummeled Northwestern, 34-17, and Delaware handled West Chester with ease, pulling off the 30-7 victory.

UMass came close to driving the A-10 to a 4-0 record against I-A opposition this year, but came up just short in 21-20 loss at Navy on Saturday. Look for these tough non-conference games to help out in the long run as they provide a certain intensity and experience that normal I-AA play just cannot provide.

Hogan set to lead Minutemen offense

BY DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If it wasn't for a rare defensive collapse against Boston University over two weeks ago, freshman Bryan Hogan would have a pair of game-winning goals for the Massachusetts men's soccer team. Instead, the forward from Latitz, Pa. became the hero-for-a-day after he scored his first career game-winning goal in UMass' 1-0 victory over Siena on Friday.

And it probably won't be his last.

UMass coach Sam Koch awarded Hogan with his first career start in Sunday's 1-0 overtime win over St. Bonaventure after his fine performance just two days before.

"He's the one guy who's been finishing for us," Koch said. "Michael Jejna has struggled the last couple of games, so I just wanted to give him a little bit of a break and put Hogan in, who feels a little bit sharper right now."

UMass opened its five-game homestand with a win over Siena, thanks to the freshman's heroics. Hogan turned a Saints turnover into a breakaway in the 60th minute, which led to a nifty-chip shot past the goalkeeper and into the back of the net.

"I intercepted the ball, and ran as fast as I could," Hogan said about his game-winning goal. "When you're on a breakaway like that, you just have to hit the goal because you never know what's going to happen."

Hogan played over 72 minutes on Sunday. He now has two goals on the year, and has played a vital role in the UMass offense in 2006.

"I had no idea what to expect coming in," Hogan said on his role as a freshman this season. "Now they put me in the game, and I just go out there and do as much as I can and work as hard as I can. It feels good."

Hogan scored his first career goal in the second game of the season — against BU — back on Aug. 27. Junior forward Greg Cirillo crossed the ball in front of the net, where Hogan was kicked a one-timer past the terrier's goaltender.

UMass' 1-0 lead did not last long. BU tied the game just a minute later, forcing a stalemate between the two teams at Nickerson Field.

The Minutemen (5-0-1) remain undefeated in 2006, and are off to their best start since 1971.

With a young core of players on the frontline and a solid group of defenders in the backfield, Koch is satisfied with what he's getting from his rookies.

"I love it," Koch said on Hogan's play. "He's done a great job for us. He's a great kid, and I'm very, very pleased with him."

THE BRICK WALL IS HONORED

Sophomore goaltender Zack Simmons was named Atlantic 10 co-player of the week yesterday, for his play over the weekend. He has five shutouts on the season (including four in a row) and a 0.16 goals-against average.

UMass has allowed only one goal in six games, which dates back to its 1-1 draw with BU. Since then, the Minutemen have held teams scoreless for 388 minutes and 48 seconds.

"We defend as a team," Simmons said on UMass' early season success in 2006. "We defend as a unit. We have 10, 11 guys behind the ball, and that makes it tough for the opponent to play. If we can continue to do that, the shutouts will hopefully keep coming, and the wins will hopefully keep coming too."

Freshman forward Bryan Hogan scored the game-winning goal in UMass' 1-0 win over Siena on Friday. It was his second goal of the year.

New Hampshire junior quarterback Ricky Santos went 18-for-24 with 206 yards and two touchdown passes on Saturday. He also ran for three scores.

Simmons named A-10 Co-Player of the Week

The Massachusetts men's soccer team leads the Atlantic 10 Conference early in the season with a 5-0-1 record. UMass and Fordham (4-0-1) are the only unbeaten teams in the conference.

A-10 Notebook

The Minutemen are ranked third in the Mid-Atlantic Region and are off to their best start since the 1971 season. Co-Player of the Week, sophomore Zack Simmons and MVP of the UMass Holy Cross Tournament, sophomore Mike DeSantis, have led UMass this past week.

Simmons notched two shutout victories over St. Bonaventure, 1-0, and Siena, 1-0. This season, Simmons has five shutouts and an impressive 0.16 goals-against average. UMass plays at home on Friday at 2 p.m. against Hartford, and on Sunday at 2 p.m. against Vermont.

FORDHAM RANKED NO. 12

The Rams remain unbeaten this season with a 3-0 win over New Jersey Institute of Technology and a 2-2 tie against UC Irvine. The tie drops them into a first-place tie with Massachusetts. Fordham entered the weekend ranked No. 12 by the National Soccer Coaches Association of America (NSCAA), but may drop a few places after the tie with UCI. Fordham is led by last week's A-10 Player of the Week, junior midfielder Kevin Meyer. He leads the team with three goals and two assists. The Rams hit the road this week to face Siena College.

DUQUESNE SPLITS WEEKEND

Atlantic 10 Co-Player of the Week Travis Mackenzie scored two goals and added an assist over the weekend. He led the Dukes in the Bucknell Invitational to a 3-0 win over Campbell. However, his team dropped the first game, 4-3, in double overtime against Rider. With a 3-1-1 record the Dukes look to chase UMass and Fordham for the top spots in the league. This week they travel to Philadelphia to face off against Penn and Princeton.

ST. LOUIS DROPS

After being nationally ranked at No. 18 this week, the 2-2-1 St. Louis Billikens lost, 4-1, to No. 14 Santa Clara. They bounced back with a 2-0 win over Navy, but now they find themselves in fifth place and two games behind in the overall standings. The season is still early and the Billikens start an eight-game homestand against Indiana. They hope to snap a three-game winless streak against Indiana on Friday night.

ROOKIE OF THE WEEK

Dayton's freshman midfielder Alex Torda is the A-10 Rookie of the Week. Torda scored the first points of his career with two goals and an assist in a 4-0 victory over IUPUI. The victory earned them first place in the Dayton Flyer Marriott Classic. Torda made the All-Tournament Team and sophomore midfielder Ryan Helfey won the tournament MVP. The 3-3 Flyers try to stay hot as they travel to New Mexico to play Tulsa.

STRUGGLES CONTINUE

Only two teams in the conference have yet to win. St. Bonaventure and Saint Joseph's both stand at 0-5. The Bonnies almost upset UMass but suffered a 1-0 loss in overtime and St. Joseph's dropped a close decision with a 2-1 loss to the Manhattan Jaspers. These teams both meet each other in late October.

COLLEGIAN ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

Starting in this issue, the Daily Collegian sports section will choose a UMass athlete that stood out in the past week. This award will be printed in every Tuesday paper.

This week's stand-out athlete is sophomore Vanessa Patry, a forward on the Massachusetts women's soccer team. Patry has scored three goals since Aug. 30...including two in one game on Sept. 3 against Iona. Patry also dished out two assists during this stretch, good for eight total points and a .300 shot percentage.

Patry's eight points in the 2006 campaign equals her total from all of last season, and leads the team in total points through five games.

UMass study shows dangers of jet lag

BY MATT BELLIVEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Extreme jet lag symptoms may be a result of the body overshooting as it tries to adjust to particularly large leaps forward in time, suggests new research from the University of Massachusetts that models circadian rhythms in rats.

The analytical model, by UMass' Hava Siegelmann, appears in the current issue of the "Journal of Biological Rhythms". Tanya Leise of Amherst College co-authored the work.

To transition smoothly to a different time zone, the researchers recommend advancing in time capsules of not more than four hours, thus allowing the body's clocks to remain coordinated.

The work also has implications for rotational shift workers, such as nurses and airline attendants, as some shifts will be much harder for the body to adjust to than others.

The body's sleep and wakefulness patterns are just two of the physiological processes that run on a roughly 24-hour-cycle, or circadian clock, explains Siegelmann.

These and other processes are coordinated by the master pacemaker, or clock, an area of the brain with a natural cycle that is approximately 24 hours long.

In mammals, the master clock is a group of cells called the suprachiasmatic nucleus (SCN), which lies at the base of the hypothalamus. The SCN receives information on daylight sent from the eyes' optic nerve and can be reset by environmental cues such as light.

Recent research suggests that every cell in the body actually has its own clock—liver cells prepare for digestion at particular times of day; patterns of hormone production and brain activity exhibit cyclic peaks and valleys, says Siegelmann.

"The circadian system is really fundamental, it affects our behavior, our physiology and emotions," she says. "The clock organizes the whole body into a very nice dance, and it organizes people together into a larger social orchestra."

The so-called "local clocks" have natural circadian cycles that range from 21 to 26 hours, says Siegelmann. They are synchronized by the SCN, but the pathways and mechanisms by which this coordination happens aren't fully understood. Evidence has recently emerged that the SCN itself is compartmentalized. One clump of cells responds to and processes information about light, they then alert an intermediate group of cells that transmit the information to more peripheral components.

This hierarchy within the circadian system introduces a time-delay in getting the entire body adjusted to a new environment, suggests Siegelmann.

The delay is based, in part, on the strength of the connections between the different parts of the SCN, between the SCN and the peripheral clocks, and on the differing rhythms of the local clocks, she says.

To explore the dynamics of the system and how it responds to disruption Siegelmann and Leise designed a model with parameters reflecting this hierarchical nature. The model accounts for the SCN's light-responsive component, its intermediate component, and the various peripheral components. It incorporates behavioral data, physiological data and what's known about differences in natural circadian rhythms in the peripheral tissues. In rats, for example, internal organs such as the liver and lungs take a relatively long time to become synchronized with the SCN.

Simulations of the model revealed certain properties about both the stability and adaptability of the system, Siegelmann says. The light sensitive compartment of the master clock responds quickly, providing flexibility, whereas the intermediate compartment of the SCN seems to act as a buffer against small perturbations in

New building to integrate science education

BY AMBER VAILLANCOURT
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Marshall Annex was demolished on Friday, September 8th to make room for a new building on the University of Massachusetts campus, promising beneficial community connections, and integrated science education for all.

Behind green fences and dirty yellow trucks, Phase 1 of the $92.7 million Integrated Science Building is under way. Last Friday, ground was broke in the company of many, including Chancellor John V. Lombardi, UMass President Jack M. Wilson, and U.S. Senator Edward Kennedy to "celebrate a formal shovel in the ground," said Jim Cahill, Director of Facilities and Campus Planning on campus.

Cahill, who was also present during the groundbreaking, described the groundbreaking as "a ceremonial event," continuing to say, "It's always exciting."

The building, designed by Payette Associates architectural firm and built by contractor Gilbane, will provide approximately 155,000 square feet of free space, according to the Facilities and Campus Planning website.

Phase 1 of the Integrated Science Building has only begun, yet the benefits are already beginning to show. The Integrated Science Building will connect the Greater Pioneer Valley Life Sciences Institution, the Baystate Medical Center of Springfield, and the UMass community. The building also promises to integrate the physical, life, and chemical sciences, offering students a richer learning experience.

"It will be a modern state-of-the-art research center, similar to the Polymer Research Center," said Cahill. The site is located adjacent to Skinner Hall, in close proximity to the Morrill Science Center, which would allow for possible future expansion.

"We envisioned a larger building, maybe a Phase 2 would be for an all research building," said Cahill. The new building will consist of an entire floor devoted completely to research, and the building will be very flexible to any type of science, including research grants that people can receive. There will also be lab space for eight to ten principle investigators within the building.

The project will also allow for the renovation of approximately 400,000 square feet of existing teaching space on campus, and "it will provide infrastructure improvements and enhance the character of the campus through planned landscape improvements along North Pleasant Street and Stockbridge Road," according to the website.

The project is expected to be finished by the winter of 2009.

"We have a long way to go," said Cahill. "It's a commissioning process, and everything has to be working properly. It's complicated."

The building has gone through extensive planning Cahill said. "The seeds of this building were planted by faculty who teach chemistry and life science years ago. The Integrated Life Sciences function off of support from the federal level, as well as the board of trustees, leadership, faculty, and the administration on campus."

Bush's 9/11 speech infuriates democrats

BY MARY DALRYMPLE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Republicans and Democrats tore into each over war policy Tuesday, set off by a presidential speech the White House insisted was nonpolitical. A GOP leader said Democrats seemed "more interested in protecting the terrorists" than shielding fellow Americans.

The Democrats contended the president had used a primetime address commemorating the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks to make partisan arguments bolstering support for the Iraq war.

"I wonder if they are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people," said House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio. "They certainly do not want to take the terrorists on and defeat them."

Trading barbs, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, who had criticized the president's speech as inappropriately political, called Boehner's criticism "cynical tactics."

"Rather than try to defend their own failed record, Republicans have resorted to the desperation politics of fear," said Pelosi, D-Calif. "It is long past time for Republicans to be honest with American people and stop questioning the patriotism of those who recognize that the president's Iraq policy has not worked, is making us less safe and must be changed."

The White House tried to steer clear of the tussle. In fact, Bush spokesman Tony Snow took issue with Boehner's contention that Democrats may be looking out for the terrorists' interests.

Snow said it was unfortunate but perhaps inevitable that "there will be some name calling" in the months before this fall's election as Republicans and Democrats battle for control of Congress.

At the same time, the White House vigorously defended Bush against Democratic charges that the president inappropriately used Monday's televised speech, marking the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, to try to bolster support for the divisive war in Iraq.

Snow said very little of the president's 17-minute address contained controversial statements, and that "this was not an attempt to stir the hornet's nest."

Democratic leaders called the speech a political argument trying to justify the war by linking it to the terrorists responsible for the Sept. 11 attacks. The

U.S. embassy in Damascus is targeted

BY SAM F. GHATTAS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Armed Islamic militants attempted to storm the U.S. Embassy in a brazen attack Tuesday, the government said. Four people were killed, including three of the assailants. There was no immediate claim of responsibility, but an al-Qaida offshoot group was suspected, Syria's ambassador to the United States said.

No Americans were hurt in the attack, in which the militants used automatic rifles, hand grenades and at least one van rigged with explosives.

The al-Qaida offshoot group, called Jund al-Sham, has been blamed for several attacks in Syria in recent years, the Syrian ambassador, Imad Moustapha, said in comments to CNN.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice praised Syrian security agents for repelling the attack, but added it was too early to know who may have been behind it.

"I think it's very early to try and speculate why this may have happened," said Rice, speaking at a news conference in Nova Scotia Tuesday with her Canadian counterpart, Peter MacKay.

The attackers apparently did not breach the high walls surrounding the embassy's white compound in the city's diplomatic neighborhood.

One of Syria's anti-terrorism forces was killed and 11 other people were wounded, the official news agency reported. They wounded, including a police officer, two Iraqis and seven people employed at nearby technical workshop.

A Chinese diplomat also was hit in the face by shrapnel and slightly injured while standing on top of a garage at the Chinese Embassy, China's Foreign Ministry said. The diplomat, political counselor Li Hongyu, was in stable condition at a hospital, the ministry said.

A witness said a Syrian guard outside the U.S. Embassy also was killed, but the government did not immediately confirm that. As at most American embassies worldwide, a local guard force patrols outside the compound's walls while U.S. Marines are mostly responsible for guarding classified documents and fighting off attackers inside the compound.

Witnesses also said the gunmen tried to throw hand grenades into the embassy compound, shouting "Allahu akbar!" or "God is great!" It was not clear if any of the grenades made it over the walls, which are about 8 feet high.

The attack came at a time of high tension between the United States and Syria over the recent Israeli-Hezbollah war in neighboring Lebanon. In Damascus, the sentiment has become increasingly anti-American.

Syria has seen previous attacks by Islamic militants. In June, Syrian anti-terrorism police fought Islamic militants near the Defense Ministry in a gun-battle that killed five people and wounded four. In 2004, four people were killed in a clash between police and a team of suspected bombers targeting the Canadian Embassy.

The Bush administration has been critical of the tight control that the regime of Syrian President Bashar Assad has over its people. Rice, meeting with her Canadian counterpart in Nova Scotia, would not speculate on whether Tuesday's attack may be an indication that the regime's control is slipping.

White House press secretary Tony Snow also expressed gratitude to Syria.

"Syrian officials came to aid of the Americans," Snow said. "The U.S. government is grateful for the assistance the Syrians provided in going after the attackers, and once again, that illustrates the importance of Syria being an important ally in the war on terror.

"It does not mean they are an ally. We are hoping they will become an ally and make the choice of fighting against terrorists," he said, adding that the Bush administration does not know who is responsible for the attack.

Washington recalled Ambassador Margaret Scobey after the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri in 2005, amid suspicions that Damascus had a role in it. She has not returned since, effectively downgrading U.S. diplomatic representation to the level of charge d'affaires.

Pools of blood lay on the sidewalk outside the U.S. Embassy, near a burned car apparently used by the attackers. A sport utility vehicle with U.S. diplomatic tags had a bullet hole in its windshield, and the windows of nearby guard houses also were shattered.

There were conflicting reports of what happened.

Syrian TV said one car was rigged with explosives but never was detonated by the attackers. But one witness said a second car did explode, and TV video

Madonna performs despite threats

By Judith Ingram
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Madonna took to the stage of Moscow's biggest stadium Tuesday night in spite of religious protesters' threats to disrupt the performance.

At Luzhniki Stadium, a crowd of about 35,000 watched Madonna perform a concert that has been met with increasing opposition as the pop star's "Confessions" tour traveled across Europe. The Russian Orthodox Church in particular has objected to religious imagery in the performance.

On Tuesday, no disorder was reported, although 10 Orthodox activists were detained outside the stadium for trying to conduct an unsanctioned protest ahead of the show. Other Orthodox faithful in small groups prayed outside the stadium.

Some 7,000 police officers were to be on hand in and around the stadium, on a bend in the Moscow River near Gorky Park.

At the heart of objections to the show is the culmination of the concert, when Madonna sings while suspended from a cross. She drew protests at earlier stops in Italy, Germany and the Netherlands, where last week a priest was arrested for phoning in a fake bomb threat.

"I think a deeply believing person would never go to the concert," the Rev. Vsevolod Chaplin, a spokesman for the Russian Orthodox Church, told Associated Press Television News. "This lady ... plays with religious symbols, and I think it's not only a matter of financial advancement of her production but it's also a kind of attempt to justify and sanctify her message and her sins, using something holy."

The Russian Orthodox Church has objected to the performance, pushing hard for the organizers to push it back from the initially planned date of Sept. 11 — both in a sign of respect for the victims of the terror attacks in the United States five years ago, and because that date coincided with a church holiday, the Feast of St. John the Baptist.

The venue was also switched. The concert originally was planned for a stage on the Vorobyovye Gory (Sparrow Hills), overlooking the Moscow River, but the Orthodox Church said that would be inappropriate because two churches are located there. The organizers scrambled to find another site after police said they could not ensure security in such a sprawling area.

City authorities pushed for the concert to be held at Tushino Airfield, the site of many outdoor rock extravaganzas. However, Tushino is on the outskirts of the city, it is anything but scenic and its security image is shadowed by an incident in 2003 when a double suicide bombing killed 14 spectators.

Scores of Orthodox protesters, dressed in religious costume and carrying religious symbols, have held noisy rallies over the past few weeks to protest the concert.

Madonna's next scheduled concerts are in Osaka, Japan and Tokyo on Sept. 16 and 20 respectively.

Anti-drug campaign loses battle

By Mark Magoon
The Daily Iowan (U. Iowa)

IOWA CITY, Iowa — The struggle to wage an effective war on drugs will continue after government officials recently discovered that their recent $1.4 billion anti-drug campaign failed to lure teenagers away from the illegal substances.

However, a different federal study reported that illicit drug use had fallen among those between the ages of 12 and 17—the demographic group much of the media campaign targeted.

The Government Accountability Office announced Aug. 25 that the failed campaign, which has aired since 1998, did not help reduce drug use. In some cases, the program may have actually persuaded youths that the use of illegal drugs is considered normal.

The government-backed crusade—which purchased TV time slots and radio ads that featured the slogan "the anti-drug"—were memorable to both parents and youth, but the ads did not change adolescents' attitudes about drugs, according to a University of Pennsylvania study that used the GAO's findings.

University of Iowa freshman Tom Flood said the media campaign had no effect on him.

"It's a personal decision to use drugs, and no commercial is going to change my mind," he said, adding that he and his friends often laughed at the ads because he said they were unrealistic.

But data from the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Administration, a branch of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, show teen drug use may be slowing down.

The rate of illicit drug use has moved consistently downward since 2002, according to the report. Only 9.9 percent of those between the ages of 12 and 17 used drugs in 2005, compared with 10.6 percent in 2004 and 11.2 percent in 2003, officials reported.

Sarah Hansen, the UI Student Health Service associate director for education and Health Iowa program coordinator, lauded the number of drug-awareness opportunities on campus.

"Health Iowa provides a continuum of services from education to substance-abuse evaluation, treatment, and care," she said.

The UI offers a drug seminar—a four-hour series attended by 220 students last year—as well as a private substance-abuse evaluation. Last year, 34 percent more students underwent the private evaluations. Health Iowa also added a marijuana-information series for low-risk pot offenders, which 56 students completed in its inaugural year. The Iowa City police know plenty of people who have had serious—or at least arrest-worthy—problems.

Harvard to end 'early action'

By Justin Pope
Associated Press

BOSTON — With a $26 billion endowment and 370 years of history, Harvard University says it can afford a gamble that could shake up the world of elite college admissions.

Harvard announced plans Tuesday to drop its "early action" admissions round — and urged rivals to follow. Under early action, applicants get word by late fall if they've been accepted to a college, but can still apply elsewhere in the spring. Some other schools have "early decision," meaning accepted applicants cannot apply elsewhere.

Harvard said such early admissions programs have two harmful effects: they may hurt schools' diversity because poor and minority students are less likely to use them, and they create anxiety for the typically more affluent applicants who take advantage of them.

Nearly 23,000 people applied to Harvard last year — including about 4,000 in the early round — but the move's broader significance is that it could persuade other elite universities to change their admissions policies. Many other prestigious colleges have acknowledged that early admissions programs have become a strategy tool for the well-connected, and have tweaked their programs. But none has dropped them.

If others follow Harvard's lead, it could noticeably change the college application experience of high-achieving students. Applicants would face less pressure to identify a first choice early in their senior year of high school — but would also lose the chance to put the process behind them.

If other colleges don't follow Harvard, the school's dean of admissions William Fitzsimmons acknowledged it may soon abandon the experiment.

There is no suggestion that Harvard, which admits one in 10 applicants, would lose all its appeal with top students. It announced separately Tuesday that it raised $595 million in fiscal 2006. But there is some risk Harvard could discourage exceptional students who might be drawn to schools where they can lock in a spot.

"There's no question (losing good students) is a risk," Fitzsimmons said. "We just felt it was much more important to do the right thing."

Counselors welcomed the announcement.

"I threw up my hands in glee," said Joanna Schultz, director of college counseling at the Ellis School in Pittsburgh, where about 60 percent of students apply to college early. Early admissions rounds are "pushing everything into the first two or three months of senior year," she said. "It doesn't let kids have a senior year."

Harvard's change will not affect high school seniors applying to the university this fall.

Harvard admits about 21 percent of early applicants, compared to about 7 percent in the later pool. It says that's largely because the earlier pool is academically stronger. Still, the early pool is far more likely to contain sophisticated applicants who have access to savvy college counselors and don't need financial aid.

Harvard and its peers have expanded financial aid but continue to face criticism for catering to the rich. At the most selective schools, a 2003 study found, just 3 percent of students came from the poorest socioeconomic quarter of families, while 74 percent came from the richest.

Fitzsimmons said he was not persuaded that Harvard's applicant quality would suffer. He also said Harvard's athletic director supported the move, even though sports teams use early action to line up recruits.

"If anybody can afford to take these kinds of risks, it would be Harvard," said Barmak Nassirian, associate executive director of the American Association of Collegiate Registrars and Admissions Officers. "When you turn away nine out of 10 applicants ... so what if you don't get your No. 1 choice? Your No. 6 choice is still exemplary."

Addition to space station is a success

By Rasha Madkour
Associated Press

HOUSTON — Two spacewalking astronauts Tuesday began installing the first big addition to the international space station in more than 3 1/2 years, and NASA pronounced the outing a success, even though a small bolt floated off and got lost.

"I felt a day like this is what NASA is supposed to do," lead space station flight director John McCullough. "This is what we're here to do."

Wearing bulky suits and gloves, the two Atlantis astronauts ventured outside to begin attaching a new 17 1/2-ton box-like truss section that the space shuttle delivered earlier this week. The job involved connecting 17 wires or tubes and tightening or loosening 167 bolts.

Astronaut Joe Tanner was working with a 1 1/2-inch bolt with an attached spring when the washer holding it in fell off. The bolt and spring floated over the head of astronaut Heidemarie Stefanyshyn-Piper and skittered across the truss.

While the washer went out into space harmlessly, Tanner worried the bolt and spring could get into the wiring and tubing of the truss and cause problems.

"I just hope that bolt is on its way to Mother Earth right now and not on its way to a crucial joint," Tanner said.

Even though NASA didn't have any video showing the bolt missing the mechanism, officials said they are certain that the bolt flew off into space harmlessly.

"It's pretty trivial," McCullough said. "It didn't go inside."

Space debris can be dangerous if it punctures space station walls or spacesuits and can jam crucial mechanisms. However, spacewalkers have a long history of losing things in space. In July, Discovery spacewalkers lost a 14-inch spatula that floated away.

Two more spacewalks will be conducted during the 11-day mission to finish hooking up the new addition to the half-built space station. Construction had been on hold since the Columbia disaster in 2003.

The 45-foot, $372 million addition includes two electricity-generating solar arrays that will be unfurled on Thursday. It will provide more power to the international space station in preparation for European, Russian and Japanese science modules to be added in the next few years.

The free-flying bolt marred an otherwise successful and speedy six-hour, 26-minute spacewalk.

"You did a phenomenal job and set the bar very high for the rest of the assembly," Mission Control told the crew.

Tanner and Piper zipped through a jam-packed list of arduous but mundane construction tasks, putting NASA ahead of schedule in connecting the addition. With extra time, Mission Control assigned them eight extra jobs of bolt removing and cover unlatching that would have been part of a Thursday spacewalk.

Atlantis astronauts Dan Burbank and Steve MacLean will venture outside on Wednesday.

The spacewalk was a first for rookie astronaut Piper, who joined an elite club of female spacewalkers.

Only six other women have participated in any of the 159 U.S. spacewalks, and only one has gone on any of the 118 Russian spacewalks. A major reason: Spacesuits are too big for most women, said Piper, who is 5 feet 10. "If you fit in a suit, then the easier it is to work," she said.

Engineers determined that a protruding piece of plastic — which NASA initially thought was a filler between tiles — poses no threat at all, said John Shannon, NASA mission management team chairman.

Atlantis' heat shield is in such good shape — free from the type of the damage that led to Columbia's disintegration — that it is clear for landing at the end of its 11-day scheduled mission, engineers said.

Hussein lashes out in genocide trial

Former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein testifies during his trial on genocide charges in Baghdad Sept. 12, 2006.

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Saddam Hussein thundered against "agents of Iran and Zionism" Tuesday as Kurdish witnesses described atrocities against them. In a moment of defiance, a witness snapped: "Congratulations, Saddam. You are in a cage."

Saddam and the six other defendants in the genocide trial sat silently as witnesses told of Operation Anfal, the 1987-88 campaign to suppress a Kurdish revolt in northern Iraq during which the prosecution says about 180,000 Kurds died.

But when Saddam heard a lawyer describe Kurdish guerrillas, known as peshmergas, as freedom fighters, the deposed president bellowed: "You are agents of Iran and Zionism. We will crush your heads."

Before the judge cut off his microphone, Saddam said the Kurdish guerrillas were rebels and "in any country in the world where there is rebellion, the authorities ask the army to defeat it."

He demanded that the word peshmerga, Kurdish for "those who face death," be stricken from the trial record and complained that the five-judge panel had tolerated "lots of violations" of judicial proceedings during Tuesday's session.

"But if we were to get angry, it would be something else," Saddam said, banging his fist against the podium.

He also insisted that "neutral" experts — not Americans — examine the identities of the witnesses and the bodies allegedly found in mass graves.

The prosecution demanded that Saddam's statement about the Kurdish rebellion be considered a confession. Chief Judge Abdullah al-Amiri rejected the motion, but took note of it when the prosecution threatened to walk out.

If convicted, Saddam and the other defendants could face death by hanging.

Saddam has maintained that the Anfal crackdown was directed against Kurdish guerrillas who were allied with Iran in the 1980-88 war and that loyal Iraqi Kurds were treated fairly.

That claim was disputed by four Kurdish witnesses, who told of ferocious attacks by Iraqi forces against their villages as well as mass arrests and killings of civilians.

The most chilling account came from Ghafour Hassan Abdullah, who said Iraqi troops attacked his northern village with aircraft and artillery in February 1988.

"At night, I heard the screaming of women and children," said Ghafour Hassan Abdullah.

Abdullah said he fled to neighboring Iran, but that his mother and two sisters disappeared. Years later, their identity cards were found in a mass grave near Hatra, about 120 miles from their home village, he said.

Abdullah, now 29, asked rhetorically why the Kurds, a non-Arab minority comprising 15 to 20 percent of Iraq's population, had been so brutally suppressed under Saddam's regime.

"Why? Because we are Kurds," he said. "Why did all disasters befall us? Because we are Kurds."

Abdullah then turned to Saddam and said: "Congratulations, Saddam. You are in a cage." He demanded compensation for the loss of his family.

Another witness, farmer Mahmoud Hama Aziz, said he lost a brother in fighting with Iraqi forces in 1987, months before their village was razed.

"They (Iraqi forces) stole everything in the village, then burned it down," he said.

Aziz said he and two friends sought refuge in Iran, leaving behind a sister-in-law and her five children who later dropped from sight. In 2004, he identified four of their bodies in a mass grave.

Omar Khudhir Mohammed Amin, 53, testified that he lost 19 relatives — including his four brothers and sisters and their children — in the offensive.

"The court in Sulaimaniyah asked for me. I went there and was shown their IDs. They showed me six IDs that belonged to my relatives. I told them I want to visit them, but court officials told me they are in a mass grave in Hatra," he said.

Akram Ali Hussein Mahmoud, 41, said he lost 70 relatives in Operation Anfal, including a 5-year-old boy who starved. Residents of his village fled into the mountains when Iraqi troops launched a chemical attack.

"We heard big bangs and later bad smells," he said. "We ran to the mountains. ... We saw a white layer cover the ground. ... The trees turned gray and white, so we knew that a chemical material was used."

Tuesday's session is the fifth since Saddam's trial on genocide charges against Kurds opened Aug. 21.

Saddam is awaiting a verdict Oct. 16 in his first trial, in which he was accused in the killings of 148 Shiites after a 1982 assassination attempt against him in the town of Dujail. If convicted, he also could face the death penalty in that case.

Police investigate star's son's death

By Jessica Robertson
Associated Press

NASSAU, Bahamas — Police investigating the death of Anna Nicole Smith's 20-year-old son said Tuesday that they had no evidence that he had suffered a heart attack or that drugs were involved.

The 38-year-old reality TV star and former Playboy playmate found her son, Daniel, unresponsive Sunday morning in a chair in her hospital room, where she was recuperating from giving birth to a baby girl, and called for help, according to police.

A hospital official said medical personnel applied CPR and other measures to try to save the young man.

"Resuscitative efforts using advanced life-support protocol continued for 22 minutes without response," Barry Rassin, president and CEO of Doctors Hospital in Nassau, said at a news conference. Daniel Smith had arrived at the hospital late Saturday to visit his mother, and Rassin said hospital employees saw him "attending to his mother's comfort" during the night.

Dr. Hubert Minnis, obstetrician for Anna Nicole Smith, said she had an "uneventful" Caesarean section at the private hospital on Thursday.

"Both mother and baby are presently doing well," Minnis said at the press conference.

Police said they were waiting for a pathologist's report to determine the cause of death.

"We have got to give them to time to do their job professionally and properly. I wait for them," said Reginald Ferguson, assistant commissioner of the Royal Bahamian Police Force.

The Nassau Guardian, citing unidentified sources, reported Monday that Daniel Wayne Smith had died of a heart attack. On Tuesday, the newspaper reported that a preliminary investigation found that Smith had anidepressants in his system. That report cited sources close to the case.

Ferguson dismissed the reports. "That's just talk, we have no evidence at this time to suggest that," he told The Associated Press, when asked whether drugs had contributed to Smith's death.

Earlier, the commissioner told People magazine that there was no evidence "at this time" that the young man had suffered a heart attack.

It was unclear whether a coroner had completed the autopsy, or whether police would release the results.

"If the family requests that the information not be given out, then certainly, I imagine we would do as they ask," Ferguson said.

Butler's Funeral Homes & Crematoriums, hired by the family, said Tuesday it expected to receive Smith's body after the autopsy is completed and would then submit paperwork for its repatriation to California.

The body was identified at the morgue Monday by Smith's lawyer, Howard K. Stern, who is also handling arrangements with the funeral home, said Loretta Butler-Turner of the funeral home.

When Daniel Smith was born in 1986, his mother was married to Billy Smith. The couple, who met while working together at Jim's Krispy Fried Chicken in Mexia, Texas, married in 1985 and divorced in 1987. The son had small roles in her movies "Skyscraper" and "To the Limit."

The identity of the newborn girl's father has not been publicly disclosed.

Anna Nicole Smith married Texas oil tycoon J. Howard Marshall II in 1994, when she was 26 and he was 89. He died the following year.

She then feuded with Marshall's son, Pierce Marshall, over her entitlement to the tycoon's estate before he died in June at age 67.

Smith won a $474 million judgment, which was cut to about $89 million, and eventually reduced to zero. In May, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the Smith could continue to pursue her claim in federal courts in California, despite a Texas state court ruling that Marshall's youngest son was the sole heir.

Bush's speech pays tribute to Sept. 11 victims

Democrats contend mismanagement of the war calls for a change in congressional leadership.

"The president spoke for his administration, not for the nation," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "This was a political move, designed to tap the overwhelming public sentiment to destroy al-Qaida as a way to bolster sagging public support for the war in Iraq."

Reid and Pelosi circulated a letter they sent to the television networks and cable news channels asking for equal coverage of Democratic viewpoints on terrorism and Iraq. "There has been a complete absence of balance in the news coverage of national security issues," they wrote.

In response, representatives for ABC and CBS said the networks cover news fairly and accurately and will continue to do so.

Bush's address paid tribute to the nearly 3,000 victims of the Sept. 11 attacks and described the enemy as a global network of extremists who hate freedom and tolerance. "The war against this enemy is more than a military conflict," he said. "It is the decisive ideological struggle of the 21st century, and the calling of our generation."

Much of the speech described the administration's foreign policy following the attack and the decision to go after enemies before they could harm Americans.

"I am often asked why we are in Iraq when Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks," Bush said. "The answer is that the regime of Saddam Hussein was a clear threat."

Bush contended disaster could result if the United States pulled out of the war, emboldening terrorists.

The liberal MoveOn.org planned to air a cable television ad this week accusing Bush and congressional Republicans of politicizing Sept. 11 by exploiting the attacks to invade Iraq and win re-election. Two conservative groups, Progress for America and the Center for Security Policy, started running their own ads last week backing Bush's policy and telling viewers to vote "as if your life depends on it."

Republicans and Democrats in Congress showed other cracks in the unity they espoused for Monday's Sept. 11 remembrance, arguing over language in a commemorative resolution scheduled for debate Wednesday.

Democrats asked Republican leaders to delete a portion that names a series of laws, including the USA Patriot Act, that Congress passed in the wake of the terrorist attacks.

Boehner indicated the GOP leadership didn't plan to change the resolution. "I, for the life of me, I have no idea what the objection is," he told reporters. "At the end of the day, the majority has to do what the majority has to do."

The White House, meanwhile, pushed Congress to enact new anti-terrorism laws, but the administration faced stiff resistance from some senators and House leaders — including some Republicans — who said they would not give the White House a blank check.

That threw into question whether the White House could win its anti-terror measures before the midterm elections. The administration wants legislation to allow for easier prosecution of terror suspects and tracking by electronic surveillance.

U.S. President George W. Bush sits at his desk in the Oval Office of the White House in Washington DC, after addressing the nation Sept. 11, 2006.

Unknown assailants attack U.S. embassy showed a burned car.

The Interior Ministry, which is in charge of police, said a fourth attacker now in detention was wounded in what it called a "terrorist attack." The report, carried on state-run television, said anti-terror units brought "the situation under control" and an investigation was under way.

In Washington, a State Department spokesman confirmed the attack by "unknown assailants" but had few details. "Local authorities have responded and are on the scene," said spokesman Kurtis Cooper said.

A U.S. Embassy statement said the embassy came under armed attack at 10:10 a.m. and that all embassy personnel were safe. One Syrian guard was injured by gunfire and was hospitalized in a stable condition, the statement said.

The embassy's charge d'affaires, Michael Corbin, met with Interior Minister Bassam Abdel Maguid at the scene, and spoke by phone with assistant minister of foreign affairs, Ahmed Arnous, according to the statement.

It said the Syrian government has pledged full security cooperation.

About 30 Syrian guards usually are posted around the embassy 24 hours a day, Moustapha said.

State television said four armed attackers "attempted to storm" the embassy, using automatic rifles and hand grenades. Syrian security guards attacked the gunmen, killing three and wounding a fourth, TV said.

The attackers came in two cars and parked one that was rigged with explosives in front of the embassy but did not blow it up, state-run TV reported. Explosives experts dismantled the bomb, it said.

But a witness told The Associated Press that two gunmen drove up in front of the embassy, got out of their car, shot at the Syrian sentries at the building's entrance, and then detonated explosives in the car.

The witness, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter, said the security personnel fired back, and security forces rushed to the scene.

Television showed a delivery van loaded with pipe bombs strapped to large propane gas canisters outside the embassy. Had the bombs detonated, the explosions could have caused massive damage.

The video also showed the charred remains of a smaller car parked several feet behind the van.

Up to 40 U.S. diplomats are posted at the embassy, which is "average" in size, according to Tom Casey, a deputy spokesman at the State Department.

Dangers of jet lag investigated in study the cycle.

The simulations suggest that the system gets most out of whack when the master clock is shifted forward between five and eight hours. After such a large leap, it appears that the master clock actually overshoots the desired time.

Then, following a slight delay, the intermediate component and some of the peripheral components overshoot as well, depending on their inherent circadian time and their connectivity with the master clock. For example, the peripheral components that already tend to lag actually try to catch up by backtracking, achieving a leap forward of six hours by delaying themselves 18 hours.

Seigelmann suggests travelers and workers aim for the larger shift of the master clock that still leads to coordinated shifting. Their analysis suggests that a four-hour advance pushes the entire system in the right direction, causing all components to advance smoothly and quickly. And while their model addresses the system in rats, a nocturnal animal, the researchers note that the general principle is likely to be widely applicable.

"Jet lag isn't a horrible thing that we have to conquer and our clock is a very important regulator at a basic level — medications to target the clock may be counter-productive if they affect future oscillatory behavior," she says. "Instead, take a stopover if you are traveling for more than 6 hours — relax for a day and then continue. Understand and go with your body's natural oscillations."

"I think people will pay more attention to this as we learn more," she says. "If you are flying to a meeting where you need to be alert and able to concentrate, you can prepare your body for those particular goals by making the shift gradually."

Prozac in streams endangering mussels

The antidepressant drug Prozac (fluoxetine) can disrupt the reproductive cycle of freshwater mussels and increase their risk of extinction, says a U.S. study presented Monday at the national meeting of the American Chemical Society, in San Francisco.

As with other drugs, remnants of Prozac are flushed from the body and travel in wastewater that reaches streams and rivers.

This study found that the drug causes female mussels to release their larvae before they're able to survive on their own.

"The results from this study were quite alarming. When larvae are released too early, they are not viable, which only contributes to the problems faced by struggling populations of native freshwater mussels," co-investigator Rebecca Heltsley of the U.S. National Institute of Standards and Technology, Hollings Marine Laboratory in Charleston, N.C., said in a prepared statement.

About 70 percent of the nearly 300 species of native North American freshwater mussels are extinct, endangered or in decline due to pollution, loss or alteration of habitat, increased sediment in rivers, and competition from invasive foreign species.

"The presence of Prozac and similar drugs in U.S. rivers and streams has likely compounded the problem," Heltsley said.

"Protecting freshwater mussels and other aquatic life that are susceptible to the unintended consequences of exposure to pharmaceuticals in our rivers and streams will take a concentrated effort," she said. "These efforts could include the development of more efficient wastewater treatment facilities that can filter out these products before they reach our waterways."

For more on antidepressants such as Prozac, head to the U.S. National Institute of Mental Health.

Save the planet?

Debbie Friedman

This summer Al Gore returned from the shadows of the political world with a new attitude, a revitalized cause and a fantastic movie. Gore stars in a documentary film called "An Inconvenient Truth," which showcases the dramatic evidence behind the global warming crisis and adamantly urges the public to take action. In the movie and around the country, the former Vice President warns that if we (the world) do not take drastic action to reduce our harmful greenhouse gas emissions, our future is in serious trouble. What's more, this drastic action needs to take place in the next 10 years or we will, "hit a point of no return." If you are in the mood for a really scary movie, see this.

Aside from the sensational images and evidence that basically foresee a catastrophic environmental calamity, the movie ends with the confident belief that the citizens of this world will prevent such an event and save the planet. But I wonder, will we?

It's not so much that it is difficult to get people to care about the global warming crisis, as it is to get them to act, since individual efforts have no visual or immediate effects. It is for this reason that the kind of change needed to save the planet seems like a hopeless dream, but if you look outside yourself to groups and institutions all around the world that are making change happen everyday, the picture looks a bit more optimistic. Our campus is one example.

While UMass inevitably emits large quantities of greenhouse gases into the atmosphere, the administration is making serious efforts to cut back. Associate Vice Chancellor of Administration and Finance, Robert Francis, says that UMass has a very good reputation for following all EPA regulations and sees environment concerns as a high priority. Francis also says that UMass regards energy conservation as the most realistic and effective approach to helping with the global warming problem. He cited that in the last two years UMass has reduced its water usage by one third and its steam output by 24 percent. This kind of conservation bodes well for the environment.

Another major environmental-friendly action UMass has taken is the addition of a new central heating plant – a change from coal to oil and natural gas. This $118 million plant, which opens in 2008, is said to, "Significantly reduce greenhouse gas emissions." It is also said to generate much more energy (a change from four megawatts to 14 megawatts), which results in decreased reliance on outside utilities and promotes energy efficiency. UMass's decision to invest in this expensive, yet innovative, new plant backs the claim that environmental issues are a top priority on the administrative agenda.

He cited that in the last two years UMass has reduced its water usage by one third and its steam output by 24 percent. This kind of conservation bodes well for the environment.

Many UMass professors are also very involved in helping aid this crisis. Professors throughout the science departments have and are conducting significant studies on climate change and experimenting with new energy sources that will help us in the future. One such study on climate change was done in part by Ray Bradley, a Geosciences professor here. He was part of the research team whose data on climate change, now referred to as, "hockey-stick data," helped to prompt a congressional investigation on climate change in 2001.

This was around the time that President Bush finally acknowledged that global warming was more than just some theory, and it gained the attention it deserved in the political world. This data continues to encourage much debate and conversation on the issue in Washington, which of course is an extremely beneficial thing.

Last, but certainly not least, MASSPIRG (UMass-Amherst Chapter) continues to be a driving force behind environmental concerns in our area. Over the past three semesters they have run a campaign called the Campus Climate Challenge (CCC) with the goal of reducing campus emissions as close to zero as possible. They aim to do this by getting UMass interested in clean energy sources, like solar panels on classrooms and a campus windmill.

It also encourages students to reduce their energy usage by holding a contest in which the most energy efficient dorm wins a prize. The CCC is a global effort of dedicated student environmental groups joined through the Energy Action Coalition. By 2008 they say over 1,000 universities will have taken the challenge, so don't be so quick to wave their small fee on your tuition bill.

Our faculty, administration and environmentally concerned peers are doing what they can, now it's time for everyone else to follow suit. You can take action right now just by throwing this out in the recycling bin instead of the trash, but I sincerely hope we all will do a lot more than that. Yesterday was the time to start caring –today is the time to start doing. Check out www.climatecrisis.net, see "An Inconvenient Truth" and do something about this problem before it's too late. Your great grand kids will really appreciate it.

Debbie Friedman is a Collegian columnist.

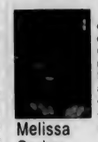
Getting away with prostitution on the Web



Melissa Garber

In a not very surprising turn of events, the Internet version of the classifieds, Craigslist.com, is being utilized for more than just apartment rentals and dating prospects. Sex solicitation has just become a whole lot easier. With the click of a button anyone can post an ad online seeking to fulfill their sexual appetite.

Craigslist makes the whole transaction pretty simple with its extensive collection of personal ads posted under "casual encounters." One look at those ads, and it's blatantly obvious what these people are looking for.

No matter how morally repugnant it might seem to be for some, finding a consensual adult sex partner through an Internet personal ad is a perfectly legal operation. What is not legal, though, is purchasing a sex partner through an Internet ad; that's called prostitution no matter what way you look at it.

The line between ad posters searching for legal sex partners and ad posters searching for prostitutes is almost nonexistent. This summer alone, two local men were caught soliciting sex on Craigslist.

According to the Republican, James Aspell, 35, of Connecticut and more recently William Conley, 59, of Springfield were caught this summer soliciting sex on Craigslist. What's worse is they were targeting college students. UMass police responded to the ads posing as students, which led to the suspects' subsequent arrests.

The police are doing what they can by monitoring Craigslist ads for sex solicitation, but it is nearly an impossible undertaking. When ad posters don't list the price in their ads, how can anyone regulate prostitution on the Web?

For every potential sex offender thwarted by authorities I could only assume that thousands of others are completing the deed. Getting prostitutes and their customers off the street is hard enough, but at least there are few blurred lines when dealing with those people.

Imagine having to categorize every "casual encounter" ad poster on the Internet as either a potential sex offender or as a person just looking for legal, consensual unpaid sex. It is a daunting task. How much prostitution has slipped through the cracks of our legal system? I cannot even fathom the numbers.

Who would report these people who are threats to our society when they themselves at first agreed to the act?

A fact that troubles me a lot is the two men caught by the UMass police were searching for college students. These ad posters weren't looking for traditional prostitutes. They were looking for stereotypically money deprived students. This has to make you wonder how many college students have succumbed to this illegal form of income.

College is expensive, and it must be pretty easy to exploit a student's financial status. You might not find a college student on a street corner, but it's just as bad for one to be responding to personal ads offering money for sexual acts. It's disgusting that people would single out vulnerable students for their perverted pleasure, but I guess students aren't completely innocent in this situation either.

So, exactly how many people prostitute themselves on the Internet, and how many times do people get away with obtaining prostitutes off the Internet before they are reprimanded? What about the thousands who will never be caught because of the obscurity of finding these criminals?

What's truly terrifying about this epidemic is the threat of meeting sexual predators who could potentially molest or rape their respondents. Just because a person agrees to one sexual act doesn't mean they agree to everything an ad poster tries to force on them.

The sex may start out consensual, but in these kinds of situations, who knows how many times the act shifts to sexual assault? Who would report these people who are threats to our society when they themselves at first agreed to the act? It would be a hard case to argue, but by ignoring the situation sexual predators are left on the loose. It's a scary thought, but what can be done?

Sex solicitation on the Internet is an unmanageable problem. If Craigslist couldn't offer a haven for these people, then someplace else on the Internet would provide some other forum. There is no way to regulate the Internet without impeding on our freedom of speech. As Ben Franklin said, "They that can give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety."

So what can you do other than hope the police continue constant monitoring of Internet personal ads for illegal activity? Nothing really, all that's left to do is just wait for the next potential, or already accomplished, sexual predator to be caught.

Five hundred weapons found

Ben Duffy

The biggest news item of the summer was not the Israeli invasion of Lebanon, nor was it the foiled terrorist attacks on U.S.-bound airliners flying out of London. The biggest story of the summer was a report from the National Ground Intelligence Center (NGIC), which announced the discovery of approximately 500 chemical munitions uncovered in Iraq.

In other words, WMD have been found in Iraq. While you might expect this bombshell (pun intended) to rock the Iraq war debate, nothing of the sort has happened. Quickly deemed insignificant, this report has been ignored by the so-called "anti-war" Left and the laughably "non-partisan" American media.

In order to justify putting this incredibly significant story on the back page, the media needed a reason why these chemical munitions were not really consequential after all. They came up with two such justifications.

The first justification is that these weapons were so old that they could not even be used as designed, and are therefore harmless. One Associated Press story on the report cites a number of anonymous sources and one David Kay, former head of the Iraq Survey Group, all saying almost the same thing: these weapons are harmless.

"The chemicals that are contained in the munitions that are referred to in this report are capable of creating mass casualties," said Lt. Gen. Michael Maples.

But are they really harmless? I'm sure David Kay is knowledgeable on WMD, but other experts on the subject think differently. The report itself calls the weapons "hazardous and potentially lethal." Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency testified that "We do assess that the chemical munitions that have been found are hazardous, and potentially they could be lethal. The chemicals that are contained in the munitions that are referred to in this report are capable of creating mass casualties."

The Commander of the NGIC, Colonel John Chiu, also contradicts Kay. "The munitions that we're finding, the agents within those munitions are still toxic, and if exposed to enough of a degree, would prove to be lethal...They do constitute weapons of mass destruction."

The second "reason" why these weapons aren't really WMD is because they are pre-1991 weapons. As "The Washington Times" reports, "Democrats dismiss the findings. They say the munitions were found in small clusters and are 1980s vintage. In other words, Iraq produced them before the 1990 invasion of Kuwait and thus they are irrelevant to the CIA's flawed 2002 National Intelligence Estimate (NIE), on which President Bush largely based his decision to go to war..." Nice dodge, Democrats.

Republican Curt Weldon rightly counters that the resolution to go to war "didn't say pre-'91 chemical weapons. It didn't say post-'91 chemical weapons. It said chemical weapons. Saddam Hussein violated this resolution ... In part because of such violations, we voted to authorize the use of military force in Iraq."

Weldon is correct. The NIE was not the basis for the rationale of this war. For that, we have to look to the resolution to which Weldon is referring, HJ 114, which authorized the President to take the nation to war. Look through the document, and see if there is any stipulation that weapons have to have been built after 1991 in order to count. It isn't there.

Another relevant document is UN Resolution 1441, the esteemed world body's 17th and final resolution demanding Iraq cease WMD programs, destroy all illegal weapons and allow inspectors to verify compliance. After this resolution passed the Security Council by a slim margin of 15 to zero, the UN itself considered Iraq to be in non-compliance. You can read through the entire document, and you will not find a shred of evidence that WMD produced before 1991 are somehow illegitimate.

Here's what the document does say about WMD: "Deploring the fact that Iraq has not provided an accurate, full, final, and complete disclosure, as required by resolution 687 (1991), of all aspects of its programmes to develop weapons of mass destruction...and of all holdings of such weapons, their components and production facilities and locations."

Resolution 1441 basically states that Saddam was never in compliance with the terms of his 1991 cease-fire (UN Resolution 687), which specifically ordered him to forfeit his WMD and never pursue more. Clearly, if the resolution was passed in 1991, then they must have been talking about pre-1991 weapons. Five hundred of those weapons have now been found.

In any case, if these were pre-1991 weapons, they must have been sitting in Iraq for a very long time. They were there in 1991 when they were supposed to have been destroyed, in 2002 when the UN passed 1441 and in 2003 when coalition troops crossed the border into Iraq. France was wrong.

Moveon.org was wrong. Cindy Sheehan was wrong. America was right. This attempt to move the goalposts is bogus. WMD have been found in Iraq, and the effort to discredit these weapons has been nothing more than grasping at straws. Hidebound ideologues will never believe, because they have chosen not to, but as for the rest of us, we can correct the record and form a more informed opinion about the war in Iraq.

Employment options waning

Kevin Pascucci

Some would say that money makes the world go 'round. I would like to say I've found otherwise, but unfortunately I can't. It's for that reason I've held a job ever since I was 15 years old. In high school, I was able to find jobs during the summers because I wasn't going anywhere in the fall and could continue to work at my job through the school year. That all changed when I got to college though.

I spent the first month of the first summer after my freshman year at UMass looking for a job. I wish I were kidding when I say I applied for over 10 different jobs that summer. I finally got a landscaping job and worked for the last two months of the summer. The next summer I was able to get a job a little bit earlier, but it still wasn't easy.

This summer I decided to live out of state with a friend of mine in Connecticut, and I moved into his house after I finished my finals. I decided to try looking for a job waiting tables, seeing as I've heard there's good money in that. I must have applied at every restaurant within a 20-mile radius.

Needless to say, that didn't work out for me. Every restaurant either couldn't take on any more staff or wanted someone that wasn't going to have to leave in the fall. To make a long story short, I ended up working a short-lived job as a grounds maintainer at an amusement park, as well as doing a few gigs with a catering company, all before going through a temp agency to end up getting an office job at a town water company. This summer was probably the most colorful period of time in my employment history to date.

Where am I going with this? Maybe I just want to rant a little bit about what a hard time the average college student has getting work during their summer breaks. Perhaps I want to let people like me know they're not alone in this common struggle.

It's great that your parents have enough money to put you through college and unknowingly give you beer money, but the real world is going to come at you like a punch in the face when you graduate.

Unsuccessful job hunting wouldn't be such a big issue for college students if it weren't for all the costs that come along with being in college. With tuitions on the rise all around the country and more and more students putting themselves through school on their own, the need to have an income is mostly unavoidable.

There are those who are lucky enough to have mom and dad pay for everything, but don't even get me started on them. It's great that your parents have enough money to put you through college and unknowingly give you beer money, but the real world is going to come at you like a punch in the face when you graduate. That's all I'm going to say.

I'm sure it's been like this for college students for a long time, but I have to think that the current state of the economy has something to do with the hard time others, and I, have had finding work. With our country at war and more and more money being devoted to that end, the job market has taken a blow as a result. I don't want to make this a political argument, but I can't help but speculate as to why so many people have trouble finding employment.

Some would say the economy has barely changed since we went to war with Iraq, while others would view our foreign relations campaign as the biggest blow to the American economy in a long time. After viewing official rates of unemployment since 2001 on the official Web site for the U.S. Department of Labor, it becomes apparent an argument can be made on both sides. Since we entered Iraq, the unemployment rate has been a rollercoaster of highs and lows. With support for the war waning, I guess only time will tell who is truly right.

As I go into my senior at UMass, I can't help but look to next summer when I will be looking for something a little more permanent. Will I have to move somewhere far away to get a decently paying job? Am I going to be able to find a job at all? Like I said, the job market has been a rollercoaster, so only time will tell if things are going to get better from here. Personally, I hope they do. I've got to pay off my student loans somehow.

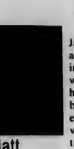
The one to vote for



Matt Giancola

Warm days in January are rare, and discovering a candidate who inspires hope even rarer, but those two events collided when I went to see Deval Patrick speak in my hometown last winter. The hall was not filled to capacity by any means. A few families, political activists and seniors sat around waiting for the gubernatorial candidate who few had heard of come by and give his speech. I arrived, not knowing anyone and sipped the coffee at the back of the room. I knew little about Massachusetts politics, focusing mainly on national matters and the congressional races. I didn't know what I was getting into.

Patrick arrived a few minutes late; he had been in a completely different part of the state earlier that day. Someone said he had to be in Gloucester in two hours. That's an hour and a half drive. This guy really must have wanted to speak to everyone.

He had no microphone, no podium to stand behind. There were no big signs behind him or balloons. It was just him, and then he spoke. He told us about his life, how he grew up in the poor South Side of Chicago sharing a bedroom with his siblings and mother. He got the opportunity to go to Milton Academy and later, Harvard University. He worked for the NAACP and was the top attorney for civil rights under the Clinton administration. After those impressive stints, he worked in the private sector, reforming many of the practices of Texaco, Coca-Cola and Ameriquest.

His story was impressive enough, but then he explained what he wanted to do as governor of Massachusetts. He explained what everyone in the room already felt – that cities and towns are struggling to get by and major change is needed. Property taxes are hurting families and leaving schools funded unfairly.

Talk of cutting the income tax is a political gimmick, as it will only hurt services and raise fees and other taxes. The best way to get Massachusetts' economy rolling again is to invest in alternative energy, reinvest in our cities and towns and make regulating businesses less cumbersome and time consuming. Business will again flock to our state and families will find it easier to make a living. Once Massachusetts begins thriving again, the income tax rollback may be a good idea.

After Patrick's speech, he went around to meet everyone. His aides told him he had to get going to the next event. I figured I would just shake his hand and tell him he gave a really good speech, but he asked me where I went to school. When I told him I go to UMass he remarked the fees were very high, and he wanted to do something about it. For years, the state has done very little to help its public universities, cutting hundreds of millions of dollars in funding.

He could have just said hello, but instead he stopped, took time out of his busy schedule and talked policy with a student. It's called class, and it's been missing from politics for a long time now.

After campaigning for a year and getting the word out to voters around the state, the people began to listen. His poll numbers began to steadily rise. At the state Democratic Convention, Patrick won 58 percent of the votes in a three-way race.

I have witnessed many political speeches in my life, but his convention speech was on its own plane. It combined his common sense approaches to governance and a hope that citizens have been desperately searching for four decades.

He has been running his campaign according to his ideals. He is not relying on money to blitz the media like other candidates are. He is instead focusing on the voters, talking with them about their problems and what they would like to see done. Hundreds of volunteers have been going door to door over the summer speaking with these voters. No other campaign is focusing on the people of this state like he is.

The Democratic primary is on September 19th. Tom Reilly and Chris Gabrielli are both good men, good Democrats. All three of them would be a better governor than Kerry Healey, but none offer the vision, the leadership or the policy experience that Patrick possesses. Reilly has done a good job as Attorney General, but his campaign practices have put his competence into question. Gabrielli has good ideas regarding early education and stem cell research, but circumventing the party caucuses and spending a record amount of money shows little respect for the voters of Massachusetts.

In the coming months, state governance will be reshaped from a cynical game of partisanship to an inspiring act of civic good; not because of Patrick the man, but because of the ideas he represents and the ideas that motivate the people to make this state a better place.

'Joementum' running low

Dan Nicastro

Joseph Lieberman has been called many names since he was chosen as a running mate by Al Gore in the 2000 Presidential election. He's been called a "hawkish Democrat" for his support of the Iraq War. He's been called one of George Bush's Democratic cronies. Stephen Colbert calls him one of his "favorite Republicans."

Simply mention Lieberman's name to a group of passionate Democrats, and they will either groan or laugh. I know that I have used Lieberman as the butt of countless, lame political science jokes. It now seems as if "Joementum" may not exist for much longer, as he was defeated by Ned Lamont in the Democratic Party. At first, I was happy that the pro-war Lieberman would not retain his senatorial seat, but then I started thinking about the possible repercussions within the Democratic Party.

Since the 1930s, the Democrats have been known as the "big tent" party because of their basic tenants and because of their stances on issues such as universal health care, civil liberties and civil rights have appealed to a very large and very diverse group of people. However, there has been a shift in the last 10 years as the Republicans have called themselves the new "big tent" party, and Joe Lieberman's loss signals that the Democrats may have given up on the idea of the "big tent."

He is judged almost solely by his voting record on the war, and it has killed his political career as a Democrat.

Joe Lieberman lost the primary to Ned Lamont because of his support on the war in Iraq. Since the war broke out, Lieberman has repeatedly been accused by Democrats of being a Republican and serving Republican interests, as groups on the Left tried to force him out of office by any means possible. He is judged almost solely by his voting record on the war, and it has killed his political career as a Democrat.

About a week before the primary I realized that the only thing that I really knew for sure about Joe Lieberman was that he was in support of the war in Iraq. I decided to check Lieberman's voting record in Congress. Surprisingly, I found that he has consistently voted Democratic, especially on Democratic issues. He has consistently voted very strongly in favor of a woman's right to choose, disagreeing with the ban on partial birth abortions. He voted against the recommendation of an anti-flag burning amendment and was against the Constitutional amendment prohibiting gay marriage.

He supports comprehensive national health insurance, including coverage for every child and access to prescription drugs from Canada. He has repeatedly supported a minimum wage increase, and he disagrees with the privatization of social security. Joe Lieberman is definitely a Democrat, albeit a conservative one.

So how did Joe Lieberman, a man whose voting record supports the Democratic Party platform for the most part, lose to an unknown newcomer? The problem with Lieberman's defeat is not that he was defeated by a more Liberal challenger. The problem lies in exactly how he was defeated. Ned Lamont and his supporters were able to secure victory in the Connecticut primary because they repeatedly hammered home the point that Joe Lieberman supported the unpopular Iraq War.

The big tent of the Democratic Party is in serious danger of blowing away in the breeze. The war in Iraq is becoming the defining issue for the Democrats, something which will haunt them down the road. If she runs in 2008, Hillary Clinton will be haunted by the fact that she voted for the war. John Kerry faced that problem in the 2004 presidential election when he was labeled a flip flopper because he voted for the war in Iraq, and then decided that he was against it when he ran for president. Should this be the only issue?

Although it is an extremely serious issue, the war in Iraq is only one of many hot button issues on the political radar. The Lieberman loss seems to signal the Democrats are ready to abandon any and all of the core issues that have made them appealing to so many people for such a long time. If this really is the case, the Democrats and their supporters may have a long road ahead of them.

The Democrats were able to hold on to power for so long because of their progressive stances on issues like civil rights, civil liberties, education, employment and equal rights. In the past, Democrats did not need to agree on every single issue because there were so many that were considered core values. The Republicans were the one issue party, voting in favor of business and upper income tax brackets. However, the Democrats are in danger of becoming just like those they fight politically, as the big tent that housed so many people for so long is in danger of being crushed under the weight of a single issue. The Joe Lieberman loss may not be a horrible thing in the short term for the Democrats, but it could kill them in the long run.

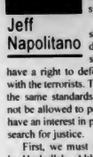
Stand with victims, not perps



Jeff Napolitano

Before the debate begins about the recent war against Lebanon, I must beg that we avoid some of the pitfalls of the past. Instead of jingoism and name-calling we must take a cautious step back, determine which principles we stand for, establish the appropriate facts and come to reasonable conclusions.

Those who decry aggression by the state of Israel cannot be reflexively derided as anti-Semitic. Those who suggest the brown folk of the world have a right to defend themselves must not be labeled with the terrorists. Those who cannot apply to themselves the same standards they would apply to others should not be allowed to participate in a debate with those who have an interest in peace. In short, let us be mature in our search for justice.

First, we must understand this war was not started by Hezbollah. Although one will not find this information readily available (or at all) on U.S. corporate news, the Israeli government had bombed southern Lebanon well before the capture of Israeli trooper Gilad Shalit. We've all been told this terrible crime on June 25 sparked the beginning of armed escalation, but this can't be taken seriously. We can't take it seriously because just a day before Israel committed an even worse crime of abducting two Palestinian civilians, Dr. Abu Muamar and his brother, without charge.

What does it say about a society in which the capture of a soldier (an explicit combatant) is loudly decried, while the stagnation of thousands of civilians in jail (a far greater crime) is received by silence?

This is a (if not the) crucial fact of the war. That most people have never heard of it suggests several things. One such thing is the utter one-sided nature of how incidents involving Palestinians and other populations who are not U.S. allies are treated with complete disregard. For example, while Hezbollah holds three Israeli soldiers it is almost completely unknown in this country that Israel holds more than 9,000 Palestinians in prison, many of whom are without charge.

Another facet of the situation is the racism in which the context of the debate is framed between Israel and its neighbors. We do not hear about the 9,000-plus Palestinians because we are expected to not care about them. When violence and other wrongs are committed against Palestinians, Lebanese and other Arabs, that doesn't constitute a news story. What does it say about a society in which the capture of a soldier (an explicit combatant) is loudly decried, while the stagnation of thousands of civilians in jail (a far greater crime) is received by silence?

When the full-blown war began, the disparity between Hezbollah's response and that of the Israeli government was minimized in the media. In the former case, land-based rockets were launched, killing a few dozen. In the latter case, a devastating air, land and sea assault was launched against a civilian population that had very little, or nothing, to do with the stated cause of the war.

The fact that people are referring to the Lebanese population as a "side" in this debate shows how skewed it has become – the two sides engaged in battle were Israel and Hezbollah, not Israel and Lebanon. The Lebanese population and its government are simply victims. Unlike the state of Israel, the state of Lebanon didn't fire a shot at anyone. The Lebanese government did not invade Israel, nor were they shelling civilians.

But the most significant difference between Hezbollah and the Israeli military is that one is fighting for liberation from the other. However immoral some actions of Hezbollah, they are the oppressed fighting the oppressor. Israel is in standing violation of many U.N. resolutions, is illegally occupying other people's land and is looking to increase that occupation.

Given that our government is the cause and enabler of this oppression (the bombs dropped on Lebanon all read "Made In the USA") it is wildly irresponsible for us to criticize the actions of those we oppress unless we are acting forthrightly to reign in our own terrorist state.

Just as our criticisms of South Africa's ANC resistance to the apartheid state, the Afghans' resistance to Soviet invasion or any criticism of a resistance movement against an occupying country should be made after, and only after, we have both recognized and acted against the immorality of the occupier - so should it be in this case.

The comparison of Lebanon and Israel is utterly lacking in parity, for the latter has been oppressing the former for quite some time. This leads to the principle I firmly urge everyone to embrace – supporting the oppressed against their oppressor. This means the Lebanese people must be supported against the barrage of the neighboring Israeli state.

This means we should support the Palestinians against the Israeli state keeping them hostage in and from their own lands. This means we support Iraqis against the piffering of U.S. elites, which murder and exploit them. Perhaps the only convenience of all of these situations is that the primary responsibility for them is here, in this country. Therefore, in order to correct these injustices, we must begin the fight here at home.

THE LAUNCHING OF KATHERINE HARRIS

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

GREEKS NOT GONE

Thank you for your continuing coverage of the purchase of the properties on North Pleasant Street. However, for the many people who might be just "headline readers," there is now a misperception that the fraternity and sorority system is no more, and nothing could be farther from the truth.

The fraternity system has been a part of this institution since 1869 (see the commemorative plaques on South College and Machmer), and sororities have been around since 1916. In the early days, a majority of the students were members of one of the eight fraternities operating on campus in the early 1900s. In the 1950s-1960s, 25-33 percent of the student body was affiliated with a fraternity or sorority chapter (check any old edition of The Index). Fraternity and sorority members were active in all aspects of student life, including the newspaper and yearbook, varsity sports, SGA, and other student organizations.

In the mid-to-late 1960s, UMass grew in leaps and bounds, but the fraternity and sorority system did not grow with it. New attitudes, the anti-war movement and the Civil Rights Movement were the focus of many students, and fraternities and sororities were seen as part of the Establishment and thus part of the problem. This was a nation-wide trend that ended in the late 1970s and early 1980s when fraternity systems on many campuses rebounded and membership increased.

We have 30+ chapters, four governing councils and an honor society (Order of Omega) operating on our campus. We have six sorority and six fraternity facilities operating in neighborhoods adjacent to campus, but one does not need a chapter house in order to have a chapter. We have small chapters and chapters with 50 or more members. We have chapters with multicultural identities, but all the chapters are open to students who are in good standing with the University. Some of the chapters are able to take members from the Five College System. New chapters are being added to our system every year.

Our fraternity and sorority members are from out-of-state and in-state. They work in the Dining Commons, they are resident assistants, they are teaching assistants and they work in the local area. They are members of other student organizations, they are on the SGA and they work for "The Daily Collegian" Sometimes they are even on the front page of "The Daily Collegian".

They study abroad, they do internships and they go on to graduate school or gainful employment. They make the Dean's List and sometimes they are on academic probation. They are here on scholarship, and they are here on financial aid. Fraternity and sorority members are University of Massachusetts-Amherst students who took that next step to be part of an organization that celebrates friendship and focuses on scholarship, leadership, service and loyalty to alma mater.

So yes, we are losing some of our chapter properties, but we were never just "fraternity row." The fraternity and sorority system is still an active component of student life, and our members contribute to the success of our various campus efforts.

NO REASON TO KILL

Regarding Mr. Dooley's editorial on Monday, "Cracking down or cracking up?" it is unfortunate that one would think the suicide terrorist attacks that killed 3,000 Americans were a result of U.S. policy. U.S. policy has nothing to do with the attacks. Isn't it possible that bin Laden and his helpers were simply out to murder and would find any excuse they could get?

On the CNN documentary, "In the Footsteps of bin Laden," Christiane Amanpour states that after bin Laden drove out the Soviets from Afghanistan, he was looking for a new enemy. His current number two, Ayman al-Zawahiri, gave him the idea to attack America. As Amanpour said, "It was the enemy bin Laden was looking for."

After all, when others kill masses of people, did they have a reason? Did Hitler, when he killed six million Jews? Did Rwandans when they killed 800,000 of their own people? Do the Sudanese Arabs have a reason when they kill, rape and plunder millions of black people?

Who knows why people commit murder, murder is committed every day in "America, usually on a much smaller scale, but nevertheless, it happens and for no reason. Bin Laden made up reasons for torturing thousands of Americans (as well as Kenyans and Tanzanians) and it would be foolish to think that he has a legitimate agenda.

Aussies and Dingos: The Collegian heads down under

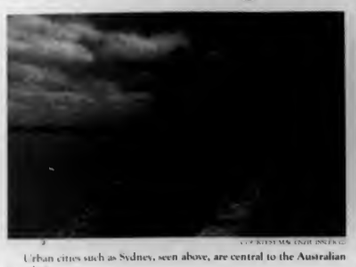
By Mackenzie Issler
Collegian Staff

Australia really is a perfect postcard: white sand beaches, coral reefs, and turquoise water. I didn't know what to expect after 24 hours of traveling, but I knew I wanted to be amazed. After five months of studying in Australia, I got the opportunity to discover what a gorgeous country it is, and how unique and diverse its culture really is. Geographically speaking, there is nothing like it. All of the population is concentrated around urban centers. The middle is a vast emptiness that backs up the infamous "Australian Outback." The aboriginal culture is a very interesting aspect of present day Australian, and is a huge part of the country's tourism.

At times, my experiences in Australia left me laughing, but also contemplating and scrutinizing what I observed around me. I could not help but giggle when I heard that Australians call a pepper a capsicum. And I never got sick of hearing "no worries." It is now an essential part of my vocabulary and something that I try to live by.

One of my closest Australian friends, joking around, stated that Australia is the 51st state of the U.S. This notion was very common throughout the country, but to my best knowledge, it is not one shared here in the United States. Australia is so far away in terms of proximity, and like a lot of news from foreign countries, the only news that we in the U.S. hear about is negative in nature (for example, the race riots that broke out and the cyclone that hit Northern Queensland). But, the amount of foreign news focused on the United States and its relations with other countries was enormous. Also, many articles in newspapers were pulled from the Associated Press. Australia is not just a land of perpetual sun and surfing. It is a developed country, but a young country in comparison with the other developed nations of this world. It is still growing, and impressionable. And as seen by its international news content, the United States is a huge influence that dominates not only the news, but Australian pop culture as well.

Now, on a lighter note, let's talk about the gorgeous beaches that would help me take my mind off the stresses of everyday life. I was situated right between the Gold Coast and Sunshine Coasts. Whenever I wanted to, I could travel two to three hours, and be at the most gorgeous beaches I have ever seen. Noosa was one of my favorites. Noosa will always bring to mind visions of turquoise water, white beaches, and raspberry and orange snow cones.



Urban cities such as Sydney, seen above, are central to the Australian population.

The South Island of New Zealand is full of these majestic and magnificent glaciers.

A three-hour plane ride later and I was in one of the most aesthetically beautiful places in the world — the South Island of New Zealand. On the most amazing road trip of my life, I maneuvered my way around glowworm caves, jumped out of plane, and hiked a glacier. On Easter, as the rest of the world was eating Cadbury cream eggs, I was on the top of a glacier, soaked head to toe, with a huge smile on my face.

It was not just the gorgeous places and exhilarating adventures that made my stay in Australia worthwhile; it was the people. Some of my best memories are long conversations over lunch at the Coffee Club, O.C. marathons with friends, and board game nights. No matter where you are, you need the simple pleasures in life that give you comfort no matter where you are.

I really could go on and on. These are just a few of the myriad memories that I have of Australia and my five months studying there. It is amazing to have this and the hundreds of pictures that I took. I will never forget the people I met and the greatest person with whom I am still in contact. But more importantly, I want to emphasize what an amazing opportunity it is to study abroad. Seize the day and the fact that you can take out student loans to cover your adventures wherever you would like to go. No matter where you go, you are leaving your comfort zone, and adjusting to a new place — to a new culture is such an important life lesson to learn. I am not going to lie, my first week there was not easy. I cried. I called home at all hours of the night, because it was hard and it was an adjustment. But, once I found a place to live, a place to call home for the next few months, everything fell into place, and before I knew it Brisbane became home, and when the time came to go, I did not want to leave.

'Illusionist' mystifies for some

By Staff Editors
The Collegiate Times (Virginia Tech)

BLACKSBURG, Va. — One part period film and one part science fiction, "The Illusionist" is a fable rich with romance, intrigue and style. Based on a short story written by Pulitzer Prize winning author Steven Millhauser, the film explores what our world was like when science rubbed itself in mystery, when magic and mysticism still held sway over people's imaginations. The story takes place in early 20th century Vienna — a Victorian society dominated by sophistication and class consciousness.

In this setting, a young peasant boy named Eisenheim (Edward Norton) falls in love with a daughter of the aristocracy, Sophie (Jessica Biel). The young Eisenheim wins Sophie's heart with his abilities as a magician, skills that even at a young age, demonstrate evidence of supernatural abilities. They are inevitably caught together and forbidden to see one another, and Eisenheim leaves Vienna heartbroken.

Twenty years later, he returns, having traveled the world and rumored to have familiarized himself with dark arts from the Near East. He opens a theater in Vienna and quickly becomes a celebrity for his ability to defy the laws of nature. Eventually Prince Leopold (Rufus Sewell), heir to the throne of Austria, comes to witness the show and brings along with him his fiance — none other than beautiful Sophie. Sophie and Eisenheim immediately recognize one another, and their love is rekindled, inciting the rage of Leopold. As the true extent of Eisenheim's abilities gradually becomes revealed, he must avoid the investigation of Leopold's corrupt police chief inspector Uhl (Paul Giamatti) while planning to escape with Sophie.

One element that really stands out in this film is the casting. Edward Norton is spectacular as the dark and brooding Eisenheim, while Giamatti is perfect as his counter-character — the immaculate police chief inspector Uhl. As Uhl conducts his investigation of Eisenheim and his performances, the two actors share frequent exchanges that evolve into an intricate game of cat-and-mouse. Giamatti (despite his terrible Austrian accent) is convincing as the morally-conflicted police chief forced to battle his own ambition in the interest of what is right.

Another impressive aspect of the film is the visuals used in Eisenheim's tricks. Seamless meshing of Norton and computer-generated images create jaw-dropping scenes when Eisenheim performs his magic. Although it is on screen, his performances are still captivating and fun to watch. It is refreshing, even in a film, to see tricks that are actually engaging — especially considering that in our society a man can live in a fishbowl for a week and be considered a master magician.

The only major problem with the film is that it becomes overly ambitious and tries to do too much. The script attempts to develop three intertwining plot lines simultaneously and does so rather poorly. The focus of the film becomes blurred as the individual stories begin to overlap, and at times the plot progression becomes painfully slow.

The film is constantly presenting puzzles to the audience that, when they are finally revealed, generally create more confusion than resolution. While the love story between Sophie and Eisenheim is handled well, the end of the film leaves many unanswered questions regarding the source of Eisenheim's power as well as the fate of inspector Uhl. While it is acceptable for a magician not to disclose his secrets, it is unacceptable for a film that focuses on one man's extraordinary powers not to reveal their source.

In its finale, this film conjures up more questions than answers — but is partially redeemed by outstanding visuals and the performances of Norton and Giamatti. It is a fun film that displays a world where nothing is what it seems — a welcome two-hour break from the predictability and tedium of our everyday lives.

Edward Norton stars in Steven Millhauser's "The Illusionist," as a young peasant boy named Eisenheim.

'Mockingbird' flies, but no soaring

By Abby Rosebrock
Columbia Daily Spectator (Columbia U)

NEW YORK — In his recent biography of the reclusive novelist Nelle Harper Lee, author of "To Kill a Mockingbird," Charles J. Shields manages to compile a reasonably thorough portrait of his subject using what few resources he was able to dig up. Titled "Mockingbird," the biography contains few, if any, incisive revelations concerning Lee's personality or place in literary history, but the book nonetheless serves as a straightforward, coherent, and practical assemblage of most available information about her life and work.

"Mockingbird" begins with Shields' aptly brief introduction, apologetic in light of the philosophy Lee espoused in her forward to the 1993 35th anniversary edition of "To Kill a Mockingbird: "As a reader I loathe introductions." The nature of Shields' project, on which Lee refused "with vigor" to collaborate in any capacity, he explains, was quite prickly: "Despite her desire for privacy, I believe it is important to record Lee's story while there are still a few people alive who were part of it and can remember. I have tried to balance her desire for privacy with the desire of her millions of readers who have long hoped for a respectful, informative view of this rarely seen writer." Unfortunately, readers may not finish the biography with any greater insight into Lee's significance as a cultural figure than what they already knew. They will learn about her family, her colleagues, and her friends and acquaintances, many of whom comment vividly on Lee's life and work throughout the narrative, but they will probably not feel the kind of magical, anonymous kinship with her that great biographies can inspire for their subjects among readers. That is not to detract from Shields' clearly excellent detective work and formally respectable, though not creative or literary, presentation of the facts.

The book contains a plethora of well-researched tidbits about Lee's life in Monroeville, Ala., the setting for "To Kill a Mockingbird," where she grew up and continues to reside between visits to her Manhattan apartment. In 10 chapters, Shields chronicles Lee's artistic development in terms of her move from Alabama to New York City, describes her extensive and too-often underrated contributions to close friend Truman Capote's "In Cold Blood," and, with great sensitivity and some adequately supported speculation, explores the possible frustrations, both personal and intellectual, that plagued her career and prevented her from finishing another novel. Shields' exploration of the latter issue is so grounded in solid research that the second half of "Mockingbird" acquires an increasing sense of pathos as it progresses. This is disappointing indeed for those of us hoping that Lee has been hard at work over the past several decades composing a fit stack of brilliant fiction to be discovered beneath her mattress and published posthumously, when she no longer has to endure the meddling publicity she began, rather famously, to find loathsome shortly after the release of "To Kill a Mockingbird."

"Mockingbird" will be most interesting for readers familiar with Lee's novel, as well as with the work of Capote, particularly "In Cold Blood." Shields is decisive and triumphant not only in discrediting the myth of Capote's having written any of "To Kill a Mockingbird" — ridiculous, considering the differences in style and tone between the novel and his own work (though Capote neglected to overtly deny the rumor because he resented the novel's Pulitzer win) but also in acknowledging Lee's tremendous role in researching and reviewing "In Cold Blood" before its publication. One wishes Shields would have further developed these two observations to their logical conclusion — an obvious conclusion but, due to the climate of the Old Boys' Club of the American literary scene, one that must be expressed for the record: The unwillingness to accept Lee's authorship of "To Kill a Mockingbird" and to promote her contributions to "In Cold Blood" are the result of both Capote's notorious, pathological selfishness and of the egregious sexism among American literati and academic interpreters of literature.

Radio Birdman rises like a phoenix

By Greg Kot
Chicago Tribune

Radio Birdman, one of Australia's first and best punk bands, broke up in 1978 before they ever got a chance to tour America.

Now, the reconstituted Birdman — with four original members, a retooled rhythm section, and a hard-hitting new album that picks up where they left off 28 years ago — is finally getting that chance with their first American tour.

"We never got the invitation the first time," says Rob Younger, the band's singer. Which, given the sextet's status as pariahs of the Aussie pub scene, was only fitting.

In the early '70s, when Younger and his future Radio Birdman sidekick Deniz Tek began playing in bands, clubs were teeming with rock steeped in '50s and '60s nostalgia. Younger set out to be different. He was an avid reader of Creem and other U.S. underground music magazines, where he discovered the Velvet Underground, Stooges, MC5 and New York Dolls.

He formed his first band, the Rats, with a fellow Dolls fanatic, and they specialized in playing songs written by their cult heroes from overseas. Tek, a Detroit native who had traveled to Australia to pursue a medical degree, was in another punk-influenced band on the circuit, TV Jones.

"It galled me that someone else was on to the same thing as us," Younger says with a chuckle. "That's how I became aware of Deniz. He was the guitar player, the songwriter, basically the most talented guy in the band. And then they kicked him out because he didn't smile enough, wasn't commercial enough for them. I couldn't believe it! Right away, I knew we'd hit it off."

Unsolved case leaves audiences wondering in 'Hollywoodland'

By Peter Birman
Collegian Staff Reporter

Allen Coulter's latest drama/thriller "Hollywoodland" plays upon multiple death scenarios and motives to lure viewers into producing their own resolution. Using techniques similar to those in modern crime shows like "Law and Order" and "Cold Case", Coulter gives the audience as many plausible scenarios as possible, showing the obvious difficulties in properly identifying the truth behind a crime scene. Coulter juxtaposes flashbacks of the events leading up to Reeves' death with the 1959 crime scene to allow insight into each of the characters within the story: as Reeve's fame shoots and falls, viewers are able to form their own opinions on each of the proposed scenarios of death. While each scenario results in many (unflattering) shots of a mostly-naked Ben Affleck, this also allows viewers to see the difficulties in getting to the bottom of a crime scene.

"Hollywoodland" opens quickly, starting with the questionable death of George Reeves. Reeves, the first man to play Superman on television, is portrayed by a simultaneously charming and wooden Ben Affleck. Although Affleck is able to inject a bit of old-school glamour into his character, he falls short of actually owning his role: his portrayal of a fallen Hollywood star seems like a vague parody of himself. His character is sad and pitiable, and Affleck's rendition is shown up by the stellar performances of co-stars Adrien Brody and Diane Lane. Brody's portrayal of sarcastic and manipulative private Detective Louis Simo is long-reaching: he is at times a tough investigator trying to overcome intense opposition and at another simply a vulnerable man unable to come to terms with his past and his role as a parent and divorcee. Brody captures Simo's chaotic nature and life without getting too theatrical and allows film goers to cheer for his success despite his devilish flaws.

Although Brody executes his character perfectly, Diane Lane is hands down the brightest part of the film. As Toni Mannix, Reeve's married, wealthy, and powerful paramour, Lane gives herself completely to her character. Mannix is a woman plagued by her age and by her love for a man she could never truly have: she alternates lusty vitality and giggles with moments of mature realism and forcefulness. It is Mannix's role as a wealthy and infatuated benefactor that creates another scenario for Reeve's death, but it is Lane's performance that makes it plausible.

Along with seasoned actors Bob Hoskins, Joe Spano, and Lois Smith, "Hollywoodland"'s rich content makes the length of the film (126 minutes) bearable and entertaining. Furthermore, the film's magnificent 1950's costuming (designed by Julie Weiss) is stunning and ripe with tiny details. The film has an air of authenticity that adds to its most important question: was George Reeves murdered by an infatuated lover, a jealous husband, a detached mother, or an angry fiance? Or was he depressed from unemployment and from being known only for his role as Superman? This film will keep you guessing.

Tek joined forces with Younger, who took care of singing Tek's songs and provoking the crowd at concerts. The band showed up at clubs where they were instantly despised by management, who felt they'd been misled. "These proprietors would think we'd lied to them calling ourselves a rock 'n' roll band," Younger says. "To them, rock 'n' roll was ('50s Australian star) Johnny O'Keefe. We were a lot rougher, and they found us appalling."

On the way out of shows, the band would often have to fight off drunk, rowdy fans ticked off by Younger's antics during the show. "We loved it," Younger says. "We figured to get that kind of reaction, we must be doing something right."

But within their home base of Sydney, the band started attracting a loyal following. The music echoed the alienation of the Stooges and the MC5, and demanded action.

"There's gonna be a new race/ Kids are gonna start it up," Younger sang in Tek's "New Race," a song about seizing control of one's destiny. The band dressed in matching dark-gray combat shirts and wore arm patches bearing the band's red-and-black logo. The hardcore fans followed suit, which caused one prominent Australian music columnist to describe the band as fascist.

"People saw the word 'race' in the song and overreacted," Younger says. "The song says nothing about militarism or facism, it says 'kids are gonna start it up.' It was written as a youth anthem at the suggestion of our producer at the time. And the matching shirts looked smart. I like it that we looked like we belonged in a band together. We caught a lot of (expletive) because of it, but we couldn't have cared less."

By 1977, the band's flamethrower punk was gaining a larger following, and a deal was struck with a U.S. label, Sire Records, home to the Ramones, Talking Heads and another newly signed Australian punk band, the Saints. Radio Birdman's sole U.S. release, "Radios Appear," contained "New Race" and is now regarded as a minor punk classic. But back then, it barely registered outside of Australia, exacerbated by the band's lack of touring. On a hellish 1978 tour of the U.K., Radio Birdman was dropped by Sire and broke up. Another album, "Living Eyes," came out, but by then it was too late.

"We disintegrated socially and economically," Younger says.

Eventually, the squabbles subsided enough for band members to consider a reunion. They began playing sporadically in 1996, and got a shot of late-arriving recognition when Sub Pop Records released "The Essential Radio Birdman: 1974-1978" in 2001 — the first time much of the band's best material had been issued here.

With original members Younger, Tek, keyboardist Pip Hoyle and guitarist Chris Masuak in the fold, Radio Birdman recently released a long-overdue third album, "Zero Beach" (Yep Rock), to pave the way for the first North American tour. It does the legacy proud, with Tek's venomous guitar leaping out like a cobra.

"We didn't want to come over to America as a nostalgia act," Younger says. "That would've been pathetic."

'Stella' gets groovy with DVD

By Fernando Ramos
The Daily Aztec (San Diego State U)

SAN DIEGO — The sitcom "Stella," which aired 10 episodes in the summer of 2005 on Comedy Central, stands apart from other comedies. Known for its blend of dramatic, "American Beauty"-style cinematography and outrageously childish antics, the show's look was intended to be different from the start.

David Wain, a co-creator of the show who stars in it as well, said he intended to grab the audience's attention by having the three main characters wear suits all the time.

"If we're dressed in suits in this sharp, dramatic-looking environment, and we (act) like stupid dorks, (I thought) it might be kinda funny," said Wain, whose show was released on DVD today.

"Kinda" may be an understatement in the case of the trio, which includes Wain's longtime college friends Michael Showalter and Michael Ian Black.

Having already attained a sizable cult following with its stand-up show and a collection of short films released on www.collegehumor.com, the trio has proven to be a winning formula.

Considering that the cast wasn't afraid to go to extremes to get laughs during the original shorts, it comes as a surprise that cleaning up the show's act for Comedy Central wasn't a major challenge to Wain.

"(Toning down content) actually was something we relished because we felt that (when) we did those shorts, we went as far as we could go humping dildos, necrophilia, et cetera," Wain said. "We were kind of ready to do something different anyway."

That's not to say that "Stella" lacks inspired zaniness.

The first episode features the three getting evicted from their apartment after their neighbors became fed up with their nonstop partying. The plot leads them to hatch various schemes to find a new home. Going homeless, performing a dance routine with skunk tails for the chance of entering one of New York's most elite apartments, and performing open-heart surgery on their landlord.

Needless to say, each 25-minute episode is a briskly-paced ball of energy.

The episodes' production had a pace to match. Wain directed the movie "Wet Hot American Summer," and he compared the film's production processes to the sitcom.

"Obviously, doing a series was grueling and difficult," Wain said. "We were constantly writing, directing, editing, shooting and casting all at the same time. Film is more like, first we have a script, then we shoot, then we edit. But, personally, I enjoy doing both."

With no sarcasm whatsoever, he attributes the success of such a hectic process to the chemistry between the three.

"Showalter and Black are just work-for-hire," Wain said. "In fact, I'm actually playing everybody on set, and they digitally apply their faces in post-production. ... No really, ('Stella') is like a three-headed beast. We're always sharing ideas."

In an unfortunate turn of events for the cast and the show's followers, the group posted a message on its Web site on March 8 that said Comedy Central decided not to air the show for a second season. Still, Wain remains unshaken.

"There is definitely a future for 'Stella' as a whole," he said, referring to stand-up potential.

The fact that Comedy Central has chosen to label the upcoming DVD release as "Season One" gives hope for a future in television, which Wain doesn't seem to be resisting.

"It seems that (Comedy Central) has left the window open for a 'Family Guy'-like situation."

Riveting Sept. 11 book released

By Julia Keller
Chicago Tribune

It was, from the start, a comic book catastrophe.

Not to make light of the disaster that smote the nation Sept. 11, 2001, but at first it really did seem too huge to be real, didn't it? Too monumental. Too terrible. Too much like the work of some fictional criminal mastermind with a catchy nickname. Just too much, by every measure.

Planes piercing tall buildings; thousands of confused people trapped and desperate; stunned bureaucrats scrambling for an informational toehold — it seemed like a dramatic climax out of Action Comics No. 47. It resembled a series of panels in the super-hero comic books I inhaled as a kid: Superman and the Fantastic Four and all the rest of them. Sept. 11 was the kind of gigantic, world-halting crisis in which those guys specialized.

Being superheroes, they would have taken care of things with efficiency and flair, and everybody would have gone home safely.

Sept. 11, though, was no fantasy, and thus I approached "The 9/11 Report: A Graphic Adaptation," a graphic novel, with a certain appalled fascination. I love comic books — the "graphic novel" designation is a nice upgrade in nomenclature for the genre, but changes nothing — and I received a great deal of my early moral education from them. And we know, courtesy of artists such as Art Spiegelman, that comic books can handle deadly serious topics the way superheroes deal with emergencies: deftly and well.

But the unique status of 9/11 — the scope, the horror, the evil that lay coiled in the hearts of its provocateurs might seem to make a graphic treatment insurmountably difficult.

Yet the work by Sid Jacobson and Ernie Colon is a vivid success. There are ticky-tacky complaints to be made — the artistic rendering of President Bush bears no relation to the man's actual physiognomy, and I could do without the "BLAM!" to indicate explosions — but in general, this is the kind of work that everybody, sooner or later, ought to take a look at. It's disturbing, it's challenging, but it manages to place Sept. 11 within the continuum of what we now know about terrorist plots to attack America.

Even if you think you've just about OD'd on Sept. 11 lore, even if the prospect of an Oliver Stone movie and a slew of new novels and documentaries and now "The 9/11 Report" makes you shake your head and secretly wonder when enough will finally be enough, you still should see this work.

Based on the report of the 9/11 Commission, which signed off on this version, "The 9/11 Report" packs a great deal of information within a vibrantly accessible format. Particularly striking is the point at which the authors create a series of pages tracing the fate of all four planes, moment by moment, in a horizontal grid that makes the frenetic pace of the unfolding horror suddenly comprehensible. You can compare what was happening to each plane in light of what was happening to the other planes.

This is where the graphic-novel approach shines: How else could such information be displayed, with an equal nuance and breadth? It's brilliant. And the buildup of suspense_despite the fact that the outcome is, sadly, well known, is astonishing.

We live in a world in which everyone assumes that pictures automatically trump words, but in "The 9/11 Report," as compelling as the visuals are, the words pack the real power. Certain sentences jump out at you like paper snakes stuffed tightly in one of those trick cans. On Page 28, during the frenzied height of that terrible morning's drama, the caption box quietly notes: "... Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld . . . could not be located for long periods . . ."

The work will make you angry, and proud, and it will certainly make you sad. You'll be angry for the failures of leadership at so many levels. You'll be proud of the public safety officials who did their jobs during a colossal emergency for which no one could have been prepared. And you'll be sad at what was lost — not only the people, although God knows we lost far too many of them, but also the last faint glimmers of innocence. The seconds before that first plane smacked the tower marked the final period when we could believe that the world is basically a benign place, filled with people who generally wish us well.

And it may make you wistful, just as it did me. You may find yourself indulging in a great comic book dream, in a ridiculous but compelling fantasy: If only there'd been a Superman, swooping down to put out the fires and rescue everybody . . .

Wait. What am I saying? Superman would have grabbed those planes before they hit anything; he would have set them gently on the ground and then he would have nabbed the bad guys and delivered them to law enforcement officials. We'd have cheered. We'd have waved.

The thing about being an adult is that your worldview can't come from comic books anymore. You're all grown up. You have to acknowledge that Superman is a fictional character and he can't really save the day. We have to save the day ourselves. We have to be quick and smart and vigilant, and we have to choose leaders who are all of those things too. "The 9/11 Report" tiptoes around the issue of top-level culpability — just as its source material, the Final Report of the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States, did — but it is fitting that the very work of art that may jolt us out of a comic book view of the world is, in itself, a comic book. This comic book.

And yet, one last time, there is the beautiful dream. Superman, handsome and strong, snatches those planes out of the sky like a kid collecting butterflies. Then he glides back down to Earth, cradling them in the crook of his arm. And "Sept. 11" goes back to being just an ordinary date on the calendar — just a regular old Tuesday — and it slides back into the succession of months and days yet to be enjoyed by all those people in the World Trade Center and in the Pentagon and on those planes.

Just an ordinary day. As we now know, that's the greatest of blessings.

the Patriots.

One of them said that in allowing Branch to work out a contract with another team, the Patriots agreed they would trade him if he was comfortable with that contract and if the draft choice compensation for him "was commensurate with what has been the value of similar players," according to union general counsel Richard Berthelsen.

The other said the Patriots didn't bargain in good faith with Branch over an extension of his contract. He was scheduled to make $1.045 million this season, the last of the five-year contract he signed as a rookie.

The tampering charge against the Jets comes less than a week before New England visits them in Sunday's second game of the season. The head coach of the Jets, Eric Mangini, was the Patriots defensive coordinator last year.

The Patriots and Jets tangled off the field early in 2000 when Bill Belichick quit after one day as coach of New York. The Patriots hired Belichick but had to give the Jets a first-round draft pick as compensation.

After the 1997 Super Bowl, Bill Parcells left as coach of the Patriots and moved to the Jets.

After being traded to the Seattle Seahawks for a first-round draft pick on Tuesday, Deion Branch (No. 83) signed a six-year $39 million contract with his new team. Branch had been holding out of training camp since July 28.

job. But they also understand that it is one out of 16 here, that we have to continue to go. We've got a real good team coming in this week. We have to be better than what we were this past week so we can get ready for the Giants."

McNabb is the key to Philadelphia's success. With him, the Eagles are 68-33, including playoffs. They were 2-5 in the seven games he missed last year.

With T.O. gone, the pressure again is on McNabb to be the man. But he's shown he can have outstanding seasons with lousy receivers (Charles Johnson, Torrance Small) and mediocre ones (Todd Pinkston, James Thrash). So, there's no reason he can't win with a solid group of wideouts that includes Donte' Stallworth and Reggie Brown.

Stallworth had six catches for 141 yards and one TD in his debut with the Eagles. He probably won't post Owens-like stats, but Stallworth isn't selfish, petulant and disruptive, either. He's already been dubbed the anti-T.O. because his No. 18 is opposite Owens' No. 81, he has an excellent working relationship with McNabb and he doesn't cause problems.

Reid talked to former Saints coach Jim Haslett before acquiring Stallworth to make sure he was adding a quality-character player.

"Jim told me how good he was," Reid said. "We were expecting to get a good football player. It was just a matter of him getting himself in the system and feeling comfortable."

If McNabb and fragile running backs Brian Westbrook and Correll Buckhalter stay healthy and Stallworth and Brown continue to progress, the offense could equal or even surpass its level of 2004. The Eagles averaged 351.1 yards and 24.1 points per game en route to the Super Bowl.

Meanwhile, the defense has a chance to be dominant again. Coordinator Jim Johnson likes the depth on the line so much he alternated the four starters and the four backups each series against Houston. The result was four sacks from the line. The Texans, who certainly could've used Reggie Bush, managed only 241 total yards.

"Not in my eight years in the NFL, four years in college and four years in high school, you just don't do this kind of thing, but it worked out for us," said end Jevon Kearse, who had one of the sacks.

From the ball boys to the players to the coaches to the front office, everyone in the organization believed last year was merely an aberration caused by too many injuries and too much turmoil.

Now that the important players are healthy and team harmony has been restored because you-know-who took his act to Dallas, the Eagles have a legitimate chance to play beyond January.

If not, they can't blame T.O. anymore.

The feud between Eagles' quarterback Donovan McNabb and former teammate Terrell Owens was no secret. Before Owens arrived in Philadelphia in 2004, McNabb lead the team to five playoff appearances.

Materazzi calls for "peace among men"

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

Marco Materazzi thought it would be nice if Zinedine Zidane dropped by his house and said he was sorry over a few cappuccinos.

Heck, if Zidane wanted, he could probably even bring his sister along.

What better way to put aside all the hard feelings over their little confrontation on the soccer field than a cozy tete-a-tete?

"A peace among men, without a lot of publicity," Materazzi said last week. "The door to my house will always be open for that. And if Zidane wants, he knows where to find my address."

That would likely be in Italy, which at last glance isn't all that far from France. Zidane could take the train down, enjoy a good meal, and make a day of it.

If only it were that easy. Apparently the most famous head butt in the history of sport calls for a more formal reconciliation.

File this one under silly ideas taken way too far:

Soccer king Sepp Blatter is working on a plan for the two to get together and resolve their differences in South Africa, where the 2010 World Cup is scheduled to take place. Actually, the meeting would be off the coast of South Africa on Robben Island.

If you haven't heard of Robben Island, it's never been known as a place for jolly summits. For the better part of four centuries, it served as a prison for political troublemakers and social outcasts.

Its most famous inmate was Nelson Mandela, who spent more than 20 years locked up there in a tiny cell that's now a museum.

The perfect place, it seems, for two soccer players to shake hands and maybe even exchange a hug or two.

"We are working on bringing together Zidane and Materazzi and to bring an end to this story," Blatter said Monday.

That end also would be a beginning of sorts for the 2010 World Cup, which will be the first to be held in Africa. It also would serve as a thank you to the South African Parliament, which last month approved some $2 billion in spending for what is billed as the biggest sporting event in the world.

There were suggestions – denied by Blatter and others – during this summer's World Cup that FIFA was looking to move the 2010 event because of fears South Africa would not be ready. An appearance by the two famous combatants from this year's final would certainly be a morale booster for organizers.

Still, it seems like a strange spot to hold a reconciliation. The British tabloids are already having a field day with the idea, with one suggesting that Mandela serve as a referee. "Blatter dreams of Zidane-Materazzi love island," screamed one headline.

Actually, there are a lot of reasons to continue to milk the head butt that got Zidane tossed out of the final, which Italy won on penalty kicks. Because even Americans who would rather watch the WNBA than a soccer match were captivated by the endless video replays of Zidane putting his head down and ramming it into Materazzi's chest.

Anyone with an e-mail account who didn't get at least five different funny takeouts on the head butt needs to get out more. They may not know who Pele is, but they can tell you in great detail how that crazy Frenchman knocked the Italian flat.

Materazzi finally came clean last week and revealed to a breathless world just what it was he said that provoked Zidane into attacking him. Seems Materazzi was grabbing Zidane's jersey and the French star told him:

"If you want my shirt, I will give it to you afterwards."

"I responded that I preferred his sister, it's true," Materazzi said.

As trash talking goes, it hardly approached NBA or NFL levels, where not only are sisters in play, but mothers, too.

The French, however, take these kinds of things a bit more seriously.

It may have cost them the World Cup, but 61 percent of the French participating in a recent poll said they forgave Zidane for his behavior. If anything, he is more of a national hero than before for being man enough to defend his family's honor.

At a European Championship qualifier in France last week, fans brought life-sized effigies of Zidane and chanted his name even though he was not on the field as France beat Italy in the rematch of the World Cup final.

If the two meet in South Africa, don't expect a lot of apologizing. Zidane's place in French history is secure without telling anyone he is sorry.

Materazzi, meanwhile, says he has nothing to apologize for. His trash talk was just that – trash talk.

"If anything, I owe apologies to his sister, although I swear, before all this mess, I didn't even know Zidane had a sister."

Zinedine Zidane was given a red card in France's World Cup final match against Italy for head butting Marco Materazzi in the chest.

Honors bestowed in the A-10

Temple will need all the help it can get if it wants to knock off the A-10 champions from last year. And they may have found some help in freshman Mandi Ruth.

Ruth was named the A-10 Conference Rookie of the Week last week after she headlined in Temple's 3-2 victory over Rutgers with two goals in the first game of the Temple Field Hockey Invitational. Ruth also had Temple's lone goal in its loss against national powerhouse Maryland.

Richmond junior Shannon Taylor picked up the first A-10 Player of the Week honor after scoring three goals in the Spiders first two games of the season (one against Towson, and a game-winning goal against Princeton). Taylor currently leads the Spiders in points with nine and has four goals to her credit.

Season-long trip continues

By Joshua M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team will play the fourth of eight-straight road games today at 4 p.m. in Fairfield, Conn. The Minutewomen (1-3) are looking to tally consecutive wins, coming off a 4-1 victory over Harvard on Sept. 4.

Sophomore forward Lauren Gillespie netted two goals in the win, giving her three for the season, more than her offensive output from all of last year. Gillespie scored the first and last of four unanswered goals after UMass fell behind Harvard, 1-0.

The Minutewomen look to build momentum and capture the 100-win milestone for UMass coach Patty Shea. Standing in the way, the Fairfield Stags (2-3) look to rebound after dropping a 3-0 decision to an undefeated Drexel team on Sunday.

The Stags are struggling to score goals this season – averaging less than a goal per game – with a total of four scores in five contests. On the other side of the ball, Fairfield has allowed nine goals in those five games.

While the numbers may be less than stellar, Shea does not take any opponent lightly, especially one that handed UMass a 2-1 defeat in the season opener a year ago.

"[Fairfield] always steps on the field expecting to win," Shea said. "Their work rate is very high, and if you have some mental letdowns against them you could be in trouble. They'll jump on you and take advantage."

The Stags took advantage of a mental error at the end of the first half at Garber Field last season, scoring two goals in a span of 14 seconds.

"We made two defensive mistakes, we had a little lapse at the end of the half, and they jumped right on it," Shea said.

Much like UMass, the Fairfield roster is heavy with underclassmen. The Stags have nine freshmen and seven sophomores.

Shea is impressed with the leadership coming from the young core at Fairfield.

"They all have their strengths and weaknesses in regards to their skills," Shea said. "But one of the unique things about them is their do-or-die attitude. They will work hard for each other and with each other to bring success to their team."

One of the young leaders for the Stags is sophomore forward Emily Janis – the top returning scorer from last season. Janis collected six goals and two assists in the previous campaign. Through the first five games this year, Janis has yet to find the back of the net, despite taking a team-high 17 shots.

Keeping Janis off the scoreboard will be a challenge for the Minutewomen, but Shea keeps the gameplan focused on the team, not the individual.

"We match up pretty well," Shea said. "We have some very good team speed, and they will play primarily man [coverage] all over the field, which is different than what Harvard played."

In addition to dealing with a new defensive scheme, Shea emphasized that the Minutewomen need to keep the ball moving and make crisp receptions in order to be successful.

Sophomore forward Erin Parker is one of five Minutewomen with at least one goal this season. She was the team's leading scorer in 2005 with 14 points (five goals, four assists) and was named to the A-10 All-Rookie Team.

"That first touch is crucial," Shea said. "You need to know and show. You need to know what you're going to do with the ball before you receive it and then you need to show your teammate where you want that ball in order to execute what you want to do next."

With four games in the books this season, the writing is on the wall; there is room for improvement on this young team.

"Our individual defense and pressure on the ball needs to be stronger," Shea said. "Attack-wise, we need to be able to get corners and execute corners better."

For those unfamiliar with field hockey, the penalty corner is a scoring opportunity similar to a free kick in soccer.

Fairfield has given opponents 54 penalty corner opportunities while receiving only 19 of those valuable scoring chances this season. This is a weakness that Shea and the Minutewomen would love to take advantage of.

Along with penalty corner opportunities, the Minutewomen need to capitalize on scoring chances and defensive lapses more efficiently.

"It's about taking advantage of the opportunities that are given to you while capitalizing on mistakes that the other team makes," Shea said.

Shea believes that one of the reasons that the Minutewomen started with a losing record was their inability to exploit opponents' mistakes and reduce miscues in their own end.

"This is a game where you give up one shot on goal and it's in the net," Shea said. "You can get all the corners you want, but it's about executing."

If the Minutewomen want to capture win number two, they will have to do just that.

A-10 struggles in early going

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Correspondent

The non-conference schedule has not been kind to the Atlantic 10 field hockey conference this season. A-10 teams have compiled a 16-25 record against non-conference opponents following last Sunday's action. The conference has fared even worse against nationally-ranked teams, going 0-9 after the first two weeks of the season.

A-10 Notebook

Calling all Freshmen

The Richmond Spiders hope this year will not be a rebuilding one. The defending A-10 champions for the past four consecutive seasons said goodbye to the senior class that was there for all of them. In those four years, Richmond won 33 consecutive games against its conference foes.

A-10 coaches have tabbed Richmond in a preseason poll to win the Atlantic 10 Championship for a fifth consecutive season. In order to accomplish the lofty task, they are calling on 12 freshmen to help replace the production given from a once senior-laden squad.

The freshmen are looking to help build on Richmond's dynasty and maintain its supremacy in the conference. They have registered two of Richmond's eight goals in their first four games. The defending champs are off to a 2-2 start.

Simply the best

The Temple Owls are treading water at 3-3 right now, but they can hang their heads high knowing they have lost all their games to nationally-ranked opponents, including a 2-1 defeat to the top-ranked Maryland Terrapins.

Many coaches say there is no such thing as a moral victory, but when you only lose by one goal to a team that's average margin of victory is 3.5 goals, you're making a statement. The Owls almost pulled off the upset against the then 16th ranked Michigan State Spartans, but fell 2-1 in double overtime.

Please, don't shoot!

If the first seven games of the year are any indication of what is in store for La Salle goalie Ellen Axelsen, she better take cover because it doesn't look like the Explorers will be known for their defensive prowess this year.

The Explorers have surrendered 114 shots in seven games, by far the most shots given up by any team in the A-10 in this young season. The Towson Tigers took 30 of those 114 shots in a 2-0 victory over LaSalle last Sunday. Axelsen made 13 saves in the loss. Opponents have taken 48 more shots than Can Billikens live up to hype?

By Michael King
Collegian Correspondent

Saint Louis (3-1-2) was selected to win the 2006 Atlantic 10 Women's Soccer Championship by the league's head coaches. The Billikens look to match their undefeated record in league play last season with nine returning starters.

A-10 Notebook

Saint Louis was by far the best team in the league last season, winning both the A-10 regular season and playoff championships, and establishing a 16-5 overall record.

It also defeated Stanford in the first round of last year's NCAA tournament. Saint Louis lost its next and final game to then No. 5 ranked Santa Clara.

This season, Saint Louis lost to No. 12 Duke, 3-1, on Aug. 25. In another match-up against a Top 20 team, the Billikens tied No. 17 Marquette.

The team also fared well in the Heather Farr Kicks Against Breast Cancer Invitational, earning a victory and a draw against Loyola and Arizona State, respectively.

The Billikens return all but two starters from last year's team, including four of the top five scorers of 2005. They also welcome back the 2005 A-10 Defensive Player of the Year Courtney Hulcer.

The future also looks good for Saint Louis, as head coach Tim Champion's group of freshmen is among the most accomplished and decorated in the A-10.

Elsewhere in the poll, Dayton and Charlotte were picked to finish second and third, respectively, while Richmond and Rhode Island round out the top five. The Massachusetts women's soccer team was picked to finish sixth.

National Rankings

Nationally, Saint Louis is ranked No. 28 in this week's women's soccer national Top 30 poll, as published by Soccer Buzz Magazine. Although the Billikens dropped one spot from last week's poll, the No. 27 preseason ranking is the highest ever for the program.

The top four consists of Notre Dame, Florida State, UCLA, and Santa Clara. The only regional representation in the poll is Boston College at No. 13, Connecticut at No. 15, and Dartmouth at No. 30.

Players of the Week

Sophomore goalkeeper Amie Kern of George Washington (4-2) and sophomore forward Vanessa Patry of Massachusetts (4-1) were both named A-10 Co-Players of the Week.

Kern led the Colonials to shutout victories in three of their first four matches, recording a total of 17 saves.

Patry scored three goals and recorded one assist through the Minutewomen's first three games of the season. The Delmar, N.Y. native scored her first goal of the season against Boston University in UMass' historic win over the Terriers. The Aug. 30 victory was the first time the Minutewomen have defeated BU in 27 years.

Patry also led the UMass attack against Iona, with two goals and one assist.

Rookie of the Week

Freshman midfielder Hailey Beam of Charlotte (3-1-1) earned Rookie of the Week honors for her success on the field against Francis Marion. Beam scored both goals in the 49ers' 2-1 win on Aug. 25.

New Coach

Manoj Khettry is still looking for his first win as head coach of St. Bonaventure, after beginning the season with three losses and a tie. Khettry took over this year for Dan Magner, who led the team for five campaigns . . . Saint Louis will host this year's A-10 Championship at Robert R. Hermann Field on Nov. 2-5 . . . The Minutewomen currently enjoy the best record in the league, with four wins and one loss. Charlotte is second at 3-1-1 . . . League play begins on Sept. 29, with four A-10 games slated. The Minutewomen take on George Washington to open up their league schedule at 4 p.m. on the Sept. 29 at Rudd Field in Amherst.

Sophomore forward Vanessa Patry leads UMass with eight points on three goals and two assists. Her .300 shot percentage is a team-high.

Pats accuse Jets of possible tampering

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. – The New England Patriots have filed a tampering charge against the Jets in connection with New York's talks with wide receiver Deion Branch.

The move was confirmed Tuesday by an NFL source, who did not want to be identified because he was not authorized to speak on the subject.

On Monday, the Patriots traded Branch to Seattle for a first-round choice in next year's draft.

The Patriots contend in the tampering charge that they gave Branch permission to discuss only terms of a contract and not what a team would offer the Patriots in trade, according to the Boston Globe and Boston Herald. The papers said New England contends the Jets told Branch what they would offer.

The Jets were among the teams Branch or his representative spoke with after the Patriots on Aug. 25 gave the player, who had been holding out since the start of training camp, permission to seek a trade and negotiate a contract with other clubs until Sept. 1. The Jets offered the Patriots a second-round pick for Branch, but the Patriots announced just after the 4 p.m. deadline that no trade had been consummated.

The NFL Players Association then filed two grievances against Former New England wide receiver Deion Branch was named MVP of Super Bowl XXXIX. In that game he caught 11 passes for 133 yards.

Eagles just fine without controversial Owens

By Rob Maaddi
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA Donovan McNabb led the Eagles to three NFC championship games before Terrell Owens came to Philadelphia. He can do it again without the talented-but-troublesome receiver.

Now that he can focus on football instead of feuding with T.O. and playing through pain, McNabb looks more like the quarterback who went to five straight Pro Bowls and took his team to the playoffs each of those seasons.

In Philadelphia's opening 24-10 win at Houston, McNabb completed 24 of 35 passes for 314 yards, three touchdowns and one interception in his first regular-season game since having surgery for a sports hernia last November.

Sure, those numbers came against the lowly Texans. However, McNabb was sharp throughout the preseason and his strong performance is a clear sign he and the rest of the team have put last year's misery in the past.

"It was kind of a joy to get back out on the field and see guys kind of smiling, laughing, pushing each other, motivating each other," McNabb said.

Last year, some of those smiles were forced, there wasn't much to joke about, and pushing came in the form of a locker-room altercation between Owens and former player turned team ambassador Hugh Douglas.

A combination of injuries to several starters and the T.O. fiasco plunged the Eagles to 6-10 a year after falling just three points short in the Super Bowl against New England.

While many so-called experts predicted another last-place finish in a tough NFC East, the Eagles retooled not rebuilt their roster and set out to prove they still belong among the elite teams in the conference.

Though it's only one game in a long season, the rest of the division rivals lost their openers and are looking up at Philadelphia. A victory over the New York Giants this week could go a long way toward helping the Eagles accomplish their goal of going from worst to first.

"They've had a great attitude from the first minicamp on," coach Andy Reid said. "They have done everything I've asked. They came out and they played their hearts out and did a nice

Dozens arrested at Townhouses

School is definitely "back in session" in Amherst.

The Amherst Police Department made 54 arrests over the weekend, most of which occurring during a party which held over an estimated 1,500 people at the Amherst Town Houses.

Officers took over 203 calls "for service" and heard over 31 complaints of noise disturbance, assaults, domestics and several reports of vandalism to private property.

Amherst Police were dispatched around 12 p.m. Friday night for a reported loud noise disturbance.

Officers arrived to meet approximately 1,500 "college-age people" who had gathered in the western quad area of the apartment complex.

According to the APD, it took 11 police officers and more than 50 minutes to disperse the enormous crowd.

No direct arrests occurred during the dispersal, but eleven arrests were made in the same area a short time later.

Most of the arrests were for alcohol-related incidents, which included several Operating under the Influence charges and multiple charges of minor possession.

Police also reported to a Phillips St. home early Sunday morning that held a party over nearly 200 guests.

The guests were dispersed, six kegs of beer were confiscated and four residents were arrested on charges of violating the town's noise bylaw.

SLSO to hold forum on students' rights

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

The Student Legal Services Office, headed by Directing Attorney Charles J. Dimare (left), Staff Attorney Lisa G. Kent (center), and Senior Staff Attorney, Michele L. Leal, will be holding a crash course on students' dorm life rights today.

As late-night dormitory parties become a weekend ritual at the University of Massachusetts, some students may still be figuring out what rights they have, and when are they crossing the line.

In an effort to clarify those guidelines, the Student Government Association Executive Cabinet and the Student Legal Services Office will be holding a crash course on students' dorm life rights today.

"The purpose of it is essentially to get students to understand and realize that they have dorm rights," said Sarah Stern-O'Connor, Deputy Attorney General for Student Legal Services Office. "This is to bring awareness to the subject."

The event will take place at the Cape Cod Lounge from 7 p.m. until 8:30 p.m., and will give students a chance to get some info about their rights while attending UMass.

Stern-O'Connor has noticed students she sometimes works with during disciplinary actions don't always understand the Student Code of Conduct, or the consequences of their actions.

"Most of the people who come into my office have absolutely no idea," said Stern-O'Connor. "They don't know the sanctions that go along with it; they don't necessarily know the severity."

She said today's open event will provide students with as much info as they need to know about dorm room rights. Attorney Charles Dimare is scheduled as a guest speaker, and will lecture students on their overall rights when they're in their dorm rooms.

Dimare will also be fielding questions from attendees.

"We want to show that it's not the [UMass Police Dept.] out to get them, we're all trying to work together," said Stern-O'Connor.

Part of the event will include the showing of a film titled "Busted." The film, said Stern-O'Connor, outlines the actions taken when a student is found with marijuana.

"It's essentially what happens and what you can do, and how you can advocate for yourself," she said.

On Tuesday, members of the SGA Executive Cabinet targeted Southwest with fliers pushing the event. The fliers, which stated the words, "Do You Know Your Dorm Room Rights?" in bold lettering at the top of the page, display info about today's event, but also about specific dorm regulations.

The flier states: "You do not have to allow a police officer into your room unless they have a search warrant. If they do have one, you have the right to examine it."

It also states that if a student lets a police official into their room, "any evidence in plain view may be used against you."

Stern-O'Connor, and the Student Legal Services Office, counsels students on disciplinary actions taken by the University against a student. Sometimes, Stern-O'Connor sits in on judicial hearings and advises the student.

She said the goal of the Student Legal Services Office, as well as today's event, is not to counter UMass rules, but to work with them. She said students need to respect rules outlined by both the University and the UMPD.

If the event goes as planned, Stern-O'Connor said she would like to repeat it in October or November to push the information.

MTV kicks off Campus Climate Challenge

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

MTV and the Campus Climate Challenge launched of the "Break the Addiction Challenge," a nationwide competition to challenge millions of high school and college-aged youth to stop global warming starting at their own schools, September 6.

The Break the Addiction competition is being launched simultaneously with the Campus Climate Challenge, a campaign of the Energy Action Coalition, a coalition made up of more than 30 leading youth and environmental organizations throughout the United States and Canada, including National Wildlife Federation's (NWF) Campus Ecology Program.

NWF's Campus Ecology team is helping to lead the Campus Climate Challenge on more than 200 college and university campuses and asking each campus to commit to a 2 percent reduction of carbon emissions each year.

In an MTV/CBS News poll released in June, for the first time ever, young people named the environment as the number one response to the question "Which is the most important problem your generation will have to deal with?" Eighty-one percent of young people in the same poll say steps need to be taken right away to counter global warming.

The Campus Climate Challenge is designed to capitalize on this growing momentum by empowering young people to stop global warming on their campus.

Students will be challenged to conduct various activities for the Break the Addiction competition.

In the fall, MTV will reward five schools that have garnered media coverage of their campus activities, to encourage students to publicize their solutions to global warming.

In the spring, MTV will recognize two schools for achieving a 100 percent clean energy policy.

At the end of the year, MTV will recognize the schools that did the best job overall of organizing the Campus Climate Challenge. All entries will be judged by a panel of esteemed judges.

Winning campuses will receive prizes ranging from monetary support for their ongoing efforts to an "eco-renovation" of a student lounge or other hangout space valued at up to $10,000, as well as the chance to be featured in an MTV on-air news segment.

"Whether it is concerns about Hurricane Katrina, high gas prices, war or national security, young people are beginning to connect the dots between their daily behavior and the health of our environment," says Christina Norman, president of MTV. "Therefore, the timing couldn't be better to launch our Break the Addiction Challenge to ignite and reward this generation for the steps they are taking to better their own lives and save the planet."

"Young people across the U.S. and Canada are leading the way in the fight to stop global warming. Students are demanding that their schools be powered by clean energy and become models of climate responsibility for the rest of society. This is about our future and we're focused on solutions," said Jessy Tolkan, campaign director for Campus Climate Challenge. "By partnering with MTV for the Break the Addiction Challenge, we'll be able to engage millions of young people in the defining challenge of our generation."

Bodies found in and around Baghdad

Iraqis view a vehicle used as a car bomb in Baghdad, Iraq, Sept. 13, 2006. A parked car bomb exploded next to a passing police patrol, killing eight people and wounding 17, police said.

By Patrick Quinn
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq—The leader of Iraq's biggest Sunni Arab group demanded Wednesday that the beleaguered Shiite-led government take steps to disarm militias after police said the bodies of 65 tortured men were dumped in and around Baghdad.

On a violent day even by the standards of Baghdad, car bombs, mortars and other attacks also killed at least 39 people and wounded dozens. Two U.S. soldiers also were killed, one in enemy action in restive Anbar province on Monday and the other in a roadside bombing south of Baghdad on Tuesday, the U.S. military command said.

The attacks have been unrelenting despite a security crackdown around the capital by 12,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops. The more than 1,500 violent deaths last month at the height of the joint operation speak to the difficulties in restoring any semblance of security to this sprawling city of 6 million people.

Although Sunni Arabs operate some death squads, the vast majority are run by Shiite militias and gangs.

Shiite political groups, including those in power, claim that armed militias have nothing to do with them and that their own military wings were disarmed months ago and turned into social and humanitarian groups. They claim that armed groups and militias are "rogue" elements beyond their control, but many Sunni Arabs contend that they are in fact controlled by Shiite politicians and clerics.

Adnan al-Dulaimi, a Sunni who heads the Iraqi Accordance Front political party, called on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, to take a first step by honoring a pledge to disband militias.

"We hope the government carries out what it pledged and disbands militias and considers them terrorist organizations," al-Dulaimi told The Associated Press. His party is Iraq's largest Sunni Arab political bloc and holds 44 seats in the 275-member parliament.

"Their presence is deteriorating the situation and bringing more troubles to the political atmosphere," al-Dulaimi said of militias. "We call upon all religious authorities to raise their voices and demand militias be disarmed."

Police said 60 of the bodies were found overnight around Baghdad, with the majority dumped in predominantly Sunni Arab neighborhoods.

All the bodies were bound, bore signs of torture and had been shot, police said. Such killings are usually the work of death squads who kidnap people and usually torture them with power drills, or beat them, before shooting them execution-style with a bullet to the head.

The U.S. military said it could not confirm all the executions and that their body count so far was lower than that reported by police.

"It is looking like about a 50 percent discrepancy on execution-style killings so far," said Maj. Josslyn Aberle, chief of the media relations division for the Multi-National Corps-Iraq.

The reason for the difference was not immediately clear. The confusion over numbers underscores the difficulty of obtaining accurate death tolls in Iraq, which lacks the reporting and tracking systems of most modern nations. Also, counts by the U.S. military often lag behind those of the police.

According to Iraqi police, 45 of the bodies were discovered in predominantly Sunni Arab parts of western Baghdad. Fifteen were found in predominantly Shiite areas of eastern Baghdad. And five were found floating down the Tigris river in Suwayrah, just south of Baghdad.

In the two bloodiest attacks in the capital, a car bombing killed at least 19 people and wounded more than 62 in a large square used mostly as a parking lot near the main headquarters of Baghdad's traffic police department.

In eastern Baghdad, a parked car bomb exploded next to an Iraqi police patrol in the Zayona neighborhood, killing at least 12 people and wounding 34.

It is believed that some Shiite parties with militias accused of involvement in sectarian killings have support from neighboring Iran. Those parties are also allied with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government.

Al-Maliki, on a visit to Iran on Wednesday, pressed Tehran to stop interference that is having a "negative" impact on his country's security, his spokesman said in an unusual criticism of an ally with which Baghdad's ties are getting closer.

As al-Maliki met with Iranian leaders for a second day, no public mention was made on the issue of interference. Instead, the Iraqi prime minister and Iranian officials exchanged warm vows of growing friendship.

In Baghdad, government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said al-Maliki underlined that "we want the best of relations with

Lowell math teacher faces 30 sex charges

NASHUA, N.H.—The head of the Lowell, Mass., high school math department and prominent chess player was ordered held on $1 million bail Wednesday when he was arraigned on 30 felony rape and incest charges.

Severine Wamala, 45, of Nashua, was arrested Tuesday on 19 counts of incest and 11 counts of aggravated felonious sexual assault. Wamala was put on paid administrative leave from Lowell High School, where he is a teacher and head of the math department, said school Superintendent Karla Brooks Baehr.

Wamala moved to New Hampshire just about a year ago and Lowell police are investigating "whether or not the behavior occurred prior to moving to Nashua, how many times it occurred and where it occurred," police Superintendent Ed Davis said. Charges are possible in Massachusetts, he said.

In court, Wamala admitted to scores of previous court appearances as he tried to persuade a judge he could be trusted to be released on lower bail.

"I had to show up over a hundred times in court, and I didn't miss any," Wamala said via a TV hookup.

Court records show the previous arrests were on charges including stalking and violating restraining orders.

Detective Lt. Richard Sprankle said each of the 30 new charges carries a maximum of 10 to 20 years in prison.

Wamala is accused of sexually assaulting three young women, two now in their teens and one in her early 20s. Police said one of the women reported Wamala began assaulting her five years ago when she was 10.

More charges could be on the way. Sprankle said Lowell police also are investigating, and the court documents say some of the alleged assaults happened at a chess club conference in Phoenix.

In addition to teaching, Wamala organizes NorthEast Chess tournaments around the region, and runs the high school's chess club. His daughter and two sons all are nationally ranked chess players, according to various chess Web sites.

The Lowell school department will review its background check policy after a check on Wamala turned up just one prior incident.

Marijuana helps patients stay on meds

WASHINGTON — Recovering drug addicts who are infected with hepatitis C virus may stick to their medications better if they are allowed to use marijuana, U.S. researchers reported on Wednesday.

Smoking or eating cannabis may help them tolerate the side effects of the antivirals, which can clear the virus but often cause fevers, chills, and muscle and joint aches, the researchers said.

Diana Sylvestre and colleagues at the University of California, San Francisco tested 71 recovering substance users given interferon and ribavirin to treat their hepatitis C — which is common among injecting drug users.

About a third of the patients also used marijuana.

Half of the marijuana users were successfully treated with the antivirals, versus 18 percent of those who did not use cannabis, the researchers reported in the European Journal of Gastroenterology and Hepatology.

And just 14 percent of the cannabis users relapsed, compared to 61 percent of non-smokers.

"It may in fact be an ironical truth that those persons who contracted hepatitis C virus through a form of illicit drug use may be aided in ridding themselves of this potentially fatal virus by the use of another drug in addition to their HCV therapy," Benedikt Fischer of the Center for Addictions Research of British Columbia in Canada wrote in a commentary.

The hepatitis C virus damages the liver and can kill people if not treated. A combination of interferon, to boost immune response, and ribavirin, to attack the virus, can help clear it from the liver, but it can take months.

"The majority of patients develop significant treatment-related side effects, with almost 80 percent experiencing an initial flulike syndrome that includes fevers, chills, and muscle and joint aches," the researchers wrote.

They are often given a range of drugs to treat the side effects, including medications to stop vomiting, analgesics, antihistamines and sleeping pills.

Missing boy's mother found dead

By Travis Reed
Associated Press

LEESBURG, Fla. Two weeks after telling police that her son had been snatched from his crib, Melinda Duckett found herself reeling in an interview with TV's famously prosecutorial Nancy Grace. Before it was over, Grace was pounding her desk and loudly demanding to know: "Where were you? Why aren't you telling us where you were that day?"

A day after the taping, Duckett, 21, shot herself to death, deepening the mystery of what happened to the boy.

Police have refused to say whether she left a suicide note, and said nothing they have found so far in their investigation of her death has shed light on the whereabouts of her 2-year-old son, Trenton.

Investigators have stopped short of calling her a suspect but have focused increasing attention on her movements just before the boy vanished and the notes, computer, camera and other items seized from her house.

Duckett's family members disputed any suggestion that she hurt her son. They said that the strain of her son's disappearance pushed her to the brink, and the media sent her over the edge.

"Nancy Grace and the others, they just bashed her to the end," Duckett's grandfather Bill Eubank said Tuesday. "She wasn't one anyone ever would have thought of to do something like this. She and that baby just loved each other, couldn't get away from each other. She wouldn't hurt a bug."

Janine Iannuzzo, a spokeswoman for Grace, said in an e-mail that Duckett's death was "an extremely sad development," but that the program would continue covering the case.

"We feel a responsibility to bring attention to this case in the hopes of helping find Trenton Duckett, who remains missing," Iannuzzo said.

Duckett had told police that after she finished watching a movie Aug. 27, she went to check on Trenton in his bedroom, and all she found was an empty crib — and a 10-inch cut in the window screen above it. At the time, she was living with her son, wading through a messy divorce with the boy's father and trying to get her life back on track after getting laid off from her job with a lawn care company.

The boy's disappearance in this town of 19,000 people about 45 miles northwest of Orlando stretched the 75-member police force to its limits. Fliers were posted on gas station doors around town, asking for information from anyone who might have seen the boy, a brown-haired youngster wearing denim shorts and a diaper.

Trenton's father, 21-year-old Josh Duckett, was closely questioned after the boy disappeared. Newspapers reported that his wife had taken out a temporary restraining order against him. But Josh Duckett took a polygraph test and has answered all police questions satisfactorily, Capt. Ginny Padgett said.

On Sept. 7, Melinda Duckett gave a telephone interview to CNN Headline News' Grace, a former prosecutor known for practically cross-examining her guests. Duckett stumbled over such questions as whether she had taken a polygraph — she said she refused on the advice of her divorce lawyer — and where, exactly, she was shopping with the boy before his disappearance.

Hours before the interview aired, Duckett shot herself Friday with her grandfather's gun at her grandparents' house, up the road from where she was living.

Gunman wounds 20

By Phil Coulvrette
Associated Press

A gunman in a black trench coat and sporting a mohawk haircut opened fire Wednesday at a Montreal college and wounded at least 20 people — six critically — before he apparently was killed by police, witnesses and authorities said.

Scores of panicked students at Dawson College near downtown fled into the surrounding streets after the shooting broke out at the school of about 10,000. Some had clothes stained with blood.

Police spokesman Ian Lafreniere said there was just one gunman at the school and the search for any others was over.

Although police initially suggested that the gunman had killed himself, they later said at a news conference that "based on current information, the suspect was killed by police."

CBC-TV showed police with guns drawn standing behind a police cruiser as a SWAT team swarmed the 12-acre campus. A bloody body covered in a yellow sheet lay next to a police cruiser near an entrance to a school building.

Students run from a building next to Dawson College after reports of a gunman in the building in Montreal, Sept. 13, 2006.

Welcome back, students ... I hope we never meet!

When I meet you and your classmates, it's often one of the worst days of your lives.

That's because I'm the First Justice of the Eastern Hampshire District Court and we're probably seeing each other in my courtroom on Route 9 in Hadley … just a short trip from campus, but a seemingly endless ride when you're in the back seat of a police cruiser.

When you're making decisions, it's important to know what's at stake. For example, you may not realize that:

- A drug conviction can jeopardize your federal financial aid.
- Urinating in public is a form of indecent exposure and cause for arrest.
- Altering a driver's license is a felony; a felony conviction immediately disqualifies you from many jobs.
- Operating a motor vehicle under the influence carries a mandatory loss of license.

Remember that the legal drinking age is 21. If you're under 21 and in possession of alcohol, you'll be fined and lose your license for three months. Don't use a fake ID to buy alcohol, and don't commit a felony by altering a driver's license. If you're of age, don't purchase alcohol for those who aren't.

Never drink and drive. Because the risks are high, so are the consequences. If you're stopped by police and refuse to take a breath test, you'll lose your license just for refusing. Convictions for operating under the influence may include jail time and will definitely increase your insurance rates for years to come. First offenders don't get off easier, either. Penalties usually include mandatory substance abuse treatment, fines of more than $1,000 and loss of your license for between 45 days and a year. If you're under 21, your license will be revoked for at least 210 days.

If you get in trouble, your parents will find out. Under the law, you're considered an adult if you're over 18, which means you'll be charged differently than a juvenile. However, most students are still supported in part by their parents and are required to have them here to sign financial statements if requesting court-appointed lawyers.

Here are some other "do's" and "don'ts" for avoiding my courtroom.

Don't:

- host open parties in off-campus housing. If your guests are loud and unruly, you can be held responsible for violating noise bylaws, which can mean fines or even arrest. Remember that noise levels you think are reasonable may not seem so for neighbors who have young children, are elderly, or need to get up for work the next morning.
- argue with police officers at the scene of an arrest. The officers are doing their jobs, so be respectful, obey their lawful commands and air any grievances later with the Chief of Police. Remember, these are the first people you'll call if you need help.

Do:

- respect yourself and others. The majority of student cases in my court involve drugs and/or alcohol, and the majority of assaults, injuries, thefts and accidents can be traced back to illegal or excessive substance use. If you're receiving federal financial aid, a drug conviction can jeopardize your award until you complete treatment. Conviction for morals offenses like public urination, indecent assault or annoying and accosting members of the opposite sex can require registration as a sex offender.
- respect property on campus and in town. Property damage cases comprise a large part of my caseload. Destroying property, stealing, tagging and breaking into other students' rooms (a felony) are often tied to excessive substance use.
- come to court if you need the protection of a restraining order or wish to sue someone for monetary damages. Our staff is here to help you.
- visit us to learn about the Constitution, criminal and civil law and the jobs performed by court officers, probation officers, lawyers and judges. We're happy to share our career knowledge and guidance.

Enjoy your time in school, avoid a criminal record and protect your future by obeying the rules of the University, the town and the state. The majority of UMass Amherst students never cross the threshold of my courtroom, and I like it that way!

The Honorable Nancy R. Dusek-Gomez
First Justice, Eastern Hampshire District Court

Corruption defendant pleads guilty

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. — Another member of the Asselin family has pleaded guilty in connection with a corruption probe into the Springfield Housing Authority in a deal that requires him to testify against a co-defendant, lets him keep his home and could help him avoid prison time.

Joseph T. Asselin, an insurance company president, pleaded guilty in federal court on Wednesday to bribery conspiracy and conspiracy to commit theft against the government, according to The Republican newspaper of Springfield.

He admitted to building his home using housing authority supplies and labor, as well as kickbacks from authority contractors arranged by his father, Raymond B. Asselin, who ran the taxpayer-funded agency for more than three decades.

Both charges carry a maximum prison sentence of five years, but prosecutors have recommended a sentence of just over two years and reserved the right to recommend an even shorter sentence after he testifies against co-defendant Peter Davis, a Newburyport contractor.

"It's even conceivable the sentence could drop down to a non-confinement sentence," District Court Judge Michael A. Ponsor said.

Joseph Asselin originally agreed to sign over his Amherst home to the government as part of the deal, but the agreement was recently revised, allowing him instead to hand over assets equal to the fair market value of the home.

Raymond Asselin, his wife and five children, two of their spouses, former assistant authority director Arthur G. Sotirion, and three contractors were charged in a 122-count criminal indictment alleging a decade of graft at the agency, which provides housing for the city's poor, elderly and disabled.

Twelve of the 13 defendants have entered into a collective plea agreement and several agreed to serve prison time. Collectively, the group agreed to pay $4.4 million in restitution.

Joseph Asselin is the only defendant scheduled to testify against Davis, charged with financing approximately $66,000 in home improvements at the homes of Asselin and his younger brother, Christopher P. Asselin, a former state representative. That trial starts Monday.

Raymond and Christopher Asselin had previously pleaded guilty.

Joseph Asselin is scheduled to be sentenced on Dec. 18.

Terror bill hits snag

WASHINGTON — The White House and three powerful GOP senators reached an impasse Wednesday over a Bush administration plan to allow tough CIA interrogations, underscoring election-season divisions among Republicans on the high profile issue of security.

In a direct challenge to President Bush, Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said his panel would meet Thursday to finalize an alternative to the White House plan to prosecute terror suspects and redefine acts that constitute war crimes.

Warner, R-Va., said the administration proposal would lower the standard for the treatment of prisoners, potentially putting U.S. troops at risk should other countries retaliate.

The White House said Warner's proposal would undermine the nation's ability to interrogate prisoners and arranged an extraordinary conference call with reporters in which the nation's top intelligence official criticized Warner's plan.

"If this draft legislation were passed in its present form, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency has told me that he did not believe that the [interrogation] program could go forward," National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said.

Chaplain discharged for wearing uniform at White House protest

Navy Chaplain Lt. Gordon Klingenschmitt, receives communion in front of White House to protest the Navy restrictions on prayer, Sept. 12, 2006.

By Sonja Barisic
Associated Press

NORFOLK, Va. — A military jury found a Navy chaplain guilty Wednesday of disobeying an order by appearing in uniform at a White House protest.

A jury of five officers deliberated for an hour and 20 minutes before deciding Lt. Gordon J. Klingenschmitt disobeyed a superior officer's order that he could be in uniform if conducting a "bona fide worship service."

The penalty phase began immediately after the verdict. Klingenschmitt could be docked two-thirds of his pay for a year and reprimanded.

A superior officer had told Klingenschmitt he could appear in uniform at media appearances only if conducting a "bona fide worship service."

Klingenschmitt contended that his appearance at a March 30 news conference, held at the White House to protest a Navy policy requiring nondenominational prayers outside of religious services, qualified as a worship service.

Cmdr. Rex A. Guinn, the prosecutor, told the jury during closing arguments of the special court-martial that the case was "about an experienced military officer receiving a clear order to not do something."

Iran and we don't want interference in our internal affairs."

Al-Dabbagh suggested that funding was coming from Iran to groups in Iraq, which he did not identify.

"There is interference coming from neighboring countries and it has negative implications for the situation in Iraq," he told the AP in a telephone interview. "We want to bar financing for certain parties."

"Iran has shown it will help, and we want to see implementation of that," he said.

Sunni Arabs fear more sectarian violence will break out if the largest Shiite political bloc in parliament moves to establish autonomous regions as part of a federal Iraq.

Iraq's parliament speaker, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, urged that a bill drafted by the dominant Shiite United Iraqi Alliance not be submitted until parliament amends the country's new constitution, a process that could drag on for months.

American, British and U.N. officials were also said to be urging a postponement.

Sunni Arabs vehemently oppose the bill, saying it could split the country into three distinct sectarian and ethnic regions that would deprive them of the country's oil wealth.

Federalism is already part of Iraq's new constitution and there is an autonomous Kurdish region in the north. However, special legislation and a referendum would be needed to turn Iraq into a full federation.

Shiite leaders of the United Iraqi Alliance were sending delegations to Najaf to meet with radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and other prominent Shiites who do not fully support the legislation — but for different reasons than the Sunnis'. Al-Sadr, for example, wants the issue to be discussed only after U.S. troops leave Iraq.

New napkin may be able to spot hazards

ITHACA, N.Y. — Cornell University researchers are developing a napkin that will be able to detect bacteria, viruses and other dangerous substances with a mere swipe.

The napkins, made with special nanofabrics, could have commercial use in food preparation or health care, said Margaret Frey, a professor of fiber science and apparel design at Cornell.

"It's very inexpensive, it wouldn't require that someone be highly trained to use it and it could be activated for whatever you want to find," Frey said. "So if you're working in a meat-packing plant, for instance, you could swipe it across some hamburger and quickly and easily detect E. coli bacteria."

The biodegradable absorbent wipe is similar to a common household napkin but has nanofibers containing antibodies to numerous biohazards and chemicals. Users would simply wipe the napkin across a surface, and those antibodies would signal the presence of bacteria or viruses by changing colors, for instance.

The antibodies "are going to selectively latch onto whatever pathogen that they match," Frey said. "Using this method, we should, in theory, be able to quickly activate the fabric to detect whatever is the hazard of the week, whether it is bird flu, mad cow disease or anthrax."

Frey reported on her work Monday at the American Chemical Society's national meeting in San Francisco. She said her research team has applied for patents and is looking for commercial partners, though the napkin is still a few years away from commercial production.

Manipulations of TV

How long has it been since MTV stopped living up to its name?

Michael Cartwright

MTV has unquestionably altered the youth of America. It began as a platform for the newest music videos, the most informative rock documentaries and the most irreverent of youthful commentary. It fittingly celebrated its birth by airing the video for the 1979 Buggles' song "Video Killed the Radio Star." Video had arguably killed the radio star, but 20-some-odd years later, MTV would arguably kill video.

It wasn't initially included in most cable packages, and so, it began to implement the infamous slogan, "I want my MTV."

Oh, how times have changed. Today, the greater part of teenage America has their MTV, and I, for one, do not want it.

The irony of the network's title is no longer lost on anyone as the Music Television Network plays music about as often as C-SPAN. It once attempted to remedy this glaring inconsistency by introducing a sister network, MTV2, which was dedicated exclusively to music videos. Predictably, MTV2 eventually adopted MTV's formulaic approach, deciding to air "Laguna Beach" over the newest Gnarls Barkley video.

The MTV of yesterday is dead. The MTV of today is on life support, but for some odd reason, still has legions of fans at its bedside.

Amid preparation for this column, I typed MTV.com into my Web browser. I was greeted by a gaudily designed Web page, including a top five music video ranking for the current week. Paris Hilton's video occupied the number-two slot. The song's lofty status was amazing but completely unsurprising, disturbing, yet absolutely hilarious. Her hit single "Stars Are Blind" is also somewhat ironic as it's ostensibly not the stars who are blind, but rather, the fans of such stars who are blind, deaf and dumb.

Even more curious than its audience is the bizarrely schizophrenic nature of MTV itself. A bus filled with half-naked teenagers often follows one of MTV's abstinence campaign ads. Advertisements telling kids to abstain from smoking pot will regularly precede a clip of Sean Paul singing "Give me the light and pass the dro."

When it's not bombarding viewers with hypocritical campaigns, it's airing marathons of the most half-assed television shows imaginable. Are 16-year-old suburbanites watching "Yo Momma" thinking it closely resembles some unfamiliar reality? I can't help but think someone is under the impression that rival inner-city crews congregate deep inside a desolate parking garage, viciously exchanging pathetic yo-momma jokes ad-nauseam until one crew has no choice but to concede (as Wilmer Valderamma holds his hand over his mouth like a blushing school girl).

Just recently, I heard someone say "Yo Momma" is "so bad, it's good," and there in lies the latest frightening question — did MTV deliberately spawn its own oxymoronic brand of intentionally unintentional comedy?

Her hit single "Stars Are Blind" is also somewhat ironic as it's ostensibly not the stars who are blind, but rather, the fans of such stars who are blind, deaf and dumb.

"Parental Control" and "Date My Mom" seem so unashamedly scripted, with prepped dialogue so poorly acted, one can't help but instinctively anticipate some sort of 1970s porno-saxophone to be queued up at any moment. This of course would be the ideal soundtrack for the show's mom (complete with low-cut white top and tan leather miniskirt) as she strips down and straddles her daughter's prospective boyfriend.

"My Super Sweet Sixteen" shows some of the most sickeningly spoiled children in the country. We have the esteemed luxury of watching them whine and whimper about how they've been terribly neglected by their parents. These young divas are so terribly neglected; they are forced to take a shabby 2006 Lexus to their 16th birthday party as opposed to a stretch hummer, helicopter or private Learjet.

In between all of these highbrow creative masterworks, MTV often displays their new motto, "Degrade yourself — it's cool" during commercial breaks. The slogan certainly seems fitting in view of the behavior of the network and its audience. How depressing is MTV's absolute shamelessness?

And to think, it was only a little more than a decade ago when MTV brought the revolutionary seasons of "The Real World" into our homes. "The Real World" began as a show that resembled the actual real world with its random assortment of compelling characters and average looking people.

Nowadays, much like every other show on the network, "The Real World" uses a tiresome mechanical approach. The seven strangers will roughly consist of three male Abercrombie models, two female knockouts, one oddball female and, of course, a homosexual to be named later.

Participating in "The Real World" also seems to be less about a six-month soul search as it does a springboard for "The Real World/Road Rules Challenge." This obnoxious show, once hosted by clinically brain-dead Dave Mirra, has allowed cast members of "The Real World" to avoid, well, the real world. These burnt-out cast members spend weeks, months and sometimes years sprinting across white sand beaches for cash and prizes. Personally, I can't wait to see a decrepit David "Puck" Rainey run the gauntlet in a wheelchair in 2034.

MTV has gradually transformed itself into an entertainment cesspool. Unless it miraculously assumes a cultural role akin to its early years, my remote will sadly continue to flip past every egregious action of an entertainment channel that tragically spiraled out of control.

The word is 'coming out'

Chris Reardon

Summer is over, school is in, and the athletes are out. Yes, we are approaching what is sure to be an action packed baseball playoff race and football season, but that's not exactly what I was referring to. This summer, many occurrences have given us proof that the world is becoming more open to the prospect of homosexuality in sports.

Whether he's aware of it or not, a leader in this revolution is Andrew Goldstein. As a two-time All-American goaltender for the Dartmouth College lacrosse team, Goldstein came out of the closet in 2005 during his senior year and was subsequently highlighted by ESPN as the most accomplished openly gay male athlete in a North American team sport.

This summer, Goldstein broke an important barrier by becoming the first openly gay player on a professional male team when he was drafted and began playing for the Long Island Lizards. Though the move went widely unheralded in the sports world, and Goldstein and his teammates make little fuss about it, there's no denying the importance of this turn of events.

While it remains to be seen whether Goldstein will become the Jackie Robinson of homosexuals, he's already opened a door that many have been waiting to run through for decades. Although a handful of athletes have come out of the closet after retiring, none have ever had to face teammates, press and potentially awkward locker room situations while still playing. The fact that Goldstein has not experienced any negativity from his coaches, teammates and fans shows the world is ready to accept homosexuality in its sporting ventures.

One professional sport has already taken steps to prepare its players for these changes. Former NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue retired this summer. He has a gay son, has long been an advocate for gay rights and is leaving behind one of the most tolerant attitudes in all of sports. It's hard to believe about a sport that so resembles carnal warfare, but the league even gave gay sensitivity advice during its annual rookie symposium (an event held to help prepare NFL rookies for football life off the field) back in June. Esera Tuaolo, who retired from the NFL in 1999 and came out in 2002, spoke to the rookies about tolerance and about being gay in the NFL.

The NFL deserves praise for its attitude toward homosexuals in sports. What could be more comforting for a gay athlete than knowing that the league supports him? Of course, the league doesn't speak for the players, and there is no way to determine how some of them would react to finding out one of their teammates was gay, but by instilling a sense of tolerance in players before they even begin their rookie campaign the NFL is building itself a generation of players that at the very least are aware of the league's attitudes on the issue.

Baseball, however, still has quite a way to go. Ironically, the NFL's rookie symposium took place just a week after Chicago White Sox manager Ozzie Guillen further inflamed press relations by referring to Chicago Tribune writer Jay Mariotti as a "fking fag." It wasn't the first time Guillen has used gay slurs, either. He likes to excuse himself by saying that plenty of his friends are gay, but in order to bring tolerance to the sport we have to stop allowing people to use justifications like that as a get-out-of-jail-free card.

Andrew Goldstein, two-time All-American and openly gay athlete.

Although a handful of athletes have come out of the closet after retiring, none have ever had to face teammates, press and potentially awkward locker room situations while still playing.

Guillen's only punishments for this repeat faux-pas were a verbal slap on the wrist by MLB commissioner Bud Selig, sensitivity training and a fine, leaving the many who expected a suspension of the manager scratching their heads. Selig simply has not made tolerance in his sport nearly as important as did Tagliabue for football.

Like steroids in the '90s, baseball officials seem to be ignoring the gay sensitivity issue because tickets are selling regardless of the players and fans that are suffering as a result of intolerance.

What Major League Baseball needs is an icon — a star player to come out and admit that he is homosexual and to speak out against people like Guillen. I have no doubt in my mind that many household sports names are gay, but before Goldstein's matriculation there was no precedent set for gay players in male team sports.

If, for instance, a certain Boston catcher (wishful thinking) decided to come out of the closet, other players would then have someone to model their press relations after or even just talk to about their respective situations. Not only that, but gay fans would have the caliber of sports hero they've been looking for since, well, forever.

So, if there's a closeted sports hero out there reading this (again, wishful thinking), you could be the one to make things easier for every gay athlete in the country and for generations to come.

Getting the facts yourself

Domenic Poli

Even though it blows my mind if someone does not share my dislike for President Bush, I'm fine with that. This is America, not everyone has to feel the way I do. I can't stand, however, when certain people (and when I say certain people I mean people who are conservatively-biased) treat me as if I am a fool for believing what I do.

You know the kind of people I'm talking about: the stubborn ultra-Conservatives who think having any little shred of criticism is unpatriotic and who say you've been brainwashed by a Liberal media. Now, I'll admit that some news outlets are Left-winged, but most are completely moderate.

A little less than two months ago I worked with an older gentleman (whom I'll refer to as Sam) packaging and mailing merchandise. One day I wore a T-shirt that depicted an outline of the Lone-Star state with big letters inside of it that read, "Somewhere in Texas a village is missing its idiot." I asked Sam a question about a mailing order. Before he finally answered he shot me a sarcastic smile and said, "I don't know. That T-shirt is throwing me off today." After taking a second to think about what he meant, I laughed and went back to work.

Only about five seconds went by, however, before he said, "Let me ask you something. Why don't you like him, anyway?" Confused as to why he didn't already know, I said, "Well, for one thing, since he took office, America has gotten 8 trillion dollars into debt." Sam responded, "No, we're not. That's just Liberal garbage. How are we 8 trillion dollars in debt?" I told him there are several reasons, but two big components were tax cuts for the wealthy and an unsuccessful war in Iraq.

Sam laughed, threw his arms in the air and suggested that was just a bunch of lies, and I had been brainwashed by a Liberal-minded media. He said that, first of all, the wealthy did not receive any tax cuts, and as for the war in Iraq, our soldiers did find WMDs. No matter how much I argued with him, it was no use. To him, I am just a dumb teenage kid whose mind has been warped by Left-wing madmen. Sam doesn't have a clue what he's talking about — and I've got evidence to prove it.

The wealthy received more tax cuts than anyone else. According to a study conducted by CBS, last year the effective tax rate for the top one percent of taxpayers dropped by 19 percent, while the middle 20 percent saw a decline of only four percent. According to the Bureau of the Public Debt, America's debt (to the penny) was $8,455,117,203,421.22.

Now, as far as the war in Iraq is concerned, I know the troops found some WMDs, and that's great, but I have news for you: They weren't the right ones.

People in the upper 20 percent of yearly incomes, averaging $182,700 annually, got their share of federal taxes cut from 65.3 percent in 2001 to 63.5 percent this coming year. Middle-class taxpayers — with incomes that ranged anywhere from $51,500 to $75,600 — bear a much heavier tax burden. In fact, American families who made an average of $75,600 received the biggest hike in taxes, jumping from 18.5 percent to 19.5 percent this year.

Now, as far as the war in Iraq is concerned, I know the troops found some WMDs, and that's great, but I have news for you. They weren't the right ones. Stay with me on this.

Before sending our troops into Iraq in March 2003, members of the Bush administration told the American public we were going in to find WMDs that Saddam Hussein had and could potentially use to harm the United States. Soldiers spent almost two years looking, only to have the search called off in January of 2005 when the CIA released its final report declaring no weapons were found. Then last June, it was reported that 500 chemical weapons had been found in Iraq, according to Fox News.

The right side of the political aisle jumped for joy. They thought, "Eureka. Thank God. Now it was all worth it," but hold the phone. Like I said, they weren't the right ones.

According to an official at the U.S. Department of Defense, the WMDs found were "pre-1991 weapons that could not have been fired as designed because they [had] already been degraded."

Wait, that's not all. Even the administration's own inspectors and Charles Duelfer, the chief weapons inspector, have said, "Iraq did not have the weapons that our intelligence believed were there."

So it seems that over 2,500 good American soldiers have lost their lives looking for something that was of no threat at all. That may seem like just a four-digit number on a newspaper page, but that means over 2,500 families have been torn apart and will never get to see their loved ones walk through the front door just one more time.

The facts are out there, it's all just a matter of finding it and not believing everything your favorite patriotic news outlet tells you. Well, Sam, who's the one who's brainwashed now?

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

IS UMASS NUMBER SEVEN?

I graduated from the University of Massachusetts having never heard the moniker "Zoo Mass." Perhaps I was in the library too often. Maybe I spent far too much time attending performances at the Fine Arts Center or listening to poets at the former Wooton's Books. The many jazz concerts I enjoyed, thanks to Billy Taylor, may have simply drowned out the whispers. Not until I was in graduate school did I hear the phrase "Zoo Mass."

A young professor, who grew up in Massachusetts, asked me how I liked "the Zoo." He wanted to know how I had managed. I could not imagine what he was talking about. My grandparents had taken me to a zoo in 1980. Why would he care about such a thing? Did he once work at the zoo? Was I wearing some sort of zoo paraphernalia? He finally pointed to my shirt and said, "UMass." Puzzled, I think I responded, "It doesn't have a zoo. It was a land grant college. There is an equestrian team, but I didn't belong to it."

Of course, once I uttered these words I soon understood his (unintended) insult. My UMass friends now work for engineering, publishing, and law firms. An unusual number are published poets. One is an up-and-coming fiction writer. Another is a theater director and comedian. Yet another is a film fighter. Some went on to Ph.D. programs in Italian, medieval literature, and history. One friend is now among a rare "breed," the female professor of engineering. Others are environmental activists, law librarians, biologists, journalists, painters, musicians, and so on. I should be so lucky to be penned into such a zoo ever again. Enjoy it while you still can.

Sincerely,
Katie Burns

Garden of Eden winds up as summer winds down

By Morgan Ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

GREENFIELD—This Friday to Sunday, Camp Kee-Wanee in Greenfield will host the "Garden of Eden" festival, presented by Wormtown Trading Co.

The music festival will feature a variety of bands, including Strangefolk, Max Creek, The Ryan Montbleau Band, Fungus Amungus, and many others.

This is the second year that "Garden of Eden" will be held in Massachusetts after being held in Vermont and New York in years past.

"We were talking about doing it in Massachusetts, and since we had this land we've been using for our Memorial Day Cookout concert, we suggested the Garden of Eden Festival there too," said Mark Blandchette, festival promoter and University of Massachusetts Amherst alumnus.

It's also the second year that Strangefolk has joined forces with Wormtown Trading Co. in delivering Western Massachusetts their unique melodic songs and an inventive mixture of rock, blues and folk.

Friday's bands include: Chuch, Ten Mile Tide, Miracle Train, Peter Prince and Moon Boot Lover, Domino Theory, Otherwise, Poogie Bell, The Tells, Depth Quartet, Dub is a Weapon and Named by Strangers.

Bands to be showcased on Saturday are Hint of Lime, Scarecrow Collection, U-Melt, Civil Dirt, The Knot, Entrain, The Breakfast, RAQ, The Brew, Oak Street, Breadbox Band, Rev Tor Band, Uncle Billy's Smokehouse and One Eyed Jack.

Sunday will bring out bands like Melvin Sparks, Black Rebels and Bruce Mandaro Band, and will come to a close with the Ryan Montbleau Band. Headliner Strangefolk will play on both Friday and Saturday.

With the line-up of the festival mostly jam bands, the event is surprisingly not marketed towards the hippie culture.

"Everyone is invited. We would like people who like good music and families to come on down," Blandchette said.

If the music of the festival is not your style, there will be other events going on throughout the weekend, such as drum circles, a community bonfire, clothing vendors, arts and crafts and roaming entertainers.

In addition to the live music, "Garden of Eden" will feature a variety of roaming entertainers, body painting artists, a community bonfire and drum circles. The event is all ages, and children under 12 will be admitted for free. Gates open at 8 a.m. on Friday, and close at 8 p.m. on Sunday. Weekend passes cost $70, and cover entry to the festival as well as a spot for camping out all weekend.

The festival promises to be a great get away from the already monotonous daily routine. With the colder weather coming soon, this is going to be one of the last chances to enjoy a festival this year.

The VT quintet Strangefolk is returning to the "Garden of Eden" festival this weekend for the seventh year in a row.

Black Eyed Peas continue to evolve despite loss of members

By Len Right
The Morning Call

Jaime "Taboo" Gomez has a metaphor to explain why Black Eyed Peas is a different kind of hip-hop hybrid.

"If hip-hop was a movie, people come in expecting 'The Terminator' and 'Wild Wild'" says Gomez over the phone from New York. "But Black Eyed Peas is 'Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon.' We're not about explosions, hardcore, shock value, thugs shooting people on the block, or pimpin' bitches. That's what the hip-hop stereotype is. We're crazy martial arts. We're still tough, but we won't shoot you down, we'll kick you down."

We're not about explosions, hardcore, shock value, thugs shooting people on the block, or pimpin' bitches. That's what the hip-hop stereotype is. We're crasy martial arts. we're still tough, but we won't shoot you down, we'll kick you down.

BEP's self-described "crowd person" — "I'm the one who gets 'em riled up," says Gomez — grows even more expansive as he answers critics' sniping that BEP's hip-hop is too pop oriented.

"We are an experience, as opposed to just a band or a rapper," says Gomez. "We have an elaborate set with an elevator and ramps and other visuals. We have a keyboardist, a guitarist and a drummer ... This is not a rap show. Our main influences have always been rock shows."

Over the last few years, Gomez and fellow BEP performers William "will.i.am" Adams, Allan "apl.de.ap" Pineda Lindo and Stacy "Fergie" Ferguson have leveraged the worldwide success of songs such as "Pump It," "Let's Get Retarded," "My Humps" and "Don't Phunk with My Heart" into high profile gigs the 2004 Democratic National Convention, the 2005 halftime show of the CFL Grey Cup, this year's Grammy and Juno awards, a tour of China and what Gomez calls "relationships" with products "that best supply our everyday living."

The use of "Pump It" in a Best Buy commercial made sense, he says, "because Best Buy sells electronics, and we use a lot of electronics in making our music."

Ditto headlining the 2006 Honda Civic Tour. "A Honda Civic is the first car I ever had," notes Gomez, "and they make a hybrid that is great for the environment."

And working with Snickers' money (and Jimmy Smith, the man behind the Lebron James sneaker commercials) to create "Instant Def," the five-episode, candy bar friendly Web cast on InstantDef.com where the four play hip-hop superheroes on a mission to keep the music real, pure and relevant?

"Will is a Snickers fanatic," says Gomez. "When he's working long hours in the studio, that's the only thing he'll eat the whole day."

The 31-year-old Gomez grew up in Los Angeles, the breeding ground for gangsta rap. However, Gomez's hip-hop idols were A Tribe Called Quest, De La Soul and Black Sheep, crews that he describes as "positive and progressive."

When he was 12, Gomez came into contact with the skill that would help pay the bills later in life. "A friend's father asked me to learn Jeet Kune Do [a martial arts system developed by Bruce Lee]," recalls Gomez. "But he told me, 'I don't want you to fight, I want you to incorporate it into your dancing.'"

He did, and since joining forces with will.i.am and apl.de.ap in the mid-1990s, Jeet Kune Do has figured prominently in Gomez's BEP work.

"In my solo sections, I'm paying homage to hiphop, and making sure the crowd is awake, that gags turn into a party," he says. "My job as a performer is to be the ultimate showstopper — get 'em off their feet."

Though BEP's hip-hop is quite benign, the group has taken lumps for two songs: "Let's Get Retarded" (aka "Let's Get It Started") and "My Humps."

Of the former, Gomez says, "It's about losing your inhibitions, not making fun of the kid in the wheelchair. ... Retarded is slang let your inhibitions go."

As for "My Humps," about the curvier parts of the female anatomy, Gomez says, "As a male, I can't really find words to please [people] who find it is degrading to women. I don't understand why people get so literal. It's a fun song, like 'Baby's Got Back.'

"And Fergie's verse, she's not trying to get involved with some dude. She's telling him, 'No, you're not my man,' that she just wants to dance ... Nobody's saying anything disrespecting to women."

Speaking of Fergie, is there any concern that her debut solo disc, "The Dutchess," might cause unease in the group?

"We had solo records [from will.i.am] before Fergie got in the band [in 1993]," replies Gomez. "We see BEP as a factory, not just group. ... The more exposure the better, no matter who is out there first."

Fergie Ferg and Jaime "Taboo" Gomez plan to take the group to the next level with current line-up.

Townsend's mother inspires band to tour and release new album

By Dan DeLuca
The Philadelphia Inquirer

If Betty Townshend hadn't broken her hip, The Who would not have recorded 'Endless Wire,' its first album of new material in 24 years.

And Betty's son, Pete, and his sole surviving original bandmate, Roger Daltrey, wouldn't be leading The Who or "The Two," as fans have cheekily dubbed them on their just-launched North American tour.

Of course, just by giving birth to the now 61-year-old Pete, Betty Townshend can be credited as the source of one of the most brilliant resumes in popular music. It embraces gems from 'I Can't Explain' to 'Quadrophenia' to 'Hope I die before I get old' the iconic lyric from a band that went on to hold seemingly endless reunions after claiming to call it quits in the early '80s.

In the case of 'Endless Wire' (out Oct. 31) and the half-a-Who's 2006 return to the stage, Pete's mum had a direct causal relationship.

Let Pete explain.

"Around January of this year, my manager was pressing me for a decision as to whether The Who were going to tour in 2006," a talkative Townshend says by phone last week after a rehearsal in New York.

"I said I wasn't ready. I didn't want to tour unless I had new music. I couldn't really see the point of taking the old circus around the world," says the guitarist and charter member of the British rock aristocracy. "I just felt there was a kind of pointlessness to it."

Not that Townshend hadn't been busy. A self-described "Internet nut," he had just finished publishing a novella in blog form called "The Boy Who Heard Music" it's at www.petetownshend.co.uk that grew out of the aborted '70s project "Lifehouse."

Then Betty Townshend broke her hip. "She's had an alcohol problem all her life, and she suddenly started to drink around Christmas time," Pete says. His mother is in her mid-80s, and lives on the street in west London's Acton section where Pete grew up.

"We all thought she would ... wither away, and maybe go nuts and die. But she didn't. She rallied. She got herself together, healed up, and continued to cause lots of trouble."

And that was just the inspiration her son needed. "I kind of dusted myself down and thought: Well, if she can [obscenity] do it, I can do it."

So he "knocked out a bunch of songs" based on "The Boy Who Heard Music," which concerns a fictional band a generation younger than The Who. Then he phoned his manager and told him it was a go for the tour.

Now, he's back alongside Daltrey, who was a sheet-metal worker when he first joined together with Townshend, an art school student, to make music more than four decades ago.

Their tour comes four years after bassist John Entwistle followed drummer Keith Moon to an early grave. Their European shows in the summer drew raves, with a band that includes drummer Zak Starkey (son of Ringo Starr) and bassist Pino Palladino, plus longtime Who helpmates John 'Rabbit' Bundrick on keyboards and Townshend's multi-instrumentalist brother, Simon.

It's remarkable that this year Townshend has a career at all. Three years ago, news that Scotland Yard was investigating him for purchasing child pornography on the Internet in 1999 was met with shock and revulsion. Townshend turned himself in, and said that the Web surfing was for research for 'A Different Bomb,' a (still-unpublished) book based on an anti-child-pornography essay he had written.

Police found no incriminating evidence on any of his 14 computers, and Townshend, who lives in London (on the same street as Mick Jagger) with his 31-year-old singer-songwriter girlfriend, Rachel Fuller, was released. But he will remain on Britain's sex offender list until 2008. He has repeatedly asserted he is 'not a pedophile,' but refused to discuss the subject in this interview.

He's quite willing, though, to talk about his contentious relationship with Daltrey, who knocked Townshend cold with a right cross in 1973. On tour this summer, they had a spat when Daltrey forced Townshend to pull the plug on Webcasting shows.

"Roger is my partner in The Who," Townshend wrote on his Web site. "He is not my partner in anything else. We love each other, but we are not regular social buddies like Bono and Edge, we do not discuss or share ideas, and we have no unified or joint vision or strategy."

Daltrey, always game for regrouping The Who, sounded pumped up for the task in a press conference, saying, "Pete's music, for me, is still a driving force in my life." He said the "Endless Wire" songs have "the Townshend magic."

After Entwistle's death from a cocaine-induced heart attack in 2002, Townshend says, he and Daltrey realized "how much we care about each other, though we're not always in accord.

"I've always known that Roger is a fantastic interpreter of my work," he goes on. "He brings a rich theatrical passion to it, which I can't pull off, and also a very powerful masculinity which I don't have. But I have to say that I've always secretly felt that I do it better."

Now, though, he realizes that "together there's a mechanism that generates euphoric chemistry and ... is really quite extraordinary."

This summer, National Review magazine called "Won't Get Fooled Again" the greatest conservative rock song of all time. Townshend says that's "on the money." The self-described "working musician," who sees his job as "helping the audience to forget themselves," says he never really bought into "all that hippie [expletive] I so despise."

And, Townshend says, "when people say 'Won't Get Fooled Again' is not about rebellion, it's the exact opposite of that, I say they're right."

The Who are releasing "Endless Wire," their first album in 24 years, despite losing two of their original members.

That song, along with "Who Are You" and "Baba O'Riley," gained The Who ubiquitous exposure on "CSI," the crime-investigation television shows. Considering that Townshend has been willing to sell the rights to seemingly every significant Who song.

He's unapologetic.

"We have to do whatever we can to make sure that people do hear the music," he says. And he complains that "when our music was played on the radio, they did pay a few cents to play it, but quite often those cents did not find their way into my pocket." He figures it's a contradiction that it's OK for radio stations, magazines and newspapers to solicit advertising and "sell their souls to whoever comes along and pays," but not for rock stars. "There's a sense that it's all right for you guys," he says, "but it's not all right for us guys."

But if Townshend can be contentious and pragmatic one minute, the next he can sound an idealistic note about the communal power of music, reminding you that he's a product of the '60s.

"The thing that the last great war did was leave us not so much a bleakness of spirit as a vacancy," he says. "And we filled the vacancy. We filled it with a lot of bosh ... but we also filled it with a lot of passion ...

"As a 61-year-old man, I can still write very powerfully about how I am one of those people who changed the way we use entertainment and art and music and movies everything ... to deal with what we need to express. What we feel is wrong, what we feel we can't explain, what we can't articulate. And how we can only share it sometimes by realizing that we're all listening to the same records."

Oh, those hot summer nights

Does the term summer fling ring a bell?

Jasmine Monteiro

Summertime means summer love, which usually leads to summer loss. Everyone knows that it's difficult to hold onto a decent relationship after the summer. You go your separate ways, wonder if you'll see them on Thanksgiving, and try to focus on the upcoming year. It sounds easy for some. For others however, that couldn't be further from the truth. We can blame these feelings on the popular, yet sometimes dangerous, "summer fling."

It will always have a way of sneaking up on you when you least expect it. Some people want it, some people don't and some people just have no idea what they want. That's where the problems start to come in to play.

Why do we get ourselves into romantic situations that are so clearly wrong for us? Maybe it's our ability to leave it behind us after a couple of months. It's convenient and it's almost uncanny. Some of us give a sigh of relief knowing that just about everyone is trying to enjoy their summer, no strings attached, of course.

So what happens when you get in deeper than you expect? It's difficult to say because everyone's situation is different. But I can say, based on personal experience, that sometimes a "summer relationship" that lasts into the autumn may not always be the best idea. This doesn't include the uncommonly successful long-term relationships and, of course, the high school sweethearts.

Been there, done that — it's a whole other story in itself.

It all depends on what works for you. However, there is no point in making something work that doesn't feel right. Maybe you don't trust the person entirely, or they start questioning you when you don't pick up your cell phone right away. Or maybe you even find yourself eyeing other people.

These are usually good indicators that it's time to cut the cord. If you don't learn to recognize problems in the relationships as soon as they surface, then all they do is festerer until they're too obvious to ignore. This usually happens at a very inconvenient time. Trust me, the last thing you want on your mind during exams week is a recent heartbreak. Even though summer time is generally considered the perfect time to enjoy yourself, some people fail to acknowledge all the opportunities a college atmosphere presents. There are thousands of new people to meet and tons of parties to attend.

Any successful relationship will begin with people who are happy with themselves, before they're happy with eachother.

Sometimes that is hard to juggle with an excessive work load, but it is one way to start mingling and realizing everything you missed in high school. And if you went to a school where everyone knew everyone — like I did — then you definitely missed out on a lot.

Most importantly, don't hold onto something that can potentially burden your education or social life. Give yourself something to look forward to and enjoy your youth while you still have it. We'll have plenty of time to live happily ever after with someone special after college. You should use this time to get to know yourself and what type of person you want to become, as well as what you expect from a significant other.

Any successful relationship will begin with people who are happy with themselves, before they're happy with each other. Enjoy your time here too before you're in your senior year wondering, "Where did the last three years go?"

It's better to do what works for you, and everything will eventually fall into place, no matter how unrealistic that may sound. Whether you're in a committed relationship or you're enjoying the single life, always trust your instincts. Never compromise your happiness. Even though it's hard to let go of the good times you've had with someone, it's letting go that makes you strong.

Wildcats on tap for UMass

There are only five players on the UMass roster that have played against Villanova. Senior running back Steve Baylark, the three-year 1,000-yard rusher, carried the ball 13 times for 39 yards in the 2003 meeting. All-America punter Christian Koegel averaged 36.8 yards per kick in six punts.

Defensive back Tracy Belton, who grabbed an interception in last weekend's meeting with Navy, had two tackles and an interception in 2003.

Coen admitted that he didn't know much about Villanova before practice started this week, but insists that these three days of recovery have been some of the most productive in recent memory.

"[Tuesday's practice] was the fastest practice of the year," Coen said. "We were practicing hard. We moved fast and we got a lot accomplished."

Coen started 7-for-8 against Navy on Saturday, but cooled off to finish with a 17-for-29 performance. He threw one touchdown pass to a streaking J.J. Moore up the middle of the field for UMass' second score.

Last week's Division I-A opponent suffocated the UMass offense in the second half, but Villanova, through its first two games, has allowed a lofty 33 points per game. Coen and company should be able to exploit a weaker defense this weekend.

"Coming into this game I didn't know a lot about Villanova," Coen said. "I didn't know a lot about their defense. They're athletic. They make plays. They run to the ball. They are fast and have some athletes and try to get into the run game."

The Wildcats have two backs that have done some damage in the opening games of the season. Aaron Jones has 13 carries on the year and averaged 5.1 yards per carry through the first two games, good for 74 yards. DeQuese May has similar yardage numbers but more carries, running the ball 22 times for 122 yards, an average of 5.1 yards per carry.

Villanova's quarterback, Marvin Burrough, is an elusive scrambler that can throw on the run and create problems for opposing defenses.

He has thrown for 336 yards in two games on 31-for-52 passing this season. He has thrown for one touchdown and has a 59.6 completion percentage.

"Burrough is athletic and has a good feel for the offense," Brown said. "He scrambles but he throws within the scramble. We have to keep him in the pocket. And if we make him throw the ball on time I would feel a lot better about our chances."

UMass has allowed an average of 14 points per game so far this season and gave up 21 against Navy's option offense.

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

This week, senior captain James Ihedigbo was named the Atlantic 10's Co-Player of the Week. Against Navy the safety had eight tackles, one sack, two forced fumbles and one fumble recovery.

Minutemen begin Atlantic 10 season postseason while Richmond and UNH played well into the second season.

The deciding factor for the Maroon and White ended up being its fourth loss of the season against Hofstra in the final game.

With all the A-10's ranked teams — and UNH, UMass, and Richmond all in the top 10 — a similar situation may arise this season as well.

"The reality is, when you play a I-A game and you have to win eight games a year, it makes it a hair more difficult for our guys," Brown said. "Health and good play are such a factor as you move forward, but it's said all the time, the A-10 is extremely difficult top to bottom."

Conference games in the A-10 are different; they take 60 minutes of near flawless football games to win. If the first two games of the season are any indication, UMass may have to watch out.

Against Navy on Saturday, and Colgate on Sept. 2, the Minutemen played the kind of football needed to win conference games — in the first quarter. Those two periods UMass outscored the Raiders and Midshipmen by a combined score of 28-7.

"We'd love to sustain that," Brown said.

In the final three quarters combined, the Minutemen have posted 20 points compared to 28 for their opponents.

"That's the goal, let's make sure that's not just first quarter. Let's make sure we're not just happy with the first quarter. Let's sustain it and try to keep it rolling.

"As you go on in the game, people adjust, the chess match continues. We just got to keep working hard and keep ourselves fresh. When we've looked at it, execution is so important — execution and focus."

One problem Brown and the Minutemen could face this weekend are the after-effects of their game against Navy. Last season, they may have had what Brown coined a "I-A hangover."

After a close game against Division I-A Army, UMass came out flat the following weekend against Hofstra. It lost that must-win game and ultimately missed the playoffs because of it.

"There's no question we felt like we had a chance going in there. We certainly emptied the tank trying to get the 'W'," Brown said. "All you can do is get back to work and see how your guys are and I'm very comfortable with the way we've responded throughout the practices [this week]."

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

The last time Villanova and UMass met in 2003, senior running back Steve Baylark carried the ball 14 times for 39 yards.

Backup punter stabs starter in kicking leg

By Pat Graham
Associated Press

GREELEY, Colo. — In a scenario reminiscent of Tonya Harding vs. Nancy Kerrigan, the backup punter at Northern Colorado has been accused of stabbing his rival in the leg — his kicking leg.

Mitch Cozad, a sophomore from Wheatland, Wyo., allegedly attacked Rafael Mendoza in a parking lot this week. Arrested on a charge of second-degree assault, Cozad was freed Wednesday on a $30,000 bond.

Mendoza, who was treated and released at a Greeley hospital, will miss at least Saturday's game at Texas State.

"Rafael is a competitor and wants to get back as soon as he can," said head coach Scott Downing. "When that occurs, I don't know."

The incident conjured up images of the rivalry between figure skaters Harding and Kerrigan. Harding was banned from the sport for life after her former husband hired a hit man to smack Kerrigan on the knee with a crowbar.

"I guess the only identified motive [in the attack on Mendoza] at this point in time is the competition for that position," Evans police Lt. Gary Kessler said.

But Downing wasn't so sure.

Cozad and Mendoza, a junior from the Denver suburb of Thornton, were competitive, he said, but no more than players at other positions.

"No different than starting quarterback or starting right tackle," he said. "Everyone was held accountable to the same level."

Asked if there was any jealousy between the two players, he said, "I have no idea. That would all be conjecture."

UMass defeats Fairfield

The game hit a lull until the nine-minute mark when the Minutewomen offense would take over and finally solve the Fairfield defense. On their seventh penalty corner of the game, sophomore Erin Parker stuffed home the rebound off of Cher King's shot. Gillespie would tie the game shortly thereafter off a setup from Parker.

The first lead of the game for the Minutewomen came with just over two minutes left in regulation as sophomore Katelyn Orlando drew Fairfield's goalkeeper out and hit a streaking Gillespie for the score.

Gillespie wasn't done. She recorded her first career hat trick just moments later as Orlando found her again.

"One of the great things about Lauren is when she's not in the game she pays attention and makes the changes she needs to when she gets back in," said Shea.

Freshman goalkeeper Sarah Williams recorded the first win of her collegiate career. She replaced Letourneau at the 21-minute mark and did not allow a goal, although she was not really tested as she faced zero shots on goal.

Sophomore Lauren Gillespie tallied her first career hat trick in yesterday's 4-2 win over Fairfield. She leads the team in goals with six.

defense have strung together four consecutive shutouts, allowing zero goals in exactly 388 minutes and 48 seconds.

Now, teams coming to Amherst don't just see it as another game with UMass. They look at it as an opportunity to start their own "Cinderella story."

"It's exciting, but it's only the third week of the season," Cook said. "I was always told, it's not where you start, it's where you finish. We're not going to be ranked that much longer if we don't come to play everyday."

"I don't think it goes to their heads, as much as it changes the mentality of how you play," Koch said. "Sometimes you play not to lose instead of playing to win. You also fire up the team that's coming in. Now, those other teams are a little bit more fired up to play us because they have a chance to knock off somebody that's in the top 25. The bottom line is, we have to be mentally above that, and focus on what we have to do to get the job done.

"It's nice, enjoy it today, but we got a game on Friday," Koch added. "[The national ranking] doesn't help us on our game on Friday. It just sells newspaper stories."

KAITLIN MEZZATESTA/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore midfielder Tony Bassett (No. 19) has started all six games this season for the Maroon and White. He is one of three UMass players with a pair of goals in 2006.

Ihedigbo's play earns honors

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Senior safety James Ihedigbo wreaked havoc on the Colgate offense on Opening Day for the Massachusetts football team on Sept. 2. He has two sacks on the season, tied for second in the Atlantic 10. He has two forced fumbles on the season as well, which puts Ihedigbo alone at the top of the A-10.

For all of his Week 1 and 2 accomplishments, Ihedigbo earned the Atlantic 10 Co-Defensive Player of the Week honors.

"He couldn't play better," UMass coach Don Brown said of his versatile safety. "He's made plays as a deep player. He's made plays in the flats. He's made plays in the middle. He's made plays in the run game.

"He has really become a complete football player."

Ihedigbo sacked Colgate quarterback Mike Saraceno on a weak-side blitz in Week 1 and had a similar hit on Navy quarterback Brian Hampton on one of the Midshipmen's few pass plays.

On Saturday, against Navy's deceptive option offense, Ihedigbo consistently jammed the quarterback and running backs in the backfield, shutting down the option plays before they could begin. Ihedigbo has proved to be a worthy skill player in the UMass secondary, which helps to fill the void that All-American Shannon James left.

London and Anderson return

After senior wideout Brandon London and senior linebacker Brad Anderson were suspended from Saturday's Navy game because of an "undisclosed team rules violation," the two impact players will return to the UMass lineup this Sunday at Villanova.

Koegel

UMass senior punter Christian Koegel was named the Atlantic 10 Special Teams Player of the Week from Sept. 3 to Sept. 10. Koegel was the A-10 Special Teams Player of the Year in 2005 and has continued to help Brown's field position this year. In the opening game of the season against Colgate on Sept. 2, Koegel punted four times for an average of 46.8 yards, boosting his career percentage to 41.3 yards per kick, the highest total in UMass history. His longest punt against Colgate was a booming 55 yards, starting at UMass' 20-yard line and parking itself at the Colgate three-yard line.

Five all-stars in A-10 North

UMass was one of two teams in the A-10 North division with five players selected to the preseason all-conference team ... The Minutemen were picked to finish second in the A-10 North behind New Hampshire, which got 22 first-place votes by the league coaches and media members to UMass' five. Maine, Hofstra, Rhode Island, and Northeastern, rounded out the coaches' picks in the north division ... UMass had the nation's top-ranked I-AA defense last season, finishing the year with just 13.3 points allowed per game. This season the Minutemen have nearly matched that. They gave up just seven points in the season opener against Colgate and stifled the Navy option offense in Game 2, allowing 21 points, tied for the lowest amount against Navy at its home field in over a year.

Redshirt junior Rashead Rancher is one of the Minutemen's deep threats on offense. Last week he caught a 39 yard pass on the first play from scrimmage.

Minutemen try to tame Wildcats

Struggling Villanova has history on its side

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts football team has Saturday's 21-20 loss to Navy in the rearview mirror.

Now, it's Villanova. On the road. And the Wildcats have been very successful at dispatching their opponents at home.

The Minutemen (1-1) have won only two games in their last 11 attempts when visiting Villanova (0-2). UMass won its first-ever road game at Villanova in 1962, but lost nine straight contests until 2003, when the Minutemen edged the Wildcats, 19-14, thanks to a 39-yard fumble return by All-American Shannon James with 2:08 left in the game.

Villanova leads the all-time series, 11-10, and with a significant running game, an experienced quarterback, and a shot at their first win of the season, the Wildcats will come out with a lot of intensity on Saturday. Game time is set for 1 p.m.

"[Villanova] badly needs a win," UMass coach Don Brown said. "You got two teams that badly need a win."

"You definitely put more emphasis on starting off [the conference season]," sophomore quarterback Liam Coen said. "We have to move forward [from the loss to Navy]. It's all about conference play now."

Before Brown signed on with UMass in 2004, he patrolled the sidelines at Northeastern and faced Villanova four times. He finished with a 1-3 record against the Wildcats, but much has changed since Brown's last encounter with Villanova and UMass' last trip to Pennsylvania in 2003.

"If you're going to be a good team in the Atlantic 10 then you have to win on the road," Brown said. "It helps to start with a win. It's just like playing the season opener."

For most of the men in Maroon and White, lining up against the Wildcats will be a first-time experience.

Senior defensive end John Hatchell (No. 55) has recorded four tackles this season for the Minutemen. Hatchell moved over from nose tackle this season to fill the void left by Keron Williams' departure to the NFL.

Conference play takes center stage for UMass

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Earlier this week, the Massachusetts football team returned to Amherst after having just been involved in a hard-fought game with I-A opponent Navy. With two of their three non-conference games out of the way, the sentiment surrounding the Minutemen is that it's time to focus on the Atlantic 10.

UMass opens its conference schedule this weekend against Villanova on the road. It's the first meeting between the two teams since the 2003 season.

The Minutemen approach the conference schedule with open arms. Over the past three years they've had much success against teams in the league. During that span they are 18-7 against teams in their conference.

UMass coach Don Brown can't stress enough the new mantra his team has of not looking past games. However, when it comes to November, conference wins get teams into the postseason.

"With us, each game is a separate entity," Brown said. "Whether it's conference or non-conference, our goal is to win each and every week. Obviously there's more importance in this game because of the impact on the conference."

Once again this season, the A-10 is one of the stronger conferences in the nation. It has four teams that are nationally ranked, including the No. 1 team in Division I-AA — New Hampshire.

The Wildcats and Minutemen square off in Durham on Nov. 4.

"I don't think it's different than really any other year," Brown said. "Where it's so darn early, you just have to let the things play themselves out. Last year was a similar scenario."

Entering the final months of the season last year, there was much debate surrounding the conference. Three teams were deserving of making the postseason.

When all was said and done, UMass was left out of the

Gillespie's hat trick seals the deal

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Correspondent

It started as it normally has for the Massachusetts field hockey team. An early opposition goal paired with the inability to capitalize on scoring chances found the Maroon and White behind late in yesterday's game.

That all changed in a hurry. The Minutewomen (2-3) netted four late goals — three by sophomore Lauren Gillespie — and escaped Fairfield with a 4-2 victory and the 100th win for UMass coach Patty Shea.

Sophomore forward Erin Parker (right) had a goal and an assist in the Minutewomen's 4-2 win over Fairfield on Wednesday.

The Minutewomen experienced several early scoring chances, with the best coming just two minutes in. Senior Gina Sanders broke free of the defenders but was unable to make the most of it, as Fairfield goalkeeper Elizabeth Thomas brushed the weak shot aside with ease.

The Minutewomen controlled play for most of the first half but would come up empty.

Fairfield, however, scored on its lone chance of the first half. Caitlin Quinn tallied her second goal of the season on a penalty corner. The UMass defense played very well as Fairfield was held in check for the rest of the half.

Frustration set in on the UMass side as the team controlled possession for more than 20 minutes at one point during the first half. It would outshoot Fairfield, 8-1, in the half, but again was held scoreless by a staunch Fairfield defense.

Looking to collect her 100th win with the program, Shea could not ask for much more of her side. The Fairfield goalkeeper was standing on her head to keep her team in the game. The Minutewomen had to muster a comeback to gain some momentum going into this Saturday's matchup at Northeastern.

The majority of the second half looked like a carbon copy of the first. The Minutewomen dominated possession, but again were unable to take advantage of Fairfield's inability to clear the ball from their defensive zone.

Fairfield would score their second goal of the game on just its second shot of the contest.

Quinn tallied her second score of the game as she broke in alone on UMass junior goalkeeper Becky Letourneau. The goal came with just under 26 minutes left in the game. The Minutewomen were not fazed, however, and would soon respond with an offensive barrage that will not soon be forgotten.

Shea adds to accolades, earns 100th win

By Joshua M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

UMass coach Patty Shea secured career win No. 100 yesterday afternoon in Fairfield, Conn. All it took was a late comeback from the Massachusetts field hockey team, led by sophomore forward Lauren Gillespie and her first career hat trick.

Despite out-shooting the Stags 26-2, the Minutewomen and Shea seemed destined to go home unsatisfied. But down 2-0 late in the game, the Minutewomen refused to pack it in.

The tide finally turned with 8:25 left in regulation. It took 20 shots to find the back of the net and for the flood gates to open. The Minutewomen would score three more times in a span of seven minutes.

Shea was quick to deflect the attention away from her milestone. When asked about winning No. 100, she said, "I feel old, but it [the win] feels great."

Shea pointed out that the victory was an important one for the team, going into a weekend against two very different opponents. Between celebrating and trying to direct the team bus back to the highway, Shea found a moment to remark about the performance of Gillespie.

"You have to go back quite a few years to find a hat trick," Shea said. "But I think it was Erica Johnston."

Johnston played under Shea in her first year as a coach in 1997.

Following up her two-goal performance against Harvard with a hat trick the next game, Gillespie has distinguished herself as an offensive force.

"She tunes into the game when she's not playing," Shea said. "And she makes the changes and adjustments she needs to be successful."

While victory No. 100 brought a smile to her face, Shea is no stranger when it comes to accolades and milestones. Nationally and internationally recognized as a top field hockey player, Shea has built an impressive resume through her performance both on the field and the sideline.

As a player at UMass, Shea anchored the goalie position from 1980-1983. She had first-team All-American honors as a junior and a senior, leading the Minutewomen to two NCAA final-four appearances. Shea owns a school-record 54 shutouts, and posted a career .617 goals-against-average.

A member of the 1988 and 1996 U.S. Olympic Field Hockey teams, Shea was awarded USA Field Hockey Athlete of the Year for her play on the world's biggest stage.

Shea was the goalkeeper from 1985-1996 for the USA National Team, winning the World Hockey Cup bronze medal in 1994.

Shea has coached the Minutewomen to five Atlantic 10 titles along with five NCAA tournament appearances. She was also awarded back-to-back A-10 Coach of the Year honors in 1999 and 2000. Her peers in the National Field Hockey Coaches Association selected her as the Northeast Region Coach of the Year in 2000.

Inducted into the U.S. Field Hockey Association Hall of Fame in 2004, Shea shares that distinction with only 41 other recipients.

Acquiring a rap-sheet as impressive as this, Shea has never been one to rest on her laurels. As a coach, she does not linger on a victory, even one as sweet as No. 100.

"We have to work on finishing," Shea said. "This weekend [against Northeastern and Boston University] we face two different systems and styles. We need to be mentally in-tune for success."

On Saturday, Shea will be looking for win No. 101, while the Minutewomen hope to make it three in a row.

Patty Shea has been at the helm of the Minutewomen for the past 10 years. In that span, she's led the team to five Atlantic 10 conference championships and five NCAA Tournament appearances.

National ranking means little to UM

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

It's just another number. At least that is what the Massachusetts men's soccer team thinks about its most recent national ranking.

UMass is ranked No. 22 in the nation, according to Tuesday's National Soccer Coaches Association of America/Adidas poll.

But it doesn't change anything. In fact, it just makes UMass coach Sam Koch's squad work that much harder.

"We'll see how it feels on Sunday," Koch said about his team getting national recognition. "We got a game on Friday. National rankings don't mean anything until the end of the year. Is it nice? Yea it's nice. It's a credit to them, it's a credit to the backs and Zack [Simmons]. They've done a good job defensively. The midfield has also done a good job defensively."

The Minutemen are off to an impressive 5-0-1 start, their best opening since the 1971 season. They have allowed only one goal in their first six games of the year.

As impressive as those numbers are, there's still plenty of work to be done.

"I think we all have to kind of evaluate how we're playing," junior captain Kenny Cook said. "We realize that being No. 22 in the nation means that we're going to have guys coming after us. So we have to raise our game, or else we're going to get knocked off."

"I'm more proud of the fact that we got five shutouts than I am worried about a national ranking," Koch said. "The bottom line is, that doesn't mean anything on Friday, except the other team knows we're ranked, and they have a chance to knock off a ranked team. We have to focus on what we have to do, and not focus on national rankings."

Sophomore goalkeeper Zack Simmons and the Minutemen

See M. SOCCER on page 11

Sophomore Mike DeSantis scored the game-winning goal in overtime against St. Bonaventure on Sunday. The goal gave UMass its fourth consecutive win.

F.A.Q.

CAN ANYBODY JOIN A FRATERNITY OR SORORITY?

Fraternity and Sorority membership is open to all full-time undergraduate students. However, some chapters do have requirements that must be met before one may be considered for membership: grade point averages, semester hours completed, an intake process, etc.. Before you join, learn everything you can about the fraternity or sorority that interests you, as it is important that you feel comfortable and happy with the decision you make.

IF I JOIN A FRATERNITY OR SORORITY, DO I HAVE TO LIVE IN THE CHAPTER HOUSE?

Not every chapter on campus has a facility/house. For those with facilities, each one has its own housing requirements and processes. First year students are not allowed to move into a chapter facility (university policy.)

IF I JOIN A CHAPTER, AM I GOING TO GET HAZED?

Hazing is a violation of Commonwealth of Massachusetts laws and university policies. Every national fraternity and sorority has banned hazing, and each chapter is obligated to comply with these regulations. Most chapters have a new member program (a.k.a. pledge program) where the new members learn what it means to be a member of the chapter.

HOW MUCH DOES IT COST TO JOIN A FRATERNITY OR SORORITY?

Each chapter sets its own fees for joining and for housing. There are usually national dues, an initiation fee, and local costs when one joins a chapter. Housing costs are comparable to on-campus costs, at times even less expensive. Most chapters will provide this information during the recruitment process.

Journalism program to establish news council

By Elizabeth Hawley
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Journalism Department was recently awarded a $75,000 grant from the John S. and James L. Knight Foundation, based in Miami, Fla.

The funds will go towards launching the New England News Council, a non-profit organization that will investigate fairness and accuracy in the media, as well as offer a place for citizens and those who work in the media to debate media fairness.

The grant was announced last June at the "Democracy and Independence Council" conference at UMass.

The Council plans to become a tax-exempt educational foundation, and until then will receive support from foundations, affiliated academic institutions, news organizations, and private donations. In the interest of remaining independent and avoiding suggestions of government regulation, the Council will not accept any public funds.

The Media Giraffe Project will be directed by Bill Densmore, head of the New England News Council. Densmore, with professors Norman Sims and Ralph Whitehead, wrote the initial proposal for the program.

"Newspapers, and television stations, and radio stations are in some ways under a state of siege right now," Densmore says, stating rising costs and the increasingly accessible Internet as causes. "News organizations need to broaden and extend their relationships with and connect with readers, users, and listeners."

The news council hopes to help achieve that deeper connection. In addition to Densmore, the Council will include advisors from every state in New England, including people who have careers involved in journalism, and also people who simply have an interest in the media.

The Council, which already exists in Minnesota, Hawaii, and Washington State, will serve all of New England and, like other news councils, hopes to bring together public citizens and those who work in the news industry for open discussion of issues surrounding the media.

However, unlike news councils in Washington State and Minnesota, members of the New England News Council hope to put emphasis on creating a forum for discussion, rather than focusing on complaint-based hearings. It also hopes to increase the public's ability to comment on media issues while at the same time increasing understanding of those issues.

According to Densmore, the Internet has provided access to "much more of a cacophony of voices, one of those voices is criticism." The New England News Council hopes to provide a more sophisticated, more impartial forum for discussion and disagreement, and also a place for news outlets to hear and understand the consumer's opinions.

The Council may take on projects that include a reader's guide to the media, discussion and research on fairness and judgment in the media, and assistance on efforts for K-12 media curriculum. These projects will be based around the Council's web page, which will launch in the fall of 2007.

Bush criticized for soaring tuition costs

By A.N. Hernandez
The University Star (Texas State U.-San Marcos)

SAN MARCOS, Texas—A study released Tuesday assessing the "affordability crisis" of college has Democratic policymakers talking. The study reports that soaring higher education costs coupled with declining household incomes means more students are in debt or unable to attend college.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass. and U.S. Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., urged the Bush administration in a conference call Wednesday morning to take a "new direction" in education reform that would make college more affordable.

"This administration has turned its back on middle-income students and on the neediest students who have academic qualifications," Kennedy said.

Campaign for America's Future, a progressive group, conducted the study "Higher Education: Soaring Out of Reach for Families." It reports the cost of tuition for a four-year college increased $2,786 from 2000 to 2005, while the median household income fell by 2 percent in the same period.

Robert Borosage, the group's co-founder, said public universities must increase their tuition rates to make up for state and federal fiscal problems.

"College assistance has not kept up. The president never fulfilled his promise to raise Pell Grants," Borosage said. "Now, financial barriers will literally prevent millions of students from attending college all over the next decade."

Borosage said those who did finish college were left with staggering debts. The Higher Education of State Public Interest Resource Groups reports that the average student debt burden in 2004 was almost 60 percent higher than it was in the mid-1990s. Moreover, the typical college student graduates with more than $17,000 in student loans.

Kennedy said better education opportunities allow for heightened national security.

"Education is not only an issue for mid-income families; it is a national security issue as well," Kennedy said. "You need to have well-educated, well-trained individuals to have strong national security."

He cited international globalization as another reason to make college affordable.

"How are we going to develop the innovative industries of our time, to be able to develop high paying jobs with good benefits and how are we going to maintain a world-class economy that is second to none? It is education at its core," he said.

Kennedy said when the Bush administration's 2007 budget cut $12 billion from student loan spending to use for tax reductions for the wealthy, it was clear what the administration's priority is. He said finding student loan programs that work well with students and their families is a "challenge of our time."

"We have a student loan program that works well for the banks and not for the students," he said. "We need to bring competition into this student loan program just like we bring competition with other aspects of federal funding."

Miller, of the House Education and Workforce Committee, was also on the call. Earlier this year Miller and Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., introduced a bill to cut subsidized loan interest rates in half. Subsidized loans go to students with the most financial need. Miller questioned the "morality" of cutting $12 billion dollars from the loan programs.

"It's interesting at a time when everybody acknowledges that college is getting more expensive for families. The Republicans' idea was to make it more expensive," Miller said. "They took that money and they stole it from the students. That was the raid."

He urged the reduction of interest rates on loans and the expansion of Pell Grants. The House vote cutting the $12 billion from the Higher Education fund was split on partisan lines, with House Democrats voting against the cut and House Republicans voting for the cut, except Rep. Ron Paul, R-Texas. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas and Sen. John Cornyn, D-Texas also voted for the cut.

Study: freshmen increasingly unprepared

Freshman Alex Zatvornitsky, conducts research at Loyola University Chicago, in Chicago Illinois. A new Zogby International study released yesterday found that more than half of college instructors say this year's entering freshmen are not ready for college-level studies.

By Matt Bellefeuil
Collegian Staff

More than half of college instructors say this year's entering freshmen are not ready for college-level studies, according to a new Zogby International study that was released today by the Association of American Publishers (AAP).

The 55 percent figure is even higher at two-year colleges, where 75 percent of faculty members consider incoming students to be unprepared.

To address this growing challenge, a majority of college professors—53 percent are using some form of textbook supplements or integrated learning tools in their classrooms.

"These findings are a wake-up call for anyone who is concerned about the future of higher education and America's competitiveness," said Patricia Schroeder, president and chief executive officer of AAP. "Too many college students are not ready for college work, and they need new types of learning tools to succeed."

Professors said that supplemental course materials, such as study guides, online homework and tutorial systems, help retain students who might otherwise fail to complete courses or drop out of school.

Nearly eight in 10 college-level instructors say their less-prepared students would do "significantly better" in introductory-level courses if they spent more time using supplemental materials. Ninety percent of them say these students would do better if they made greater use of the assigned textbook.

"Professors say these tools enable students to learn more efficiently," said Bruce Hildebrand, AAP's executive director for higher education. "In response, publishers are offering more options than ever before for textbooks and integrated or supplemental learning materials."

The findings are relevant for all students, the study noted, not just for those who are less prepared.

More than three in four professors say that supplemental materials "clearly enhance most students' learning."

A 57 percent majority say most students would be more successful in their coursework if faculty members required the use of supplemental materials.

More than four in five instructors require or recommend supplemental materials for their students, an 11 percent increase from an earlier faculty survey conducted by Zogby in December 2004, and about the same number required or recommend a textbook for courses they teach.

"To meet the needs of diverse student populations, college instructors are relying more heavily on new types of learning tools that accompany today's modern textbooks and personalize the learning process," said Schroeder. "The fact that the use of these materials has increased 11 percent over a year and half ago is a clear sign that professors are seeing positive results, and that means academic success for more students."

When deciding which textbook to adopt for their courses, the survey found that instructors consider both price and quality.

According to Zogby International, "Professors are requiring the materials they believe can help their students succeed—new textbooks and supplemental tools—which suggest professors believe the price of success outweighs the cost of failure."

Approximately three quarters of instructors agree that price is important to them when choosing a textbook, but nearly as many said the usefulness of the textbook is the more important factor. Instructors also said they place more importance on the effectiveness of a learning tool than on the price.

Today, publisher's offer a variety of supplemental materials, including study guides, practice quizzes, and interactive or online tutorials. In addition, modern textbook choices can range from split editions, textbooks by the chapter, electronic versions, black-and-white editions, custom books and abbreviated editions, thereby providing students with lower costs and better value.

Legal hallucinogenic now available in Ohio

By Collin Minnis
The Post (Ohio U.)

ATHENS, Ohio—Walk into any "head shop" in Ohio and behind the transparent cases full of kaleidoscopic bowls and bongs there will most likely be an idle package in the corner full of a substance called Salvia divinorum.

"Psychedelic is the word that comes to mind [when it comes to Salvia]," said Simni Tackett, a "pipe specialist," as she likes to call herself, at The Dream Merchant in Columbus, Ohio. "It's definitely a hallucinogen. When I did it, I witnessed my legs leaving my body while Paul Simon spoke to me."

According to Erowid.org, a Web site dedicated to the education of drugs, Salvia divinorum, Magic Mint, Sally-D or plainly put, Salvia A, is a psychoactive plant of the sage genus and mint family that is Native to the Sierra Mazateca, Mexico.

Salvia is the strongest psychedelic still legal in most of North America, according to Heads magazine. It is listed as a "drug or chemical of concern" on the Drug Enforcement Agency's Web site.

Widely distributed on the Internet, it is sold throughout the United States in different potencies. It is illegal to sell and possess it in Louisiana, Delaware, Missouri and Tennessee. A number of other states have proposed legislation to control its sale and distribution, according to the DEA site.

"I think it's going to be illegal soon," Tackett said.

"We have not had any cases that are particularly shocking," said Anthony Marotta of the DEA Columbus field office. "If there would be a transportation of the drug from the state of Ohio to, say, Louisiana, then they would face the appropriate charge."

The plant, either chewed in its leaf form or smoked for a more intense high in its derivative form, induces an alternate state of consciousness that some describe as "meditative." Others use words such as "scary" and "unpleasant" to describe its effects. The high can last up to an hour, but in most cases lasts only a few moments, according to Erowid.org.

"It's something that I always wanted to do, but now that I did it, I'll never do it again," said junior Chris Lykins. "We were smoking it out of a window a few feet away and I became overcome with the fear that I was going to fall out the window. I remember yelling out 'don't let me fall.'"

According to Heads, Salvia divinorum, literally translating to "sage of the seers," is different from other psychedelics in that the active ingredient in Salvinorin A is determinine. We know next to nothing about how it works on the brain, but when smoked its effects can be extremely strong, fearful and intense.

Other psychedelics, like LSD and Mescaline, launch its user into a state of both hallucination and euphoria, whereas in Salvia the euphoric feeling is absent.

"I've never heard of any harmful effects or side effects that would cause a trip to the ER or any other serious psychological effects," said Joseph Stein, D.O., a doctor in the Genesis Health Care system. Three other doctors in the system never heard of the drug.

"It's weird how weed is illegal and Salvia isn't," Lykins said. "You can stand next to a cop all day and smoke Salvia and they can't do a damn thing."

Salvia divinorum, shown above, is a psychoactive plant of the sage genus and mint family that is Native to the Sierra Mazateca, Mexico.

The Facebook feeding frenzy

By Stella Cernak
Collegian Staff

It was the final day before the official start of the 2006 fall semester. Just like any morning at the University of Massachusetts, students awoke from their stiff dormitory beds, to a day topped with new faces and old. A well-known routine filled with recognizable events such as eating at the D.C., battling with Spire, and of course the customary check of Facebook.com: the nine-million-user phenomenon that has overcome the nation's college students.

It was on this unsuspecting September morning that many students logged into their Facebook accounts to see something strangely, and to some, horrendously, unfamiliar.

Instead of the usual notification of messages, group invitations, friend requests and pokes appearing across the welcome page, something else appeared. It is what one of the founders of Facebook.com, calls "News Feed."

Weeks after the implementation of this new feature, students continue to react with outward confusion, annoyance, and anger, sparking a national debate over the issue.

The feed feature tracks the activity of a user's friend, and runs it as a summary on the welcome page after a user logs on.

The movement summaries can vary from new photos a friend has recently uploaded, to a friend removing "ice cream" from the interests section of their Facebook profile.

"I was embarrassed and kind of scared," recalls UMass sophomore Jasmine Wang, who had a harsh reaction following her first look at the feed. "It just seemed like they were exposing every little detail."

Other students on campus, however, decided to follow a more proactive route when discovering the new Facebook features.

"I was confused and that confusion turned into frustration," said UMass student Christine Peterson. "I became angry and joined an anti-Facebook group on Facebook."

In fact, these students are not alone in their electronic vocalizations against Facebook. Perhaps the largest "anti-Facebook" group on Facebook.com to date is one created by Ben Parr, a student at Northwestern University. With over 740,000 thousand members, Parr's group is appropriately titled, "Students against Facebook News Feed (Official Petition to Facebook)."

Within hours of the changes to Facebook, thousands of groups similar to Parr's sprang up in hundreds of different college networks across the nation. An air of revolution quickly began to erupt throughout the online community, as more and more users grew angry, like Peterson, about the new changes. Several groups, such as "The Revolution Against the 'New' Facebook" and the "Another Anti-Mini/News Feed Group... Get a Clue Facebook," group displayed the words "Know your rights!" in bold red letters atop a picture of handcuffs.

Still, some wonder why many people protested against the changes in the first place. Made apparent in most of the anti-Facebook groups across the Web, the topic of concern for most is the privacy issue behind the new features.

Some users do not feel it is other people's business when they change their profile, break up with their girlfriend, or leave a comment on a friend's wall, which can be directly quoted and put on a mutual friend's "News Feed" page.

"I don't feel like Facebook is legally going against our rights, but they are taking advantage of our vulnerability by not asking us before they exposed our information," says Ryan Bell, a UMass student, who is opposed to the Facebook changes.

Many have issues with the "Mini Feed" which summarizes (like news feed), the user's actions for all to see underneath their information on their Facebook page. However, users do have the option of hiding any of these actions or "stories" as Facebook calls them, from others.

Even so, some students, like Northeastern student Lauren DiPilla, actually support Facebook's new look.

"It's easier than going to the other person's page; to have it on yours - it saves time," she said. "For example, the news feed will tell you when one friend has joined a certain group, and if you share the same interest you can go check the group out without going to their page and searching through their groups, which no one will take the time to do."

However, when it comes to the new Facebook features, it's not just a matter of like and dislike. The 740,000 students who protested the feature sparked a nation-wide debate over the subject.

An article on Time.com, just a day after the Facebook fiasco began, summarized the arguments that users were making. The article, which also explains the new changes to Facebook and the opposition from its users, goes as far as to call the backlash against Facebook, "Gen Y's First Official Revolution."

Revolution or not, there are some people, like Gina Ahn, a student at Northeastern University, who believe the Facebook "revolution" is basically much ado about nothing.

"The changes are not a big deal," she said. "Students just wanted a cause, something to fight against."

Either way, Facebook co-creator, Mark Zuckerberg, did not turn his back to the disgruntled users for long. By Friday, Sept. 8, he officially addressed the Facebook community with an apologetic statement, and later issued new privacy settings to the Facebook "feeds."

In his statement, Zuckerberg stated: "We really messed this one up. When we launched News Feed and Mini-Feed we were trying to provide you with a stream of information about your social world. Instead, we did a bad job of explaining what the new features were and an even worse job of giving you control of them. I'd like to try to correct those errors now."

He continued in the statement, directly confronting the protest groups: "This may sound silly, but I want to thank all of you who have written in and created groups and protested. Even though I wish I hadn't made so many of you angry, I am glad we got to hear you. And I am also glad that News Feed highlighted all these groups so people could find them and share their opinions with each other as well."

For some, like those who joined the "official petition to Facebook" group, Zuckerberg's apology and attempt at compromise was enough.

Brandon Nyman, the co-founder of the 740,000 user petition group, posted a statement on his group's site:

"People, wake up and look around you. Our generation is coming together to unite in one common voice, that people actually listen to. Now maybe we could start standing together in other areas, ones that I am sorry to say are a lot more pressing than Facebook."

Whether the Facebook craze that occurred last week was nothing more than thousands of bored college students clicking a few buttons or the beginning of activism for Generation "Y," only time will tell. In the meantime, the online routine will carry on as usual: students will eat, sleep, go to class, party, and like it or not, they will still use Facebook.

Gunman takes his own life

By Phil Couvrette
Associated Press

MONTREAL — A 25-year-old man who mounted a deadly shooting rampage at a Montreal college had posted pictures of himself on the Internet with a rifle and said he was feeling "crazy" and "postal" and was drinking whiskey hours before the attack.

He also said on a blog that he liked to play a role-playing Internet game about the Columbine High School shootings in Colorado and wanted to die "in a hail of gunfire."

Those words almost proved prophetic, as the attacker — dressed in a black trench coat like the Columbine shooters — died of a self-inflicted gunshot wound to his head during a shootout with police after he killed an 18-year-old woman and wounded 19 other people at Dawson College on Wednesday, police said.

Carla Calandrini writes her name on a poster she put up at a makeshift memorial to the victims at Dawson College in Montreal yesterday.

Senate panel defies Bush on terror bill

President Bush talks to reporters on Capitol Hill in Washington D.C., yesterday.

By Anne Plummer Flaherty
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A rebellious Senate committee defied President Bush on Thursday and approved terror-detainee legislation he has vowed to block, deepening Republican conflict over a key issue in the middle of congressional campaigns.

Sen. John Warner (news, bio, voting record), R-Va., chairman of the Armed Services Committee, pushed the measure through his panel by a 15-9 vote, with Warner and three other GOP lawmakers joining Democrats. The vote set the stage for a showdown on the Senate floor as early as next week.

Earlier in the day, Bush had journeyed to the Capitol to try nailing down support for his own version of the legislation.

"I will resist any bill that does not enable this program to go forward with legal clarity," Bush said at the White House after his meeting with lawmakers.

The president's measure would go further than the Senate package in allowing classified evidence to be withheld from defendants in terror trials, using coerced testimony and protecting U.S. interrogators against legal prosecution for using methods that violate the Geneva Conventions.

The internal GOP struggle intensified along other fronts, too, as Colin Powell, secretary of state during Bush's first administration, declared his opposition to the president's plan.

"I the world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," Powell, a retired general who is also a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, wrote in a letter.

Powell said that Bush's bill, by redefining the kind of treatment the Geneva Conventions allow, "would add to those doubts. Furthermore, it would put our own troops at risk."

Firing back, White House spokesman Tony Snow said Powell was confused about the White House plan. Later, Snow said he probably shouldn't have used that word.

"I know that Colin Powell wants to beat the terrorists too," he said.

Countering Powell's letter, the administration produced one from the current secretary of state to Warner. In it, Condoleezza Rice wrote that narrowing the standards for detainee treatment as Bush has proposed "would add meaningful definition and clarification to vague terms in the treaties."

As the battle mushrooms, it threatens to undermine campaign season assertions by the administration that it has shown a steady hand on security matters and that it should be trusted over Democrats on the issue.

Upcoming UMass events

UMass Chancellor to Present State-of-the-Campus Address

University of Massachusetts Chancellor John V. Lombardi will give his annual state-of-the-campus address at a Faculty Convocation today, at 11 a.m. in Bowker Auditorium in Stockbridge Hall.

Nine UMass faculty will be also be presented with the Award for Outstanding Accomplishments in Research and Creative Activity:

James K. Boyce is professor of economics and director of the Political Economy Research Institute's Program on Development, Peacebuilding, and the Environment.

Seshu B. Desu, Distinguished Professor of electrical and computer engineering.

Lila M. Gierasch, Distinguished Professor of biochemistry and molecular biology.

Arthur F. Kinney, Thomas W. Copeland Professor of Literary History.

Bing Liang, associate professor of finance.

David J. McLaughlin is professor of electrical and computer systems engineering and director of the National Science Foundation Engineering Research Center for Collaborative Adaptive Sensing of the Atmosphere.

Barbara A. Osborne, professor of veterinary and animal sciences, has made several notable discoveries, including the identification of a gene that is crucial to negative selection and cell death.

Keith Rayner, Distinguished University Professor of psychology.

James E. Young, professor of English and chair of Judaic and Near Eastern studies, is one of the world's premier scholars of historical memory and memorializations.

Seminar offers self-improvement tips

A power packed, dynamic and challenging leadership and life skills training event known as "Yes plus" (Youth Empowerment Seminar +) is being hosted at the University of Massachusetts, Campus Center from Sept. 29 to Oct. 4.

This 30 hour seminar will be hosted by Khurshed Batliwala, a world-renowned motivational teacher from India, and will include students from New York University, University of Southern California, Columbia University and Georgia Tech.

"There are four benefits and seven abilities you will get out of this seminar," said Batliwala. "Keener observation, clear perception, dynamic expression and healthy body."

Batliwala says after taking his seminar, students will be able to handle not only their surrounding environment, but the ability to handle doubts, memory and self-image.

"Having these abilities, and developing them can make you a force to be reckoned with," said Batliwala.

"Yes plus" also claims to provide young professionals with practical knowledge and effective tools and techniques to reduce stress, ameliorate negative emotions and develop social and leadership skills.

"It will bring out the creative and confident streak in you," said Batliwala.

The local organizers of "Yes plus" are currently offering introductory sessions to both small and large groups of students and offering discounts to early bird registrants. Students can also learn more about "Yes plus" at www.myspace.com/jointherhythm.

Event prepares students for the job market

Author of "Ph.D. Comics," Jorge Cham will be featured in this year's "A Ph.D. is not enough," Sept. 19 at the Campus Center of the University of Massachusetts.

The daylong event consists of workshops on a variety of career and education development topics drawing from the faculty and graduate students at UMass as speakers and panelists.

The event will consist of workshops helping students become better accustomed to networking and job interviews.

"If students do not take advantage of all the opportunities to inform themselves of the necessary interpersonal skills needed in academia, industry and government positions, they will be unprepared for the job market where a Ph.D. is no longer adequate to attain the career that you desire," said Rebecca Hasson, a UMass student.

Although the event is targeted towards the graduate students they invite faculty to attend the workshops and hope that they will attend the dinner reception at the end of the event.

Prep courses may be at an end

By Megan Burks
The Daily Aztec (San Diego State U.)

SAN DIEGO — Josh Sajtar burst into laughter when asked if he was prepared for college. The senior at El Capitan High School in Lakeside, Calif., has yet to fill out college applications, including one for San Diego State University, hasn't made financial plans besides the college fund his parents saved and is nervous about being academically ready.

Sajtar isn't alone.

ACT Inc., the company that designs the ACT test to measure college readiness, reported that about four-fifths of U.S. high school graduates are ill-equipped for college and many need remediation once they get to college.

"I think all of my (advanced placement) and honors classes have prepared me, but the college-prep classes have only done the minimum to get me out of high school," said Sajtar, emphasizing his sarcasm for the words "college-prep" with air quotation marks.

Only 21 percent of the 1.2 million test-takers passed all four subject areas of the ACT test, which include algebra, English, social science and biology. A passing score in each section indicates a 50 percent chance of earning a grade of "B" or higher in college-level courses, according to the test manufacturer.

In 2005, about 64 percent of California State University freshmen demonstrated proficiency in math and about 55 percent were proficient in English, according to the CSU Web site. This placed a large population of students in remediation (or developmental) courses such as SDSU'S general math studies and Rhetoric and Writing Studies 92A. Patricia Morgan, coordinator of general math studies at SDSU, said about 1,300 students are enrolled in developmental math courses this year. About 1,200 students are taking developmental RWS classes, she said.

Some staff members and students at SDSU criticize the developmental programs, saying that remediation courses belong at community colleges because of the large pool of applications and high competition for admission.

Carol Sweedler-Brown, the coordinator of the developmental RWS program, said such developmental courses provide benefits for students who didn't receive adequate training in high school.

"To a great extent, people aren't prepared because they weren't prepared in high school," Sweedler-Brown said. "Why penalize them for something they didn't learn?"

Sweedler-Brown also said students who take developmental courses at community colleges are less likely to transfer to a four-year university, compared to the number of students who take developmental courses at SDSU and are more likely to remain on campus until they graduate.

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Watch out for the scammers

They're out by the library, on the steps of the Student Union and swarming in the Campus Center. It's very unlikely that you can go through a normal day of classes without seeing at least one. No matter how fast you try to walk by them, they're in your path. They're staring you down. They're on a mission.

We're not talking about your friendly neighborhood RSO's. This is a much more vicious crime. It's the people who stand all around with half-hearted smiles on their faces and hand you fliers. The stacks of paper offer you wholesome discounts, like free merchandise and discounted memberships. You might think of these people as harmless, maybe even generous, until you investigate these so-called deals they are giving you.

The Subway restaurant in downtown Amherst used a representative handing out tiny fliers offering students a free six inch sub and a t-shirt. All we had to do was show up at the restaurant during a specific time period. It was a chance to avoid the Dining Commons and get decent food without wasting money. If it seems too good to be true, that's because it was too good to be true.

After showing the flier to the, ahem, sandwich artist, he directs you to a table where another man sits with a pile of t-shirts and the one thing most college students certainly do not need: student credit card applications.

Many students get weary at this sight, but the Subway worker at the table reassures you and the others that if you don't want the credit card, you don't have to activate it. Several people fill out the one form, but instead of giving them a sub, the man at the table gives you another credit card application. Only when you're done with that one do you get a t-shirt and a voucher for the six inch sub.

Kaitlyn Silva

Let me assure you that a free sub doesn't taste so delicious when you know you've given away your personal information and a slice of your soul just to get it. Not to mention that you'll soon be receiving two credit cards from companies looking to push you into more debt than what the cost of UMass alone has managed to take out of you. This is called a scam. It's the painful price students pay in order to eat fresh.

This is called a scam. It's the painful price students pay in order to eat fresh.

Another neon paper handed to masses of students was a 20 percent discount to the Ultimate Fitness gym from local rock radio station Lazer 99.3. Perhaps, this would be an amazing deal if you were planning on joining a class, but otherwise, there are two gyms on campus which are free to all undergraduate students. All the same equipment can be found there.

While our recreational centers are not exactly high class facilities, most students find them tolerable enough. Those among us who are less familiar with the campus may be tempted to shell out cash in order to join an off-campus gym, but the more aware (and more frugal) students on campus should know better than to race our exercise bicycles down that path. You won't only be perspiring; you'll be in more debt than you've managed already.

At the Textbook Annex you're offered a packet of discounts for stores all over Amherst. It's an endless array of "buy one, get one free" or "three dollars off your third purchase." While these methods are a little more subtle, they're still an easy way to scam students out of their money. Chances are, you wouldn't take the time of day to purchase the first item in a "buy one, get one free" deal if its counterpart wasn't free.

Let's face it. Local businesses make a good portion of their profits from college students, so they're going to get that money any way they can. It's not always a bad thing. On occasion, these discounts and deals are genuinely useful. If you discover these things in your own time through advertisements or research, it can help you out. It's when people throw scams in your face in between classes that it becomes a problem.

This doesn't mean you can't trust anybody advertising on campus. Every once in a while there will be tables and tents set up with amusing activities and free (though generally useless) prizes. Some are honestly interested in the thoughts and choices of the average student.

The key is to investigate. Read the fine print and contemplate the details before running off and jumping on these offers. They may be asking you to give up personal information, unnecessary cash or your humility. All the free goodies and small perks just aren't worth the trouble.

No cure for Web site woes

Kevin Dooley

I cringe knowing I'm about to dive right into the world of Facebook articles, but after the uproar that took place last week after the popular (understatement of the millennium) online social networking site debuted its "News Feed" feature to its users, I couldn't help but sit down and try to figure out why "News Feed" had caused an embarrassing revolt that for this generation, could easily become our Vietnam War protest. You think I'm exaggerating?

Let's face the facts. Over 500,000 users of Facebook joined a group – ironically a Facebook group – created in order to protest and voice their displeasure at the site's latest feature that allows users to get up-to-date, second-by-second news on what their friends were doing on Facebook. In a nut of , your friends added Sam the Minuteman to a group you were alerted. If your friend left the group "I think Lohan is Wicked Hot" to join the group "Lindsay Lohan Would Now Definitely Lose in a Fight to Hilary Duff, But She Not So Sure She Would Have Three Years Ago," you would be the first to know.

Apparently, news of these constant updates caused students across the nation to stage a revolt of epic proportions – on the Facebook Web site. Before you knew it, groups popping up faster than a Paris Hilton scandal. Some groups were formal and polite with their arguments, and many Hyperbole groups got right to the point: "The New Facebook Sucks." Poor Facebook creator Mark Zuckerberg must've been fearing for his life before he issued a statement apologizing for "News Feed" and promising to make adjustments to the feature. By the way, is there a group on Facebook devoted to Paris Hilton yet?

One major complaint students had of "News Feed" was that it is an invasion of privacy, and it was quite stalkerish. In a world where your identity is harder and harder to keep

Before you knew it, groups protesting Facebook and threatening to abandon the site altogether were popping up faster than a Paris Hilton scandal.

Foreign workers in U.S.

Lauren Modisette

Many Americans feel there should be a limit set to the amount of foreigners allowed to immigrate into our country. For over 200 years the number of people immigrating into our country has been dramatically increasing. Not many people really understand how helpful immigrants are to our country's economy.

The work ethic in other countries is far different from the U.S. Here, when we work, we begin counting down the minutes, just waiting to go home. Work becomes the main concern of immigrants as soon as they are allowed to reside in our country. Otherwise, it would be impossible for them to survive here.

There were two Russian girls I worked with this summer, and they were unbelievable. They pretty much refused not to work. If there was even a moment when there was nothing to do, they would be busy trying to find something. These girls would be doing the little jobs that we, Americans, would never even think twice about doing.

Americans have become so lazy and self-indulgent that our economy can no longer rely on us to be willing to work the entire time we are on the clock. Many of the Americans I worked with this summer looked down at the foreigners and called them workaholics. They would sneer as the foreigners did side work, because they were making the rest of us look bad.

For a lot of them, the money they make in this country is worth two or three times as much in their country.

Why have Americans become so lazy? I believe it is because our generation has had our rights handed to us on a platter. The foreigners who make up our working class have to prove something to their employer, and our country, in order to maintain their Visas and jobs.

One reason immigrants are so devoted to the work they do is because of the fear of being deported. For a lot of them, the money they make in this country is worth two to three times as much in their country. As the summer came to an end, and I was looking forward to the fall season, the foreigners I worked with were stressing out trying to come up with a way to extend their Visas.

Many of my fellow employees were granted student Visas and were working during their last summer before graduation. It is relatively easy for a student to receive a Visa, but once they graduate it becomes much more difficult. A man I worked with is engaged to a girl from Lithuania, and because she is no longer a student, she was unable to come to the states for the summer.

Many Jamaicans were granted Visas from the establishment, along with a few from Bulgaria and the Dominican Republic, because they proved themselves to be more reliable than many of the American workers. Others were granted a Visa because their country offered a lottery, and they were lucky enough to be selected.

For a country that relies on immigrants to keep our economy going, the U.S. makes it extremely difficult for them to get here and stay here. Many of my colleagues' families were unable to visit them because the U.S. requires foreigners to have visiting Visas as well. This is ridiculous because we are allowed to go almost anywhere with our passport, and all you need is a license to go to Jamaica.

This past spring I was visiting friends in Chicago; the streets were packed with the Hispanic community protesting Bush's demands. It took almost an hour to cover only a couple miles because there were so many people roaming the streets.

The Hispanic community was told either to go home or go to jail because Bush wants to have more control over the immigrant population in America. Thousands of people went to protest, and employers were sending their Hispanic employees to join because of how important their services are. Without them, their businesses would flounder. If they were actually forced out of the country, our economy would suffer greatly. It would be devastating.

According to the National Center for Policy Analysis, 9 percent of our population consists of residents who weren't born in our country. Many of the political science teachers in our country are foreign women. Also, 40 percent of our foreign language teachers in the U.S. are women who were not born in our country. About 25 percent of our physicians come from another country, and 16 percent of those physicians are from India. Without these immigrants there would be little cultural education available to our children, and medicinal practices would be fairly limited.

Immigrants make up for our laziness and pride, which is unfair to them in the first place. Many male immigrants tend to find work in private homes, in the restaurant business or as tailors. Yet, our country keeps adding insult to injury by sifting through them, deciding who can come in and who can't, along with who must go and who can stay. We are a country of equality and privilege, but we can't seem to get off our high horse and accept that we need the diverse population we have today.

Exploring New England

John Gruenenfelder

Regrettably, I was unable to go back home this summer. I ended up being stuck in Massachusetts the whole time. Of course, not going home meant no monsoon and freakishly high temperatures. Staying in Amherst meant, well, freakishly high temperatures. I guess that was unavoidable this summer.

Still, sticking around did have its advantages. Did you know that Amherst becomes an actual ghost town in the summer? It's true. No people and boarded up shops. The extreme heat even brought with it a few random tumbleweeds. Perhaps it wasn't quite that desolate, but it was nice to be able to easily get a table at any restaurant in town.

For part of the summer I was fortunate enough to have the use of my neighbor's car while she was lucky enough to go back home. This let me travel to places further than it would be wise to go on my scooter.

I visited Hartford and was, well, not so impressed. In fact, the lasting memory I have of my trips to Hartford is traffic, lots and lots of traffic, even at times of the day when you wouldn't normally expect it.

The areas around Hartford, however, were significantly more pleasant and wooded. Navigating my way back north without using the interstate did prove to be rather more challenging than I had expected. This trouble was mostly due to the fact that most of the roads in the area radiate outwards from downtown Hartford.

What seems to be an east-west road is in reality just a spoke leading back to the city. I suppose people from the Northeast are used to this, but it is in stark contrast to the grid-like city development I'm used to from the western parts of the country.

I also traveled to Boston on a couple of occasions. The first time I wisely rode the bus to South Station and then proceeded to take subways and buses to my destination. That trip was actually very nice.

The second trip to Boston was decidedly less pleasant. My destination was Boston Medical Center, which has attached parking that is very cheap by Boston standards (if you're a patient), so I drove. Fortunately, the Big Dig had decided to begin spontaneously dismantling itself just prior to my arrival. This made the traffic even worse than it usually is, but eventually, I made it into town.

Did Boston's warranty just expire? The whole city seems to be falling apart.

Then, "pop," and you're back at ground level and completely disoriented as to which direction you might be facing. Even though the hospital was actually quite close to the exit of the tunnel, my circuitous route was at least five times longer than it needed to be. Later, having double-checked a map, the trip out of Boston was far more direct, though the evening traffic wasn't so fun.

Fortune did smile on me that evening. I had passed through the epicenter of a water main breach and had missed the event by a matter of only five minutes. Did Boston's warranty just expire? The whole city seems to be falling apart.

The flood did make for interesting viewing that night on the local news. I passed the time by watching firemen aimlessly pass their time by watching a repair crew try to plug the street geyser.

Driving back to Amherst the next day was certainly the most enjoyable part of the trip. Rather than taking the interstate back, I opted to take Route 9, which nicely leads straight back to Amherst. I guess straight back isn't the most accurate description. The trip was far longer, but it did offer many fine views of rural Massachusetts, as well as some less than stellar views of the poor condition of much of Route 9. In particular, the forests surrounding the Quabbin Reservoir are very picturesque. Even downtown Worcester is rather nice at dusk.

I've only been in Massachusetts for a year now, and I've only seen a small portion of the state, mostly right around Amherst. Trips like these are a lot of fun, especially when every road is new to you. With gas prices like they are, though, this probably isn't a pastime you want to engage in with any frequency.

All in all, my summer in Amherst was quite enjoyable, and with school back in session I'm certainly going to miss the peace and quiet. My summer trips also taught me an important lesson: Never drive into Boston, especially if you're not from around here. It will only end badly. Of course, if the self-destruction of Boston continues at its current pace, it won't even be possible to drive into the city anymore. Somebody should probably look into that.

Man Man delivers energetic show

Musical chaos incites moshing and applause

By Alex Hornbeck
Collegian Staff

It's safe to say that the average music listener would be put off by Man Man's live show. This isn't a statement of pretension; not everybody enjoys five grown men singing demented sea shanties in unison, spoons being banked into metal bowls, and squealing saxophones and party horns.

Most of the crowd at Wednesday's show in Northampton knew exactly what they were in for, though, and everyone, from the moshing high schoolers to the motionless college-aged hipsters, seemed to get into it.

When the "Can Kickers" took the stage promptly at 8:30, Pearl Street's clubroom was only about a tenth of the way full. The group launched straight into their set, a combination of old-time folk tunes and an energetic, almost punk aesthetic. No doubt in a smaller setting, the entirely danceable set would have gotten every body moving instantaneously. Instead, the crowd was entirely too timid to jump in, save one young man who skipped and shimmied his way through the audience from the get-go.

"We say Pearl, you say Street," singer Daniel Spurr hollered into the audience a few songs into the set. The crowd did as commanded, responding with gusto, but resisting physical motion. The band soon ventured onto the floor for a song, drummer Doug Schaefer breaking out the washboard, which garnered floor stomps and hand claps as some life seemed to be being breathed into the crowd.

As the "Can Kickers" continued, kazoos and harmonicas were brought out to compliment Spurr's banjo and Daniel Thompson's fiddle. The crowd grew as the set went on, and by the end of the Kickers' spirited performance, a sizeable crowd had begun to dance, some violently moshing in front of the stage, some timidly shaking their hips to the side. Both were welcome; Schaefer's drumming was unmistakably punk and his dramatic eye rolls and head banging welcomed chaos, while the fiddling invited a more refined dance. The group finished off their portion of the night with a rendition of the traditional song "Black Jack Davey" (covered in recent times by both Bob Dylan and The White Stripes).

On Wednesday night Pearl Street featured the dynamic group of musicians, Man Man, who were preceded by the band Can Kickers.

Man Man band is known for their eccentric live performances, which are energetic and full of surprises that never fail to get the crowd going.

After a quick set change, "Coyote" arrived on stage. The four-piece from Philadelphia busted out epic rock song after epic rock song. The group is unquestionably talented, but it seemed as if the same equation went into creating each song. The intense, steady drumbeats and controlled guitar freak outs were impressive for the first few songs, but quickly became monotonous.

The beats were just a little too slow to dance to, and the crowd, which had finally gotten around to moving during the "Can Kickers's" set, spent most of "Coyote's" performance simply nodding their heads to the rhythm and looking bored.

The "Headliners" finally took the stage at about 10:30 after an extensive set-up. The stage defined cluttered, as musical instruments as well as numerous odds and ends covered most available surfaces. Saxophones, a sousaphone, several keyboards, a bass guitar, melodicas, a xylophone, feathers, plastic birds, an oversized toy apple, and a string of eyeball Christmas lights are just some of the items that adorned the stage.

"Man Man", adorned in all-white clothing with streaks of white paint on their faces, started off the show with "Feathers," the first track off their newest album, "Six Demon Bag." Accompanied sparsely by only a Rhodes organ, all five members sang the song in unison, creating a playfully spooky atmosphere that set the stage for the rest of the night.

Jumping through material from their two albums, there was never more than a three second break between songs, if any at all. The energy level was kept at a constant high. Even during slower numbers, all eyes were on stage, waiting to see where the group would go next.

The band had the crowd in the palms of their hands through the whole performance. "Man Man's" show is equally about theatricality as it is about music. That's not to say that the music suffers as a result; all the members are quite talented, not only on one instrument, but on several, and sometimes at the same time (two saxophones at once, anyone?). The entire group emotes more in one song than many bands manage to in an entire show. Jumping from screaming lyrics at the audience to whispering them sweetly into the microphone, any range of emotion present on their faces, "Man Man" created a decidedly unfried freak show of musical styles and ideas. It wouldn't be a stretch of the imagination to picture the band tackling the soundtrack to a theatre production (a la Tom Waits' work on "Franks Wild Years").

The performance was punctuated by lead singer Honus Honus' antics, from hurling a number of spoons into a bowl, to donning a coonskin cap and conducting the other members of the band, to squeezing several squeaky stuffed animals to add to the overall musical effect. During the group's magnificent finale of "Ice Dogs," he put on a sparkling black shirt and serenaded the audience, even singing a few verses while crowd surfing.

All in all, it was a highly successful night. Any reservation the audience may have had during the opening bands was obliterated by "Man Man's" performance and, by the end of the night, everyone was thoroughly satisfied. The band further reinforced themselves as one of the top acts performing today, and their highly unique brand of entertainment took the audience by storm.

A decade after murder, Tupac Shakur's legacy still keeps us riveted

Tupac Shakur, born Parish Lesane Crooks, is known for the political, economic and racial equality messages that are present in his art.

Known by many as 2Pac or Makaveli, Shakur's legacy places him as one of the best acclaimed rappers.

By Cary Darling
Sr. Collegian Newspapers

It was ten years ago on Sept. 13th that rapper and actor Tupac Amaru Shakur passed away. Six days earlier, he had been ambushed on the crowded, neon-lit boulevards of Las Vegas. In town for the Mike Tyson-Bruce Seldon fight, he was gunned down while part of a 15-car caravan snaking its way down the strip. He had reached the ripe old age of 25.

Much of America heaved a sigh of relief. To them, the man with "thug life" emblazoned across his stomach, the man who in 1993 was charged with (but not convicted of) shooting two off-duty Atlanta cops and the next year was put away for sexual assault, the man who seemed to make a career out of wallowing in the spilled blood of senseless violence, deserved what he got. Live by the gat, die by the gat, and all that.

A decade later, his murder remains unsolved, and this is one stone-cold case that's not likely to make it to "Primetime". Yet, for all his tough talk and sad end, Tupac was not just another inner-city kid with a troubled life and even more troubling death.

If his criminality was despicable, his ability to turn his life and struggles into brutal, bittersweet poetry, make Shakur a complex and fascinating figure. When he was at his best, there was an intelligence and sensitivity beneath the braggadocio that made him stand head, shoulders and tattoo above his rap contemporaries. At his worst, he was just another gangsta, allying himself with Death Row Records head Suge Knight, contributing to the wasteful East Coast/West Coast rap feud and making bank peddling the image of black-on-black violence. Being an African-American man myself, this may have been the most disturbing element to me.

Yet even his most ardent admirers admit to straying onto this field of warring emotions. "Tupac Shakur finally died on Sept. 13, 1996, but death had been twitching in his ear for a long time," writes Danyel Smith in the bestselling "Vibe" magazine compilation of essays about the rapper, "Tupac Shakur." "Shakur was rushed through boyhood only to enter a longish, violent adolescence that ended with bullets dancing through his body . . . Shakur was a self-proclaimed thug. A macho tantrum thrower embarrassed by the limp of his thoughtfulness. He loved to act but was ashamed of his talent. Back when I knew him, conversations with Tupac often ended with the other person convincing him of his own humanity."

It's this duality, and Shakur's often artful way of expressing it, that make him one of the most magnetic and tragic pop-culture personalities. Even though it's been a decade since his death, the number of books – with titles such as "Jesus and the Hip-Hop Prophets: Spiritual Insights From Lauryn Hill and Tupac Shakur" "Tough Love: Cultural Criticism & Familial Observations on the Life and Death of Tupac Shakur;" and the recent "Notorious C.O.P.: The Inside Story of the Tupac, Biggie, and Jam Master Jay Investigations From the NYPD's First Hip-Hop Cop" – continue to roll off the presses. His poetry has even found its way between hard covers in "The Rose That Grew From Concrete."

Meanwhile, documentaries such as "Tupac Resurrection" and "Biggie and Tupac" have been made about him, and more albums have come out after his death than before. Colleges from the University of Washington to Harvard have offered courses on his lyrics and impact. Some even claim that, as in the legend of writer Niccolo Machiavelli, whom the rapper supposedly admired, Shakur faked his own death, partly because he wanted to transcend hip-hop's expectations.

One theory holds that he is alive and well in Cuba. Watch out, Fidel.

In the latest issue of the culture magazine "Urb," an alternative universe is envisioned where Shakur has moved into politics and become the mayor of Oakland.

Elliot Wilson, editor of the music magazine "XXL," was quoted on 2Pac2K.de, a comprehensive German site devoted to all things Tupac, as saying, "If Tupac had a Graceland, there would be people camping outside his house right now."

What makes Shakur so important is not that he had a lot of hits, though, with the likes of "California Love" and "How Do U Want It," he certainly did. In 2002, "Forbes" listed him as the eighth-richest deceased celebrity, having raked in $7 million in 2001. But it was his ability to put on disc the conflicted feelings of many young, poor, alienated black men in America that gave him his strength.

The son of Black Panther parents Billy Garland and Afeni Shakur, he was born in 1971 as Lesane Parish Crooks, but was soon given the name with which he would become famous. Tupac Amaru was an Incan leader killed by the Spanish whose name meant "shining serpent." "Shakur" is Arabic for "thankful to God."

He grew up in New York City somewhat poor and politically radicalized. But he found

The Mercy House Church goes hardcore

An evening of rock and thrash

By Dylan Gottlieb
Collegian Correspondent

The school year started off with an edge at the Mercy House on North Pleasant Street, which hosted an evening of local hardcore and metal bands last Saturday night. The event turned out a crowd that was surprisingly large for a show on the first weekend of school.

"Revocation," a three-piece metal band, started the night with a straightforward thrash metal set. Bringing to mind some older bands such as "Nuclear Assault", "Kreator", "Sodom", or "Dark Angel" just to name a few — they had a very eighties sound.

Following "Revocation" was a more modern edge: "Imprint," a local hardcore outfit playing young, energetic, and melodic punk. Their songs were more on the longer side, focusing more on build-ups and having that almost "epic" feel. The band played on stage while the singer took to the floor.

"Deathamphetamine" play a very technical style of metal with influences drawing from bands such as "Death," and even "Judas Priest." They have tons of sick leads, change ups, and ridiculous drumming to keep you plenty entertained.

Bringing along a more "combined" sound, as well as an obvious group of friends, were Worcester residents, "Eva Braun." The band had a very put-together sound to them. It sounded like they knew exactly what they were going for from the start, and played their set quite well. "Eva Braun" played with a style combining elements of punk, hardcore, metal, and even had an "emo" sort of feel. Songs were slightly technical and nicely varied. They got the crowd moving for a bit until everyone seemed to get uptight again. Who knows why, or from what — maybe it's just a Western Mass thing. But needless to say, the level of energy and sincerity coming from this band was up there.

Next to last, were UMass alumni and local thrashers, "Wasteland." It was different seeing them as a four-piece set rather than their former five. Although the band was minus one member, it didn't seem to effect their playing, or their intensity. "Wasteland" play heavy, loud, and epic-sounding punk. With a release out on the well-known and local record label, Clean Plate Records, it is clear the band has put some serious time and dedication into what they have done so far. They played a selection of both old and new songs, including one which they hope to record for a full-length album. The crowd was very receptive, even though only a few kids really got into the music during an obvious breakdown part to a certain song. Nonetheless, "Wasteland" played a solid set and sounded great.

Headlining the show were more UMass alumni, the band "Deathamphetamine." Many of you have probably bought a cup of coffee from singer, Ben Hunsdorfer, at the Peoples Market, or maybe a unique hand-made glass piece in the Campus Center from drummer Christian Gazmuri. Maybe you've even had a bike fixed at the Student Union Bike Co-Op by bass player Marcus Frattura. Nonetheless, the band is starting to get some recognition, and is expecting a split-release some time in the near future with Richmond, VA based grind band, Argento Agenda.

"Deathamphetamine" play a very technical style of metal with influences drawing from bands such as "Death," and even "Judas Priest." They have tons of sick leads, change ups, and ridiculous drumming to keep you plenty entertained. The crowd was extremely into this band — there was so much head banging and horns being thrown left and right, the Mercy House could barely handle it. It can't be stressed enough how great it is to see this band play. Even if metal isn't your "thing," this band in particular is incredibly talented, and deserve all the support they can get.

Overall, the show seemed to be a huge success, which was refreshing to see at this type of event. Hopefully the show foreshadows a positive future with more music to come. Hangouts even followed the show in the lobby, which showed the casual atmosphere of the night. Mercy House shows might be something to keep in mind for those of you who are new to this school or area, and are looking to meet new people or like-minded individuals. Flyers are usually posted around campus for these types of things, so keep your eyes peeled. The people who book these shows have good taste, good heads on their shoulders, and can help almost anybody with satisfying their live musical needs. Please try and support local bands and venues stop by the Mercy House's next event.

With an international presence, CNN is a top stop for tourists

By JOHN BORDSEN
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

A huge red CNN logo-sign outside the main door makes it clear whose show this is, and once inside, through the light security check and into the expansive 13-story atrium, the vibe of Western techno-capitalism is everywhere. This is the creation of mogul Ted Turner and the all-news cable station. It's jammed with tourists.

The ground floor is a mall-style court ringed with eighteen or so fast-food eateries and several mall-style stores. (Hungry? Eat here and now: The few restaurants elsewhere near Centennial Olympic Park are costlier sit-downs.) There's one huge TV monitor to watch. CNN, of course.

Check the floor: the tiles form a map of the world. Starbucks is parked on Siberia.

The big eye-grabber is the 48-foot canvas globe on the second floor — and the escalator that runs from the court floor right into it (you enter through South America). This is where the tour gets under way. CNN says the 80-or-so foot escalator is the world's longest free-stander, supported only at its ends.

Head to the Inside CNN ticket booth at the escalator's bottom. Once through the globe, you'll use stairs. (Elevator-assisted tours are offered.)

Reservations are recommended for the 55-minute tours, but I just walked up to the ticket kiosk 10 minutes ahead.

On the tour you'll get a behind-the-scene look that's similar to most TV tours. You'll learn why meteorologists vaguely wave at maps and other graphics (they're actually gesturing at a blank wall while looking at themselves on a monitor that superimposes the visuals); you'll learn about Tele-Prompters (monitors with scrolling news text, which broadcasters recite) and why on-airs nonetheless have scripts on their desks and flip pages anyway (in the event the Tele-prompter malfunctions).

What sets the CNN tour apart from affiliate tours is the ever-present 24-7 global buzz. The tour's Control Room Theater simulates the command booth where split-second timing decides which flickering image will go out next to perhaps a half-million viewers. You see all the choices at once — the ready-to-roll news segments, the on-air personality waiting quietly for the next cue, the satellite-fed reporter in the field, perhaps waiting for his or her live segment, the next ad.

Regardless of where the segment originates, places other than Atlanta, mostly, this is the building where it all comes together.

No, you don't visit the actual main control room.

The buzz is ratcheted by the security check where the tour begins (it's more thorough than what you had upon entering the building), the armed guards stationed in stairwells and other unexpected places, and the occasional display (Gulf War suit).

Easily, the high point is the few minutes spent in the gallery overlooking the five CNN newsroom floor/studio in the bowels of the complex. The gallery is long, narrow and dark, with a chest-high ribbon of thick, bunker-like windows. You look down at the newsroom as though peering in at a media terrarium.

The guide explains who's who and what's what. And in the distance is the backside of a.m. newscaster Daryn Kagan, business-attired from the desktop up, but — something viewers at home don't see — sitting cross-legged and shoeless in her chair in casual slacks.

Anyhow, this is live.

Viewed from the gallery, the newsroom isn't much different from what you'd see in a newspaper building. It's an office, where scripts are written and edited and facts are checked. Not a lot of electronic wizardry. Desktops are disturbingly free of paper piles, mounds of books, curios and half-eaten lunches.

Farther along the tour, a similar peek-in at the Headline News operation has less of a "Stepford" look — it's comfortably messed. There, you're above and behind the control booth, facing the on-airs. Directly in front of you, a kind of train on a track shuttles a camera around the ceiling; at home, you see what it sees during real-time moments of dead-air.

Spice up disease-fighting ability; some seasonings carry loads of antioxidants that improve health

By KERRY NEVILLE
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

A tasty way to improve your health may be as near as your spice rack. Besides adding signature flavor and color to dishes, certain herbs and spices are chock-full of beneficial compounds that may help protect against cancer, heart disease, diabetes and even Alzheimer's.

A study by the U.S. Department of Agriculture found that ounce for ounce, some herbs and spices have more antioxidant activity than many fruits and vegetables. Antioxidants fight harmful free radicals in your body that might otherwise damage cells, potentially leading to disease.

Although the research is promising, adding herbs and spices to your foods isn't a magical cure-all. Most of the findings to date are based on lab and animal studies, not human trials, so the results are suggestive, not the definitive word. And many of the studies use amounts higher than you might normally shake on your foods and/or use the spices and herbs in pill forms instead.

Nonetheless, herbs and spices add great flavor — all without adding sugar, salt or fat — so potentially better health is even more reason to sprinkle them on.

Here's the current research on the beneficial properties of some herbs and spices, along with tips from Jackie Newgent, registered dietitian and culinary instructor at The Institute of Culinary Education in New York, on flavorful ways to add these ingredients to your diet.

Cinnamon: Of all the spices, cinnamon is one of the richest sources of antioxidants. Research on its health benefits has been building over the years, demonstrating cinnamon's very promising role in protecting against several diseases and conditions.

Previous studies that have tested cinnamon on people with type 2 diabetes have found that as little as 1 teaspoon of cinnamon a day can help lower the risk of the constellation of factors associated with metabolic syndrome — high blood cholesterol, triglyceride and glucose levels — by as much as 10 to 30 percent. Having metabolic syndrome puts you at increased risk for type 2 diabetes and heart disease.

A recent lab study by Richard Anderson, a scientist with the USDA in Beltsville, Md., helps explain some of the mechanisms behind cinnamon's insulin-like effects. He found that the antioxidants in cinnamon increase the amounts of three key proteins that are important in insulin signaling, glucose transport and inflammatory response.

Cinnamon has also been studied for other benefits, including its anti-microbial and anti-bacterial properties.

Other research has focused on cinnamon's role in improving cognitive function. Previous studies have shown that just smelling cinnamon can boost performance and alertness, stimulating the brain and cutting fatigue. One study found cinnamon improved scores on tasks such as memory, recognition, visual-motor speed and coordination and attention. More recent findings from researchers at Wheeling Jesuit University in West Virginia found that cinnamon's scent helped decrease frustration and increase alertness while driving.

Oregano, cinnamon and ginger are among some disease-fighting spices.

Tasty tip: Simmer rice with a cinnamon stick for Middle Eastern flair, sprinkle cinnamon into chili as a Cincinnati-style secret ingredient or add a teaspoon into your coffee grinder with the beans for an aromatic wake-up.

Ginger: Used for centuries for its medicinal properties, ginger is best known for helping to soothe the nausea of motion and morning sickness. Research shows ginger is also a powerful antioxidant. The active compound in ginger is gingerol, shown in studies to inhibit cancer growth in animals. It also acts as an anti-inflammatory so it may be useful in fighting a range of diseases from heart disease to arthritis and Alzheimer's.

Tasty tip: Stir grated fresh or ground ginger into low-fat mayonnaise and use as a condiment with grilled chicken.

Oregano: An antioxidant powerhouse, fresh oregano, on a per gram basis, has 42 times more antioxidant activity than an apple, 12 times more than an orange and 4 times more than blueberries. Of all the herbs studied, three different types of oregano — Mexican, Italian and Greek Mountain — scored highest in antioxidant activity, a USDA study showed. Other herbs that pack an antioxidant punch include coriander, bay leaf, dill, rosemary and savory.

Tasty tip: Stir finely chopped fresh oregano into couscous or simmer it in store-bought pasta sauce for a semi-homemade touch.

Some new research suggests that adding unique spices to your food may enrich your health.

Indie film is a 'haven' for up and coming Bloom

What's in store next for the British boy?

By HANH NGUYEN
ZAP2IT.COM

LOS ANGELES — While Orlando Bloom's good looks have helped rather than hindered his career, the "Lord of the Rings" and "Pirates of the Caribbean" star is more than okay with undergoing facial scarring as part of the job on "Haven," an independent film he stars in and produces.

"I wanted to lose an eye," the British actor said. "I wasn't allowed and I should have been because I'm the producer, right? Actually, you know why I didn't? Because there wasn't enough time. The makeup girl did . . . an incredible job of doing that scar, which I thought was really effective. But to lose an eye and everything else, it would have taken too long."

In the film, Bloom's character, Shy, is a carefree young fisherman in the Cayman Islands who finally makes love to his girlfriend Andrea (Zoe Saldana). Her affluent family, however, is extremely protective, and her brother Hammer (Anthony Mackie) retaliates by flinging a corrosive chemical in Shy's face, burning the skin surrounding his left eye.

Shy becomes moody and reclusive, only communicating with Andrea by phone, while she deals with his abandonment and her family's disapproval by doing drugs and engaging in meaningless sex with a revolving door of partners.

"There's a line where she says, 'Have you ever been in love?' to this therapist," said Bloom, "and you feel the pain in that moment of this young girl who is just heartbroken. When you're young and you're in love and it doesn't work out, it hurts. It feels like it's life-threatening pain.

"The purity of their connection is one that is sort of tainted by the opinion of the world outside —the father, the brother, everyone having an opinion about it and not being good with it. And it's what ultimately destroys it. So, this love was crushed. The fallout of that is a kid gets disfigured, she disfigures herself from the inside really, and rejects it all."

In a parallel plot line, corrupt businessman Carl Ridley (Bill Paxton) is on the run with teenage daughter Pippa (Agnes Bruckner) in tow and hides out in his Cayman Islands bungalow. She befriends native Caymanian Fritz (Victor Rasuk), whose life becomes intertwined with the Ridleys when a desperate need for cash leads him to make a move on Carl's stash.

"Some people have said it's a bit too hardcore and raw for teenage audiences," said Bloom, "and I go 'You know what? It deals with the issues of teenage life, of growing up in this culture.' You go on holiday to the Caribbean islands and you see one side of it. You're there to relax by the pool, get your drink served. You go to the beach or to the bar. You don't really understand what the underbelly of that island is like. In this movie you get to see that. The Cayman Islands is a relatively peaceful environment, a safe environment in fact, but it happens everywhere. It's real life."

Although Bloom learned that he needed dexterity in order to scale fish for his role, he found other aspects about his character easier to grasp.

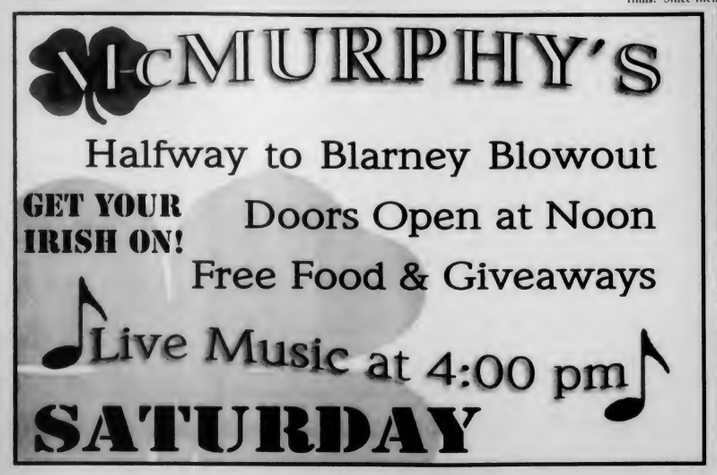
"I grew up like any other kid trying to find my place in the world and wanting to make a mark and have been confronted by other kids, or the jealousies," he said.

Bloom enjoyed his first taste as a producer on the film as well, beginning when he met the young writer-director Frank E. Flowers, who rewrote the character, Shy, specifically for the Hollywood star.

"I'd love to. In a way I feel like I've been so fortunate at such a young age to be a part of so many fantastically huge movies," Bloom said. "But anyone at my age being a part of those movies can only really be a passenger. You know what I mean? You hitch your ride onto the end of the roller coaster and you're whip-lashed all over the back of it. And being part of this production, I really felt for the first time that I was in control.

"Now, I actually want to take a breath and make choices that I feel really good about and come back to what it was that excited me in the first place. Making movies like 'Haven' with Zoe and this great cast and getting to be a family on it was wonderful. I really want to get into the driver's seat. I'm turning 30 and I want to do that, whether they fly or flail or flail or whatever they do, I want to enjoy them. I'd like to continue to do that whilst hopefully making other movies as well."

Bloom became famous after his role as "Legolas" in "The Lord of the Rings" films. Since then he has enjoyed the spotlight as a Hollywood heart-throb.



Film fest or global seminar? Tough questions asked as thousands invade Toronto

By MICHAEL PHILLIPS
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

TORONTO — It's like the joke about the guy who went to a fight and a hockey game broke out. This week thousands of people invaded downtown Toronto for a 10-day colloquy on the meaning of the words "terrorism" and "freedom fighters"; the ripple effects of the American-led occupation of Iraq; and a dizzying global perspective on what that occupation hath wrought.

They came for a seminar, and a film festival broke out.

This is one way to assess the 31st running of the Toronto International Film Festival, continuing through Sunday. To be sure, the premier North American festival offers its annual gaggle of movie stars shilling for Hollywood studio products seeking a warm reception and a little awards-season buzz.

Some of these films are good, such as "Stranger Than Fiction," starring Will Ferrell, Maggie Gyllenhaal, Emma Thompson and Dustin Hoffman, which happens to be opening the Chicago International Film Festival next month. Others are not, such as the stultifying new version of "All the King's Men," in which Jude Law delivers so much of the screenplay in affect-less voice-over, it's like watching a rough cut while someone's Robert Penn Warren audio-book drones on in the background.

The early days of this year's festival revealed an outer circle of filmmakers trying to grapple with the world as we know it, in all its instability. In the five years since the Sept. 11 attacks, directors and screenwriters have begun to formulate responses to the attacks and America's response to those attacks. Even better, some of them are making movies worth seeing.

All of 54 minutes long, the terrific little documentary "The Prisoner or: How I Planned to Kill Tony Blair" is a classic festival find, one all too easily missed in a 352-film, 61-country roster. The movie comes from the "Gunner Palace" team of Michael Tucker and Petra Epperlein. In it freelance Iraqi journalist Yunis Khatayer Abbas relays the story of his recent arrest (caught on camera in "Gunner Palace") and subsequent imprisonment for plotting to kill the British prime minister.

The charges against the man were worthless: Months after his imprisonment, Abbas received his freedom and a simple "sorry" from a U.S. commander. The experience is re-created in witty graphic-novel images that enhance the tragicomedy-of-errors chronicle rather than cheapening it.

"The Prisoner" isn't the only festival film with a title alluding to the assassination of world leaders. One of the hottest tickets this weekend, "Death of a President," reportedly unfolds as a "Frontline"-style documentary made after the imagined 2007 Chicago assassination of President Bush.

Tickets for Sunday night's North American premiere of the British mock-doc (check the Tribune online edition Monday for an early report) proved as scarce as hen's teeth.

The festival's other hot ticket was the midnight Friday screening of "Borat," also a mockumentary, in which the "Ali G" star Sacha Baron Cohen took his character of clueless pansexual Kazakhstan TV personality on a tour of America.

"Borat" is an often riotous comedy, generous in its multidirectional offensiveness, and it is worth seeing just for the nude wrestling match between Borat and his manager (Ken Davitian), all over a Dallas hotel during a convention of mortgage brokers.

Like many other Toronto festival films this year, "Borat" will surely confirm America's international image as a haven of gun-crazy xenophobic paranoids. But at least it's funny about it.

A gentler comic mockumentary, "For Your Consideration," comes from the sterling "Mighty Wind" and "Best in Show" ensemble led by director Christopher Guest.

The picture pokes fun at the notion of Oscar fever, as the actors featured in a low-budget indie "Home for Purim," starring veteran performers played by Catherine O'Hara and Harry Shearer, improbably get fingered as Oscar nominees in the making. The best jokes in the film are directed not at the show business folk, but the slavish, whorish media covering them. With Fred Willard and Jane Lynch having a ball as co-hosts of an "Entertainment Tonight"-type series, this comedy transcends its own unevenness.

The Guest film served as a nice chaser after a weekend loaded with high earnestness. "Catch a Fire," Phillip Noyce's stolid account of African National Congress militant Patrick Chamusso, delved into the morally reprehensible world of apartheid-era South Africa.

Much like Ken Loach's birth-of-the-Irish Republican Army film, "The Wind That Shakes the Barley," the top prize winner this year at Cannes and another Toronto offering, Noyce's film had a good story to tell, though its moral dilemmas were more or less non-existent. (Nutshell: Oppression is bad.)

Similarly, the German film "The Lives of Others," about an East German Stasi surveillance expert and the playwright he shadows, amount to a depiction of brutal repression, well-acted but very tidy and schematic in its themes. In other words, it's a likely foreign-language Oscar nominee come early 2007.

The best thing I've seen so far is the film I loved the most at Cannes this spring: "Climates," from the Turkish writer, director and actor Nuri Bilge Ceylan.

Even though the Toronto slate is dominated by films asking tough geopolitical questions, Ceylan's film strikes me as the bravest and most arresting of the batch so far.

It is pure "relationship cinema" from one perspective, yet so honest and unflinching and delicately brutal, it transcends its particular time and setting. Not all wars are geopolitical, the film asserts. And love breeds more than one kind of terrorism.

Tupac lives on in memory

As years pass on, so does his legacy grow

joy in Harlem's 127th Street Ensemble acting troupe and later at the Baltimore School of Arts, where he discovered a whole new world of violin and van Gogh.

"That was the first time I saw there was white people who you could get along with," he told "Vibe" in 1994. "Before that, I just believed what everybody else said: They was devils. But I loved it . . . I was starting to feel like I really wanted to be an artist."

When his family moved to Marin City, Calif., outside San Francisco, things changed. "Leaving that school affected me so much," he continues in his "Vibe" interview. "Even now, I see that as the point where I got off track."

It was in California that he really started living the street life — selling dope and running with a rough crowd. But it's also where he eventually became a minor player with Digital Underground, the good-time Bay Area hip-hop crew who hit with "Doowutchyalike" and "Kiss You Back", in the early '90s. Their success soon faded, but he used it as a launch pad for his solo career.

Unlike Digital Underground, Tupac, who recorded under the name 2Pac, had heavier things in mind. While his first two albums, "2Pacalypse Now" (1991) and "Strictly 4 My N.I.G.G.A.Z" (1993), are rather muddled, tentative and indebted to the sound of New York outfit Public Enemy and L.A. rapper Ice Cube, it's clear where he wants to go. Tracks such as "Soulja's Story", "Keep Ya Head Up" and the poignant "Brenda's Got a Baby," a portrait of a 12-year-old single mom, and 2Pac's first hit, showed off a gift for heartfelt storytelling.

His life cascaded into a personal hell in the mid-'90s, when he was charged with the Atlanta shootings, convicted of sexual assault and shot five times in an attack at a New York City recording studio. The album that emerged from those experiences, 1995's bestselling "Me Against the World," is arguably his best. Listening to it is like paging through the diary of a man gripped by his own contradictions. The songs "If I Die 2Nite, So Many Tears, Dear Mama" "Death Around the Corner" and "Lord Knows"—in which he intones "I'm hopeless, they should've killed me as a baby, now they got me trapped in a storm, I'm goin' crazy, forgive me"—explode with doubts and fears not generally associated with someone labeled a gangsta rapper.

Throughout his music career, he was also screen acting, but unlike other rappers who ventured to Hollywood, Shakur wasn't just content to play a version of himself. Although he portrayed a violent high-school student in his first movie, the urban drama "Juice" (1991), he played opposite Tim Roth and Thandie Newton, as a guy who spends a very tough day trying to get into a drug rehab program, in the smartly written and underrated dark comedy "Gridlock'd" (1997).

If Shakur had lived, it would have been exciting to see how far he could have pushed himself. But as his final album, the two-disc "All Eyez on Me" (1996) proves, he never could or maybe never wanted to shake the extreme elements of street life.

The saddest part of his death is the demise of what might have been. Tupac killed off his future because he couldn't shake his connection to the past. Gangster party, indeed.

The "Guiness Book of World Records" listed Shakur as the best selling rap/hip-hop artist ever after he sold over 73 million albums worldwide.

son. If we come out ready to play and focused, we'll get the results we want this weekend."

"That's the game we have to worry about first," Koch said about today's game against Hartford. "We'll worry about Vermont on Sunday."

How much they will have to worry is the question. Vermont is coming off a 4-3 loss to No. 23 Central Connecticut, and is using a goaltender-by-committee, so to speak.

The Catamounts' Roger Scully is 1-1-2 in four starts this season. He has allowed two goals and has made 27 saves while boasting a 0.45 goals-against average. The Minutemen will most likely see him between the pipes this weekend.

Junior forward Tyler Hasman is Vermont's leading scorer with six points (two goals, two assists).

"Vermont is a hard-working team," Koch said. "They're a team that is going to pressure you, they'll try to out-run you, and they'll battle you all over the field."

UMass plans on taking it one game at a time. The fact that this weekend's opponents have allowed a combined 16 goals will not play a factor in Koch's offensive scheme.

"We have to attack their weaknesses," Koch said. "We're not really worried about their stats, as far as [goals-against average] goes."

The Minutemen don't know what letting up 16 goals feels like. Their stellar defense has only let up one goal all season. Other than the score from Boston University's Petur Sigurdsson in the second game of the year, sophomore Zack Simmons and the UMass defense have kept their opponents in check.

"This is a great group of guys," Cook said about what is so special about this team. "Everyone is a team player. Everyone knows their roles on the team. We all know exactly what coach wants us to do, so we've been getting good results."

Koch and UMass assistant coach Jon Davy stressed the importance of communication after Wednesday's strenuous practice. They told the players to stay focused because they have a target on them. Teams won't just be hungry for a win against the Minutemen. They now will be looking for the upset.

But if it can get the same defensive results as games past, the Maroon and White shouldn't have a problem coming out with two more wins.

"It's been a team effort," Cook said. "Zack [Simmons] has been cleaning up all the balls that get through. Defensively, we've been trying to communicate and keep everyone behind the ball. If we get 10 guys behind the ball, there's no way anyone can get through us."

Sophomore forward Prince Oluwi has one goal and two assists on the year. He had a goal and an assist in the season-opening win over Maine.

field for the Minutemen.

Koch pointed out that the true key to the team's success has been the ability of the upperclassmen to gel with the younger players and help develop them into key contributors.

"I think they get along with each other well," Koch said. "They're on a nice roll from the end of last season to where we are now. At the end of the [2005] season we played well, and we've continued playing well this year."

The Minutemen finished the 2005 campaign by going undefeated in their final six games (a record of 4-0-2) before losing the Rhode Island in the first round of the Atlantic 10 tournament. They have mirrored that success with the fast start this season.

"It's a combination of the older players welcoming the new ones, and making it so that there's no real transition [from one season to the next]," Koch said. "They've really tii together well, and I think that's what makes it a lot of fun."

One of the team's young stars, goalkeeper Zack Simmons, echoed his coach's comments.

"The only reason I've been able to [get the shutouts] is because of my defense," Simmons said. "They've been playing amazing all year."

In last Sunday's overtime thriller against St. Bonaventure, the team's ability to come together was evident. The backfield seemed to struggle on a few early possessions, but pulled it together quickly.

"We had a little communication issue in the first half," Simmons said. "We sorted that out and it was rock solid after that."

The redshirt sophomore – this week's A-10 Co-Player of the Week – has been in net for every minute of the Minutemen's season, earning all five shutouts. He has recorded a miniscule 0.16 goals-against average.

Simmons demonstrated the chemistry Koch spoke of, deferring the honor to his teammates.

"All ten guys on the field other than myself contribute to those shutouts, from the front-runners all the way to the back four," Simmons said. "I count on those guys, and I try to clean up the rest."

Walker and Patry continue to pace UMass

W. SOCCER from page 10

Freshman Sydney Stoll has played in all five games for the Minutewomen in 2006. She scored her first career goal against Boston University.

In addition to Walker and Patry, Rudy is complimentary of how his captains – senior defenders Stephanie Barrett and Nadia Villarroel – have performed in their new roles.

"Villarroel has set a standard through her enthusiasm and work ethic," Rudy said. "Barrett is hard as nails and attacks extremely well for a defensive player. Her fitness level is way up."

The Maroon and White will have to defend a unique and somewhat unfamiliar system against Yale than it is accustomed to.

"They use a 3-4-3 and pull a defender out from the back and use her to attack, Rudy said. "We have some familiarity with it during an exhibition against Northeastern as well as late in the game this season against Iona."

In discussing the matchup against Yale, Rudy discussed a few things he has his eye on.

"It will be a test of wills," Rudy said. "They're bigger, stronger, have some really fast kids up front, and are experienced. They have a Herman Trophy candidate, which is given to the top women's collegiate player in the country, in Huang. On paper Yale looks pretty good. It will be a test and a big, big game."

holes for running backs Laurence Maroney, Corey Dillon and Kevin Faulk to pile up 180 yards. Maroney led the way with 86 less than five months after being drafted in the first round out of Minnesota.

Their next obstacles are the defenders on the New York Jets in a road game Sunday. They won't have to keep John Abraham out of their backfield since he left for Atlanta as a free agent and was named NFC defensive player of the week for his play last Sunday against Carolina.

"He was a great defensive end. He created a lot of havoc for us off the edge," Jets linebacker Jonathan Vilma said. "We compensate by bringing a lot of our blitzes and bringing pressure from other areas because one guy is not going to make up for 11 sacks a year. We have to bring it from different ways and disguise and confuse the offense."

That may be easier since Jets head coach Eric Mangini is very familiar with New England where he was defensive coordinator last season.

Patriots linemen say they still must concentrate on what they have to do, but Light admits Mangini's presence could complicate matters.

"He's obviously very familiar with what we do," Light said, "and that's probably going to throw another wrinkle in the mix."

But the Patriots defensive line might have a big advantage over the Jets blockers. New York had rookies D'Brickashaw Ferguson at tackle and Nick Mangold at center on its offensive line that will face Pro Bowl end Richard Seymour and talented linemen Ty Warren, Jarvis Green and Vince Wilfork, Vilma's college teammate at Miami.

"It's a great challenge," Mangini said. "What these guys are learning is that each week the opponent is very different and the style is very different.

"What I like about these guys and, really, the whole rookie class, is the way that they approach things and the way that they study and the way that they take coaching."

Mangini is happy with both rookies and, in the 23-16 win over Tennessee, the Jets protected Chad Pennington well enough for him to throw for 319 yards and two touchdowns.

So maybe rookie linemen can help right away.

"We've played with rookie left tackles, rookie right tackles. A football player is a football player," Patriots coach Bill Belichick said. "It depends on the player. It depends on how he responds to those challenges. I think the Jets have plenty of talent on their offensive line. I don't think that's a problem."

The Patriots' offensive line cleared the way for 180 rushing yards last week. Corey Dillon accounted for 73 of those yards on 16 carries.

Freshman Bryan Hogan scored the gamewinning goal in UMass' 1-0 win over Siena last Friday. He is one of three Minutemen with two goals in 2006.

New-look Bruins open training camp

WILMINGTON, Mass. – Bruins coach Dave Lewis has a simple goal for his hockey team as he heads into his first season behind the Boston bench.

"Just be that team that's hard to play against," Lewis said on Thursday after he put his veterans through their first formal workout of training camp.

The Bruins, who missed the playoffs last season and haven't made it past the first round of the postseason since 1999, have a new management team in place as they try to re-establish themselves on the Boston sports scene.

Lewis and his staff are new, general manager Peter Chiarelli is new and longtime Bruins leader Harry Sinden has retired into a consultant's role to owner Jeremy Jacobs.

There also has been a big change on the roster, where free-agent signees Zdeno Chara and Marc Savard come in as big names in new shirts.

Management showed the players video clips Sunday night of Boston sports success in recent years – the Patriots and Red Sox. The Bruins haven't won the Stanley Cup since 1972 and this group is aiming on bringing the B's back to prominence.

It all starts with work ethic.

"It's pretty simple and I think we have to apply it," said center Patriee Bergeron. "To be hard to play against, you have to be physical, you have to get the puck back each and every time there's a battle in the corners or wherever it is. That's a mindset that we need to have during training camp and during the year."

Brad Boyes was thrilled to see almost the entire roster show up early, getting ready for a brief but brisk opening day.

I think the guys were excited to come in and see the new Bruins and new faces," said Boyes, a forward who had 26 goals and a team-high 43 assists for Boston last season.

The imposing Chara, who stands 6-9 and weighs 260 pounds, comes, with Chiarelli, from the Ottawa Senators and gives the Bruins a major presence on the backline. Chara signed a five-year, $37.5 million contract.

"The first thing you notice is his size," said Chiarelli, quick to add how talented Chara is and how much he will lead this team.

Chara, who had 16 goals and 27 assists last season for Ottawa, said he's comfortable taking a leadership role.

"For sure, that's one of the roles I have to fill in," he said. "I have to lead this team and have the responsibility to take charge, but, for sure, I think it's not just me, I think it's everybody else."

Chara, 29, was one of the leaders of the early workouts.

"I think it's important to be here early, to get some of the little things organized and not have everything at the same time on the first day of training camp," he said. "I think it's very important to come early, get to know the town, the players and just establish yourself – and you feel, probably, a little more comfortable."

Talking about the Boston sports video, Chara said, "It means a lot to us and I think for everybody in the town, especially the fans that there's a lot of history [here] and I think we all realize that we want to bring it back. We want to get back on the winning track and have the fans coming to the games and be excited to come to the games."

The Bruins, who open the regular season with a five-game road trip, begin preseason play Sunday in Lowell against New Jersey.

Steelers keep winning

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

Charlie Batch is proving that Ben Roethlisberger isn't indispensable to the Pittsburgh Steelers.

Batch improved to 3-0 with the Steelers in their 28-17 opening-night win over Miami, a game that demonstrated Pittsburgh could get hurt more without Joey Porter or Troy Polamalu than without its starting quarterback.

The Steelers go to Jacksonville on Monday night with Roethlisberger still a question mark after undergoing an appendectomy on Sept. 3. Coach Bill Cowher said he won't decide until the weekend whether the QB will return.

The Jaguars might not be the best opponent for Ben if he's not fully recovered.

They harassed Drew Bledsoe into three interceptions in their 24-17 win over Dallas last week, and if Roethlisberger doesn't have his usual mobility, they might do the same against the Steelers.

"The bottom line is making sure he's comfortable, he feels like he can protect himself and he's going out there not thinking about those things," Cowher said. "It's getting the medical clearance, dealing with going through the work load and seeing how his body responds to that."

This used to be a heated rivalry in the old AFC Central. Early in their history, the Jaguars were the main challenger to the Steelers. Last year, Jacksonville won in Pittsburgh in overtime with the now departed Tommy Maddox in for the injured Roethlisberger and Batch at No. 3.

In fact, the winning score was Rashean Mathis' return of an interception. Batch subsequently moved up to No. 2 and was a lot more effective than Maddox.

Despite Roethlisberger's status and Jacksonville's impressive showing against Dallas, the Steelers are favored by 1 1/2. The young receivers came though for the Jaguars last week: Reggie Williams and Matt Jones, both former first-round picks, had 11 catches between them.

But the Steelers have the knack for winning.

Undefeated, but unsatisfied

Minutemen look to extend winning streak this weekend

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

As the Massachusetts men's soccer team stretched after practice on Wednesday, you could tell by the coaching staff's loud tone that the Minutemen were anything but satisfied with their early-season success. Not yet at least.

UMass (5-0-1) looks to add to its four-game winning streak this weekend at Rudd Field. The Minutemen host Hartford (2-1-2) this afternoon, and Vermont (2-2-2) on Sunday. Both games are slated for a 2 p.m. start.

The NSCAA/Adidas poll ranked UMass No. 22 in the nation earlier this week. But as a more intensified stretching session showed, that number means absolutely nothing.

"We were a little bit sluggish coming out, and coach was getting all over us," junior captain Kenny Cook said after Wednesday's practice. "Coach strives for perfection, so if we're not there to play everyday, he's going to get all over us and let us hear it.

"I was a little surprised just because I feel like in past years we haven't gotten the recognition we deserve, 5-0-1 is the record you have to look at though."

That record will be tested this afternoon. The Minutemen match up against a Hartford team that has a player UMass coach Sam Koch once coveted.

Junior midfielder Gary Muir is tied for the team high in points with four (two goals) on the season.

"Muir is a solid player, who I say play in the junior college national finals," Koch said. "We actually wanted him. We were trying to recruit him. He's a good player, so we have to slow him down. We have to make sure he's a non-factor in the game. And if we do that, we're going to be in good shape."

The Hawks have yet to lose a game since they fell to No. 12 Duke in the first game of the year. Since then, they have gone 2-0-2.

UMass boasts a 5-0-2 record in its last seven games at home, but Hartford is no slouch on the road. The Hawks are 2-1-1 on the road this season after having played only one game at home in 2006.

Hartford has a strong center midfield and two big defenders. UMass will have to keep the ball away from them in the air, and attack the flanks if it wants to continue its domination at Rudd Field.

"We have to come to play," Cook said. "If you talk to a lot of the guys, Siena and St. Bonaventure weren't some of our best performances, as opposed to earlier games in the sea-

Defense and goaltending carry UMass in 2006

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

When your team has only allowed a single goal all season, you generally attribute your team's success to the defense and goalkeeping, which is what the Massachusetts men's soccer team credit for their early-season play.

The No. 22 Minutemen (5-0-1) have earned four consecutive shutouts and have broken into the national rankings.

This team certainly has not done it by wearing out the back of the net and running up the score. UMass has scored just one goal in four of its first six contests, and yet it remains undefeated.

The Minutemen are off to their best start since the 1971 season in which they held the same record. In fact, the only time UMass has come out stronger was in 1931 when they won all six of their regular season games.

For UMass coach Sam Koch, who began coaching the Minutemen in 1991, this is the best start he has had with a UMass squad. However, he is hesitant to compare this team to past teams he's coached, or give his players too much praise so early in the season.

"I'll be able to really answer that at the end of the year," Koch said. "I think every team is different. This team is probably one of the younger teams [I've coached], so it's probably one of the better younger teams I've had."

There are only two senior men wearing Maroon and White at Rudd Field this season, Jason Scudamore and Michael Donnelly, and neither one has started a game.

Moreover, only three juniors have seen playing time, although two of them anchor the defensive back-

Minutewomen hit the road

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team (4-1-0) takes its four-game winning streak to Reese Stadium in New Haven, Conn. against the Yale Bulldogs (1-2-1) at 7 p.m. on Friday.

It will be the battle of the Rudys as UMass coach Jim Rudy faces Yale and their coach Rudy Meredith. Strangely enough, both men are from Washington D.C. and Yale's captain, Christina Huang, went to the same high school as the Minutewomen's coach.

While the Minutewomen have won 10 of the 11 career meetings between the two schools, it was Yale who won their last encounter, 4-1, in 2004. The previous loss doesn't concern Rudy in the least bit.

"The loss in 2004 can be thrown out the window," he said. "They're a much different team this year just as we are. Yale is a better team now and we're better than we used to be. History doesn't mean anything.

"In that game we hit the post four times," Rudy added. "They had six shots and four of them went in. They had a funky system that we just couldn't handle. I'm looking at this game as our most recent litmus test of who we are and where we are."

Rudy will be looking for redshirt junior goalie Kristin Walker to continue her recent stellar play. Walker has recorded two straight shutouts in the past week against Albany and Hartford respectively, and has only allowed one goal in the last three contests to improve her goals against average to 0.80 on the season.

Walker had reconstructive surgery on her knee at the end of last season and the brace she has to wear has not slowed her down at all.

"Walker has done amazingly well when you consider she's wearing a knee brace," Rudy said. "She's steady, composed, and stops almost everything that she should get and occasionally ones she shouldn't. She's a calming presence for our team and it's nice to have."

Despite the rain on Thursday forcing the team indoors – Rudy was pleased with a great week of practice.

"On Monday we had an HPA session," Rudy said. "That stands for hurt, pain, and agony. We did a lot of running sandwiched around training and technical work. Wednesday was a light day and Thursday we had a great session going over technical [play] and strategy for Yale."

Assisting Walker in the recent four-game surge is sophomore forward Vanessa Patry, who leads the team with three goals and is tied with four others for the lead in assists with two. Rudy is impressed with her play, recently, especially since she's been on antibiotics due to an interior ear infection.

"She's really been turning it on," Rudy said. "She is such a crafty player as well as being one of our smartest players technically on the field. She always asks great technical questions, which is something I love as a coach. It's nice to have players like Patry."

Junior forward Britt Canfield is second on UMass in points with six. She has started in all five games for the Minutewomen this season.

No time to celebrate after historic win

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts field hockey team (2-3) won't have long to celebrate sophomore forward Lauren Gillespie's first career hat trick, and UMass coach Patty Shea's 100th career victory in a 4-2 come-from-behind victory on Wednesday against the Fairfield Stags.

Shea and company will leave the Stags to lick their wounds as they head to Boston for a weekend showdown against the Northeastern Huskies (2-3) and Boston University Terriers (2-3).

Shea knows her team has work to do in order to steal two on the road this weekend.

"We need to refine our penalty corners and we still need to do a better job in the goalkeeping area as well as sure-ing up our defense," Shea said. "It's harder to get the team focused for road games. In field hockey, playing on your own turf is a huge advantage."

The two opponents the Minutewomen face this weekend are going to make the road games even tougher.

"This is a great New England rivalry," Shea said. "Northeastern and BU play with a lot of emotion and expect to win every time they step out on the field. We need to put some pressure on both teams and take advantage of our opportunities."

On tap first this weekend for the Maroon and White is Saturday's matchup against the Huskies at Sweeney Field. UMass is all too familiar with Northeastern. The Huskies have been able to take the last six games they have played against the Minutewomen.

"Northeastern is always a very skilled team," Shea said. "They play a tough conference schedule and are always well prepared."

Much like the Minutewomen, The Huskies have had a roller-coaster season. After blowing out New Hampshire, 5-0, in its opening game, the Huskies dropped three straight contests before getting back on the winning track against Holy Cross last Sunday.

One of the keys to the game will be keeping Northeastern midfielder Ashley Bascetta off the scoreboard. Bascetta has five goals in as many games this season. Bascetta also makes her shots count, scoring her five goals on just six shots on net.

By the time Sunday's game rolls around against the Terriers at Williams Field, the Minutewomen hope they are in the position to jump over the .500 mark for the first time this season. But it won't be easy. The Terriers have had the Maroon and White's number in recent years, coming out on top in the last four meetings between the two.

One of those four losses came last year when UMass was the recipient of a heartbreaking 2-1 overtime loss from the Terriers at Garber Field.

"We know what happened last year, but every year is a new challenge," Shea said. "We both have games on Saturday and rosters change from year to year, so it should be a pretty even game."

"They [BU] like to move the ball down the sideline and do a good job getting the ball back to the corners for shots," Shea said. "They play a zone defense and are able to cover lots of space on the field."

BU's 2-3 record is a reflection of a tough schedule this year. The Terriers have lost all three of their games to nationally-ranked opponents including No. 5 Duke, No. 16 Providence, and fell out of the national rankings themselves after losing to No. 8 Boston College.

SPORTS FACT OF THE DAY

Patriots' offensive line a work in progress

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO, Mass. – Ryan O'Callaghan hunched over in his right tackle spot and got ready for his first NFL play.

On the left side of the line, Buffalo linebacker Takeo Spikes charged past a veteran New England linemen and knocked the ball from Tom Brady's hand. Another linebacker, London Fletcher, scooped it up and ran five yards for a touchdown last Sunday.

Rookie or returnee, a player on the offensive line can be beat at any time by an opponent's speed, power or ability to exploit a mental mistake.

"Anything that happens out there collectively we look at it and say, 'We've got to do better.'" Patriots left tackle Matt Light said. "There's not one thing that's the reason or the fault for that. We all have to do better."

The Patriots starting offensive line for the 10-17 season opening win over the Bills had three players who weren't on it in the last seven regular season games last season. Light missed the first 14 games with an injured right ankle, center Dan Koppen got hurt in the last seven with a damaged shoulder and O'Callaghan was still a senior at California.

The blocking on tackle's side last year was entrusted to a pair of rookies: Nick Kaczur started in place of Light and Logan Mankins started all season at left guard.

Last Sunday, with Koppen at center, Mankins and Stephen Neal at guard and Light and O'Callaghan at tackle, Brady was sacked three times.

"Early on, I don't think we allowed him to get into a groove at all," Koppen said. "He was getting hit five out of six times the first times he dropped back, so that's on us and we've got to get better."

Koppen and company, however, did open enough

This season Tom Brady is lining up behind a slightly different offensive line than much of 2005. Matt Light and Dan Koppen returned from injury while Ryan O'Callaghan is new to the team.

Duquesne students shot on campus

By Ramesh Santanam
Associated Press

PITTSBURGH – Five Duquesne basketball players were shot on campus early Sunday, leaving at least one critically injured, after some of them tried to calm a man who apparently had been disruptive at a dance, officials said.

Police searched for the gunman, and the downtown school stepped up its round-the-clock police protection with armed university police officers guarding dormitories and other buildings.

Two players had been walking near a dormitory when they encountered a man who apparently had been disruptive at a student union dance, authorities said. The players attempted to pacify him and walked away but were shot. Players who rushed to their aid were also shot.

The gunman and a group of people with him were not students, university president Charles Dougherty said. Several witnesses saw the gunman leave campus after the shots were fired.

In critical condition was forward Sam Asbahu of Toronto, a transfer from Lake Region State College and a cousin of former Houston Rockets star Hakeem Olajuwon. In serious condition was Stuard Baldonado of Colombia, a transfer from Miami Dade College who was considered the school's best recruit.

Also hospitalized was Kojo Mensah, a guard from New York City who averaged nearly 17 points last season at Siena College before transferring, school officials said at a news conference Sunday. His condition was not released.

Treated and released were Shawn James of New York City, the nation's leading shot blocker last season at Northeastern University before transferring to Duquesne, and Aaron Jackson of Hartford, Conn., a guard who is one of only two returning players from Duquesne's 3-24 team last season.

Witnesses reported seeing two guns, Dougherty said, but he couldn't confirm whether both were fired. The second gun was seen on someone in a group with the gunman, Dougherty said.

Six to 12 shots were fired, he said. He did not know what sparked the violence.

"What motive can there be for unloading a pistol into a group of students?" Dougherty said.

James, an NBA prospect expected to be Duquesne's top player when he becomes eligible in the 2007-08 season, was shot in the foot but no bones were broken. Mensah was believed shot in the shoulder. Jackson was shot in the hand.

"The entire Duquesne University community is saddened and shocked," Dougherty said. "We're shocked because an event of this sort has never happened. It's a safe campus and known to be a safe campus."

Duquesne coach Ron Everhart, formerly at Northeastern, had rebuilt the school's program after being hired in March by bringing in 10 recruits – one of the most sweeping upheavals of any Division I program in recent years.

Lombardi discusses 'change'

By Susan King
Collegian Staff

Faculty and administrators at the University of Massachusetts are dedicated to changing and improving the Amherst campus, Chancellor John V. Lombardi said in his annual State-of-the-Campus address at the Faculty Convocation held on Friday in Bowker Auditorium.

The chancellor described UMass as a "classic American research university" which is defined by the quality of work that the University is able to produce through both students and faculty.

A student's average time at UMass is four or five years, and during that time, students have ideas of ways to improve the campus and also want to see changes at "lightening speed," however, according to Lombardi, change will happen appropriately over time, "we move faster than we should but slower than students want." The University is in "permanent investment mode … and will continue to stay focused on teaching and research-ing."

UMass will also continue to stay on track producing the high quality of work that has become standard at the University.

The chancellor also discussed the uniqueness of each student at UMass.

"We are one of the last American hand-craft industries," Lombardi said, because of the University's high attention to the individual needs of the students, each student is able to develop his or her own "independent self" and, with the help of the University's faculty, students will "walk away educated, but not in the same way as the other students leaving the class."

The convocation, lead by Provost Charlene Seymour, was "an opportunity to celebrate the nine most accomplished faculty" by presenting the 'Outstanding Accomplishments in Research and Creative Activity' awards. Recipients were nominated by deans, department chairs and heads and chairs of faculty members. Nominees were then chosen by Seymour based on the recommendations of a Nomination Committee.

This year's recipients were James K. Boyce, professor of economics and Director of the Political Economy Research Institute's program on Development, Peace building and the Environment; Sridhu B. Desu, distinguished professor of Electrical and Computer Engineering; Lila M. Gierasch, distinguished professor of Biochemistry and Molecular Biology and Chemistry; Arthur F. Kinney is Thomas W. Copeland, professor of Literary History; Bing Liang, associate professor of Finance; David J. McLaughlin, professor of Electrical and Computer Engineering and Director of the National Science Foundation Engineering Research Center for Collaborative Adaptive Sensing of the Atmosphere; Barbara A. Osborne, professor of Veterinary and Animal Sciences; Keith Rayner, distinguished University professor of Psychology; James E. Young, professor of English and chair of Judaic and Near Eastern studies.

Logan ups security, inspecting all luggage

By Matt Donnelly
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

BOSTON – Logan Airport in Massachusetts became the first airport in the country Thursday to check every bag entering the airport, Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff said at a press conference.

"Counter-to-counter checking has been practiced for several months now," said Ann Davis, spokeswoman for the Transportation Security Administration. "But today formalizes the requirement. It gives the TSA regulatory authority."

More than 42,000 bags are checked each day in Logan for both passenger and commercial flights, Chertoff said.

"We've been screening 100 percent of cargo and checked baggage," Chertoff said, referring to packages sent on passenger flights, which were previously not required to go through the same security as checked bags.

"We want to stay ahead of the curve," he continued.

Chertoff told The Boston Globe Thursday that TSA officials and trained canines have been working with the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority at South Station, Silver Line connections and the Airport subway stop to check passengers for explosives before entering the airport.

Chertoff said it is the law that all bags and airfreight cargo be checked in all passenger airlines. However, the same cannot be said for those items entering commercial airliners.

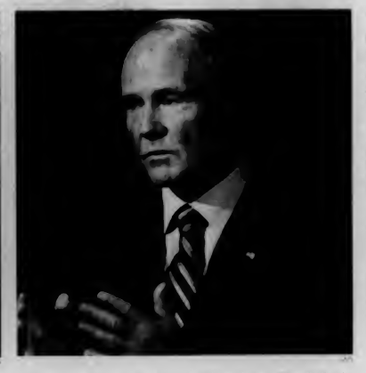
Passenger flights are also in the process of implementing integrated fingerprint databases – which includes an identification watch list and a chemical-detecting "puffer" device that Channel 5 news anchorwoman Pam Cross said is "a machine that blows air onto you to detect chemicals." Yet, not all of these measures are being taken on commercial flights, which could still potentially put travelers at risk.

Commercial flights, which carry cargo from shipping companies, undergo a less-rigorous screening process for risky cargo, yet the potential for disaster aboard commercial flights is not receiving the same attention, Chertoff said, adding that not all packages aboard these airlines are screened to the same extent.

During the conference, MBTA officials were also questioned about the Visible Intermodal Protection Response (VIPR) teams that are now being used in emergencies underground.

Gov. Candidates: in a nutshell

Democratic gubernatorial candidate Deval Patrick greets supporters as he arrives at a community meeting, Sept. 16, 2006.



Democratic candidate for governor of Massachusetts, Tom Reilly, the state's twoterm attorney general, addresses Harvard students, Sept. 14, 2006.

Deval Patrick, one of three democrat gubernatorial candidates vying to win Tuesday's primary, has laid out a detailed, 10-point plan to improve public education in Massachusetts, from the elementary to the university level.

"Public higher education is critical to our economy, because nearly 85 percent of public higher education students stay in Massachusetts after graduation. These institutions are preparing our future workforce," Patrick said in a written statement posted on his campaign Web site.

Patrick's plan calls for the issuing of bonds, the funds raised from which are to be invested in both the expansion and the development of the Commonwealth's colleges and universities. According to Patrick, the proceeds made from the sale of stem cell research bonds "will be invested in research facilities and faculty development."

"All high school graduates will have access to a quality, affordable public university or college," Patrick's statement read. His proposed investment in the Commonwealth's public higher education is also aimed towards increasing the quality of education while decreasing the cost.

"He wants to make sure that kids have an opportunity regardless of their income," said Jackie Arroyo, a precinct captain and volunteer worker for the Patrick campaign. "He wants to make sure that not only the talented and gifted kids, but also the kids who are a little bit underprivileged can go [to college]."

According to Arroyo, Patrick is an advocate for the accessibility of a college education for all students.

"There are excellent [college] candidates coming out of the lower class and middle class," she said. "Every kid should have a chance."

The children of immigrants who may otherwise have been unable to attend college and receive a higher education are also part of Patrick's plan to open up higher education in Massachusetts, according to Arroyo.

"If they were born in this country, they should have a chance to go to a university, just like anybody else here," she said.

In the same statement on education posted on his campaign Web site Patrick accused the Romney/Healey administration of under-funding and under-valuing public higher education in Massachusetts and having recently "slashed funding for higher ed teachers and other professionals for the third consecutive year."

"He wants to make sure that we're still recruiting the top high level educators in these fields, especially since we have a lot of competition in the state," Arroyo said. "We want to make sure that at least at the state level that we are still elite."

Derrick Perkins

Massachusetts governor candidate Tom Reilly's platform includes improvement for education, neighborhood safety and the environment for the state of Massachusetts without raising taxes.

Reilly was born and raised in Springfield, Massachusetts and graduated from Boston College Law School. After law school, Reilly became a prosecutor for the Suffolk County District Attorney's Office and a civil rights lawyer for the Attorney General's Office. In 1990, Reilly ran for Middlesex County District Attorney and won the position. He held that position until 1998 when he ran for Attorney General. Reilly has held the title of District Attorney since 1998.

As Attorney General, Reilly worked towards protecting children and elders, preserving access to quality, affordable health care, ensuring a competitive economy for businesses and safety and fairness for workers and making schools better.

Reilly plans on improving education in Massachusetts through two plans; Never Give Up on a Child and S.M.A.R.T (Science + Math Achieve the Rewards of Tomorrow).

Never Give Up on a Child is a plan that increases higher education, Reilly's goal by the end of 10 years is to have all students in Massachusetts complete a post secondary degree or credential.

S.M.A.R.T. is a plan to increase students' knowledge in math and science, while also obtaining the best teachers and making all of the schools in Massachusetts easy and safe places to learn.

Not only is Reilly trying to improve education in the state of Massachusetts, he is also trying to protect the environment.

Reilly hopes to protect the environment by enforcing and making the state's environmental laws stronger. He is also trying to fight against the Bush administration's lowering of federal standards.

When Reilly was a state official he tried to make sure that natural resources, air and water, were healthy and safe and he preserved more for future generations.

Reilly's most important goal is to make public safety and security better. As Attorney General, he created the most change in public safety that Massachusetts has seen in the last 20 years, and he hopes to do more as governor of Massachusetts.

Reilly is also an avid supporter of gun control. He has already taken steps forward in making Massachusetts a safer place to live by having Massachusetts be the first (and only) state in the United States to have consumer protection regulations to regulate handguns. The regulations that Reilly implemented outlawed the "junk" handguns; these handguns are the most popular guns used in crimes.

Girl safe after text message escape

By Jeffrey Collins
Associated Press

LUGOFF, S.C. — A man suspected of kidnapping a 14-year-old girl and keeping her in an underground bunker was charged Sunday with raping the teen, Kershaw County Sheriff Steve McCaskill said.

Kershaw County Sheriff Steve McCaskill said Vinson Filyaw had eluded police with an elaborate system of hideouts and bunkers since November 2005 when he was charged with criminal sexual conduct on a 12-year-old girl.

He surrendered Sunday morning to police as he walked along Interstate 20 near Columbia, about five miles from where investigators found the teenager.

Police say Filyaw, 36, abducted the girl as she walked home from a school bus stop on Sept. 6.

Investigators arrested Filyaw in neighboring Richland County about 24 hours after rescuing the girl, who sent a text message to her mother on Filyaw's phone while he was a sleep Wednesday, McCaskill said. The sheriff said Filyaw woke up and the girl still had the phone, but she told him she was simply playing with the phone.

Investigators used cell towers to determine a general location of the phone and deputies began searching for Filyaw on Friday night, McCaskill said the girl cried out as searchers approached the bunker.

"This little lady getting that message out was really the break in the case," the sheriff said. "She helped herself as much as we helped her."

Police say they still have not interviewed the girl, whose name was previously released when she was a missing person. The Associated Press is not using her name because police have identified her as a victim of sexual assault.

The girl was found Saturday about a mile from her home, hidden in a booby-trapped, 15-foot-deep hole carved out of the side of a hill and covered with plywood. The bunker had a hand-dug privy with toilet paper, a camp stove and shelves made with cut branches and canvas.

McCaskill said it looked like Filyaw was trying to dig another bunker under that one as a possible backup hiding place, but had to abandon it when it filled with water.

Filyaw had dug two bunkers in his own yard and two in the woods and had used them to hide out since he was charged in the assault case in November.

His girlfriend Cynthia Hall has been charged as an accessory and with neglect in the earlier case, McCaskill said. Investigators say she allowed the earlier assault to take place in her home and provided Filyaw with supplies to live in the bunker.

Police were tipped off to Filyaw's location Sunday after getting a call from a woman who said he tried to carjack her at about 2 a.m. outside a pizza restaurant, authorities said.

Filyaw was on foot — about five miles from his house — carrying a pellet gun, a Taser and a long hunting knife when police captured him. He gave up easily, McCaskill said, adding that he doesn't think the suspect had any help escaping.

"If he had help, he would have gotten much further away," McCaskill said.

Filyaw was being held Sunday at the Kershaw County jail. The sheriff said he was not aware of Filyaw having an attorney.

Investigators said Filyaw posed as a police officer when he met the 14-year-old girl, and the teen was walked around in the woods by her captor until she became disoriented. He used handmade grenades and a flare gun to threaten her while she was in the bunker, McCaskill said.

The bunker was protected by a booby-trap. It had food, shelves and even a stove for cooking, McCaskill said.

Filyaw also has been charged with kidnapping, possession of an incendiary device and impersonating an officer, McCaskill said.

The sheriff said police found off-brand cigarette butts and pornography left behind in all Filyaw's hiding places. Deputies had been searching for months for the unemployed construction worker. Officers tried to arrest him at his home earlier this week, but he escaped using a hole in the floor of his bedroom that allowed him to hide under his mobile home, the sheriff said.

Vinson Filyaw, 37, was arrested Sept. 17, 2006, and charged with kidnapping, possession of an incendiary device and impersonating a police officer.

Feds help investigate E. coli outbreak

By Justin M. Norton
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Federal agents from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention intervened this weekend to help investigate an E. coli outbreak tied to tainted spinach from California's Central Valley.

The greens, which appear to be grown by the world's largest producer of organic produce, have sickened 102 people, including the death of a 77-year-old woman, according to health officials.

CDC officials said Sunday they've started an Atlanta-based emergency operations center to help state health agencies with E. coli testing. Epidemiologists are helping test spinach samples and stool samples of those who have been infected, center spokeswoman Lola Russell said.

The center is helping when state health agencies can't perform the tests or when a second opinion is needed, Russell said.

E. coli cases linked to tainted spinach have been reported in 19 states, with a majority of cases in Wisconsin.

Other states reporting cases were California, Connecticut, Idaho, Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, New Mexico, Nevada, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Utah, Virginia, Washington and Wyoming, according to the CDC.

The Food and Drug Administration continued to warn consumers not to eat fresh spinach or fresh spinach-containing products until further notice.

Natural Selection Foods LLC recalled its packaged spinach throughout the United States, Canada and Mexico as a precaution after federal health officials said some of those hospitalized reported eating brands of prepackaged spinach distributed by the company.

However, some restaurants and retailers may be taking spinach out of bags before selling it, so consumers shouldn't buy it at all, the FDA said.

Boiling contaminated spinach can kill the bacteria but washing won't eliminate it, the CDC warned.

"We're still in the process of alerting people of the fact that they need to check the refrigerator," Russell said.

The spinach could have been contaminated in the field or during processing. About 74 percent of the fresh market spinach grown in the United States comes from California, according to the California Farm Bureau Federation.

There have been previous bacterial contamination outbreaks linked to spinach and lettuce grown in the state.

E-votes may be flawed

By Vidya Huang
The Daily Princetonian

PRINCETON, N.J. — Five years ago, Princeton University computer science professor Ed Felten challenged the music industry by cracking the codes designed to stop music from being copied. Two years ago, he wrote software to show that peer-to-peer networks couldn't be regulated. Now he's broken into another type of supposedly secure data: Election results.

On Wednesday, Felten, along with computer science graduate students Alex Halderman and Ariel Feldman, released a paper detailing flaws in the Accuvote-TS, an e-vote machine manufactured by Diebold, Inc.

"If someone had physical access to one of the machines for less than a minute, they could install vote-stealing software or infect it with a virus that would spread to other computers," Halderman said.

Felton criticized Diebold for failing to ensure the security of its e-vote machines.

"We think that there were not many precautions taken in the design of this system against insertion of malicious software, which is the kind of attack we've primarily looked at," Felten said. "It is much too easy for a moderately skilled programmer to carry out this attack and steal votes in an election."

Felten and his team presented their findings to the computer science department Wednesday. To illustrate their results, they allowed audience members to vote in a mock presidential election between George Washington and Benedict Arnold. Arnold, perhaps the most notorious traitor in American history, emerged victorious every time, regardless of how the votes were actually cast. There was no way to detect that the election had been stolen.

U.N. is back in global spotlight

By Edith M. Lederer
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — World leaders gathering for their annual meeting this week will find a new buzz: The United Nations is back in the global spotlight after securing a cease-fire in Lebanon, trying to revive the Middle East peace process and pressing Sudan to allow U.N. peacekeepers into conflict-wracked Darfur.

Plenty of other hot-button issues are on the agenda as well, including Iran's nuclear program, the presidential runoff in Congo, reuniting war-divided Ivory Coast and Cyprus, and deciding the future of Kosovo.

After several years of unrelenting attacks on the United Nations — for corruption, mismanagement and inaction — recent events have helped the world body make a comeback.

France's U.N. Ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sablière said it's obvious the United Nations is needed.

"You can do something, but it's easier to do it through the United Nations," he said. "Now, the question for the U.N. is: since we have these requests coming, this need, is the United Nations ready, or efficient, or able to answer that? And this is why the (U.N.) reforms are important."

When the General Assembly meeting opens Tuesday, the nearly 90 presidents and prime ministers and dozens of foreign ministers expected to attend the session will certainly be focusing on the U.N.'s unfinished reform agenda — including the highly contentious issue of expanding the Security Council, the U.N.'s most powerful body.

At last year's U.N. summit, Secretary-General Kofi Annan, whose second five-year term ends on Dec. 31, urged global leaders to respond to mounting criticism and restore the organization's credibility by adopting broad reforms needed for nations to act together to tackle poverty, terrorism and conflict.

The record 151 world leaders who attended the summit adopted a 35-page document that commits governments to achieving U.N. development goals that include cutting extreme poverty by half by 2015. But it fell far short of the bold changes Annan wanted.

Nonetheless, the past year has seen the creation of a new U.N. Peacebuilding Commission to help move countries from war to peace, a Human Rights Council to replace the discredited Human Rights Commission and a new fund to provide emergency humanitarian aid. But members decided to put off many of Annan's most important management reform proposals, which especially angered the United States, the U.N.'s biggest financier.

While questions about whether the U.N. is up to dealing with its increasingly important agenda will bubble in the background, the headlines are certain to go to the standoff over Iran's disputed nuclear program as the U.N. Security Council has demanded that Tehran stop uranium enrichment. Iran's hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is to address the General Assembly on Tuesday, hours after President Bush.

A U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity because no decision has been made, said European and Iranian diplomats could meet on the sidelines of the General Assembly in hopes of de-escalating the nuclear standoff.

Annan, who just returned from a two-week trip to the Middle East, said regional leaders were very concerned about Iran and told him: "We cannot afford another crisis in this region."

"I appeal to the Iranians to really work with the international community and lift the cloud of uncertainty surrounding their program, so hopefully this will be done," Annan said Wednesday at a news conference.

The Arab League also has asked for a ministerial meeting of the Security Council on Thursday to relaunch the Mideast peace process, but it still isn't set, primarily because of U.S. concerns about the outcome. Ministers from the Quartet that drafted the stalled road map to Mideast peace — the U.S., the U.N., the European Union and Russia — will meet on Wednesday.

"We have to try everything which is in our power to relaunch a peace process in the Middle East," said Greek Foreign Minister Dora Bakoyannis, whose country holds the Security Council presidency this month.

"We cannot live with the situation in the Middle East any more," she said in an interview. "War cannot be the answer, and after the Lebanon crisis, if anybody ever had any doubts ... we know now that there cannot be any military answer to these problems."

Mideast issues are certain to be on Bush's agenda when he addresses the General Assembly on Tuesday morning.

With the war in Iraq in its fourth year, analysts say the United States will be relying more readily on international institutions including the U.N. and its alliances for help in Iran, Lebanon, North Korea, Sudan and other issues.

U.N. Undersecretary-General for Political Affairs Ibrahim Gambari also noted the increasing reliance on the United Nations.

"Multilateralism and the U.N. have taken their hits in the past few years," he said. "But events of late have shown just how much this kind of organization is needed in today's world. This General Assembly will certainly underscore that point."

Gambari said no issue needs more urgent attention than Darfur — and Annan warned that if the 7,000 African Union troops leave and a U.N. force can't replace them "we are heading for a disaster."

Behind the scenes, one of the hot topics is certain to be the race to succeed Annan. There are now six candidates and more could emerge.

When a reporter noted that in three months, Annan would be referred to as the former secretary-general, he quipped: "Fortunately."

United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan, left, looks back as he gets in a car upon his arrival for the Nonaligned Summit in Havana, Sept. 14, 2006.

The great wall of America

[illegible] before returning to Amherst, I was [illegible] to visit Cancun with my family. We [illegible] nice hotel right on the water, but we [illegible] traveling through the city proper. As you might expect, parts of the city were obviously very prosperous and gaudy, thanks to the [illegible] most of the city was horribly and [illegible] American point of view, my family is [illegible]. However, when placed in this [illegible] I felt incredibly guilty about taking a roof [illegible]. Considering I only expected to get a tan, [illegible] paperback and swim in the ocean that week, I certainly came home with some serious social [illegible].

[illegible] ice has not left me since, and it [illegible] today when I read that the House has [illegible] to erect a 700-mile fence on the [illegible] border. To me, such a vote is horribly [illegible] of how politics work in this country. [illegible] incredibly complicated issues, politi[illegible] make knee-jerk decisions without [illegible] the many layers of the issue.

[illegible] the United States is hardly a simple [illegible] issue. Historically speaking, we are all immigrants [illegible] evidence is to be believed, even Native [illegible] are not native as much as they are pio[illegible]. Even if one wishes to look at more [illegible] immigrants (both legal and illegal) [illegible] paramount importance to the construc[illegible] as we now know it.

'And it made all the difference'

Tucker Merrick

These days at UMass, it seems like every building is blocked by a fence. A temporary fence restricting our every movement – slowing us from where we want to go, constraining us in what we want to do. Alongside each of these fences is the same old sign which, exciting at first, has now become a daily reminder of the "new dirt" that we must trudge across and around seven days a week.

Everything seems amiss. The Dining Commons are more crowded than ever, parking spaces are few and far between, Stockbridge Rd. no longer exists, tuition costs are on the rise – need I go on?

People are beginning to ask: what are us college students getting out of this? By 2008, much of this construction will have two more years left to go. Why should we suffer for the students of tomorrow to sit in new, beautiful, and air-conditioned classrooms? They should experience the condemnable buildings that we learned and sweated in. After all, we're not the ones who designed the library without accounting for the weight of books. Why can't somebody else walk through the maze of fences while dealing with the Du Bois wind tunnel?

We're victims of circumstance. Changes have to be made, and we have the unfortunate pleasure of existing on campus when they happen. For me, this state of being that we face is far too similar to environmental issues happening in the world today.

It's now becoming commonplace knowledge that Global Warming does in-fact exist and that its cause is air pollution in the form of greenhouse gases. These emissions come from cars, factories, power plants – everything that we rely on, every single day. When you stop contemplating melting polar ice caps, issues of air quality linked with rising asthma rates are there for you too.

At this moment in our industrial history, not enough is being done to curb the mounting pollution. The 1997 Kyoto Protocol gave us some hope: reduce emissions of six well-known greenhouse gases to 5.2 percent less than the respective country's 1990 levels. Yet, it also exempted countries like India and China from these regulations. The rational behind this being that these growing countries are just undergoing their Industrial Revolutions, therefore they should have the same freedom as nations like the U.K., Russia, and the United States did.

We're victims of circumstance. Changes have to be made, and we have the unfortunate pleasure of existing on campus when they happen.

In response to this freedom for industrialization, the United States Senate refused to ratify the protocol until conditions of emission reductions were also applied to these countries. One hundred and sixty five states came together, but the biggest pollutants couldn't achieve and sign a solid plan that would reduce their levels of greenhouse gases.

The problem is that to solve these issues of Global Warming and air pollution, people of today have to make changes and sacrifices for the people of tomorrow. Many experts say the economy is sure to suffer, and thus, the standard of living will go down hand in hand with emissions levels.

Who wants that? No one in their right minds wants to make their lives hard now so prenatal humans will be better off later. It is human nature to be selfish, and it seems the nature of environmental reform goes directly against that.

And don't think our elected officials don't know this. Congress and Bush have rejected plans for greenhouse gas reductions on the basis that it would hurt the economy and the general standard of living. No politician is going to lobby for something that will have a negative effect on his constituents.

Yet, changes are happening at UMass. Probably a big reason for this is that the Chancellor Lombardi doesn't have to worry about being removed from office by burdened students. All of our griping won't get him dismissed by referendum.

Construction near the library earlier this year.

The Board of Trustees is also going ahead with their plans because they, like everyone who goes to school here, know that "New Dirt" is necessary. UMass needs to expand and enhance, and the sooner the better. The Physical Plant is a mess, roofs are in disarray and open classrooms are so few and far between that, pretty soon, English class will have to take place at the UMass farm (an atmosphere that only an Orwell classic could match).

In coming months, I am sure the noise of complaints will become even louder than the excavators in the backdrop of the "New Dirt" signs that are already getting old. Construction will have gone wrong, work will be taking longer than expected. Through it all, know that fixing something that inevitably needs to be fixed is a hard process, but a necessary one. If it's not corrected, the problem only gets worse and harder to correct.

Construction will continue until its completion years after we graduate. We're just going to have to stick it up in hopes that by enduring a necessary evil, some good will come of it. Perhaps, after telling someone where you go to school, in the future you won't have to validate yourself by citing that it doesn't really matter where you go for undergrad.

At UMass, our fates, and the fate of our campus, have already been decided for us. But what will the future hold for us and the environment? Reform needs to occur, and our generation seems to be the one that has to do it before the problem gets worse.

Right now, we find ourselves in a dual role as not only students of a dilapidated University, but members of humanity. In both, we will continue to play the role of the self-sacrificing Samaritan, whether we want to or not.

Knowing thyself

Katy Bruck

College students, no matter where they go or what they like to do, seem to all share a common vibe. Whether it's at a big school, like UMass, or a smaller private college, I've noticed a frenzied sense of social urgency coming from the populations of college campuses. Every student you meet will generally give you the same impression. "You should like me, because ..." Sometimes it's because "I'm hot," or because "I'm cooler than you" or even because "I'm not cool at all." Depending on the person, and sometimes even the college they attend, you'll get a different insertion there, but undoubtedly, the instability of college life lends itself to identity issues and social anxiety in general.

Everyone's heard that these are the best days of our lives. I don't personally know if I buy that, but I can see how it might be true. College is an exciting, exhilarating time in a young person's life. We have energy, we're stronger, we're generally better looking than we will be in 20 years and, more importantly, we're beginning to establish how we'd like to be as people.

There is a tremendous amount of freedom in not having to be a valuable member of society yet. I'm not saying there are no college students who are valuable members of society, but the point is: it's not our job yet.

So, I can see how a thin veil of nostalgia around the special moments of college could make one look back and say "Gosh, that was fun." We've all noticed that (most of the time) our parents don't tend to go out as much, play Frisbee or run around with their shirts off at three in the morning in 30 degree weather. We are young; we run free, see our friends, see the sights and feel alright, according to the movie "Useless."

I think it can be said with reasonably little rebuttal that a sense of social accomplishment is generally the motivation and goal of most college students. We go out because we want to spend time having fun with our friends, but we also don't want to seem lame sitting home alone every weekend watching the X-Files on DVD. We play Frisbee because it gives us an excuse to meet new people, but we also want to display our athleticism, and again establish ourselves as socially active and vigorous. And the nighttime shirtless adventures? Well, alcohol has its own social value too.

I've witnessed people make up songs and serenade people they don't even know, sing a cappella in an echoing stairwell, quote entire episodes of "Family Guy" and let's not even get into the way people choose to dress when walking around campus (feathered hats, cat's ears, leggings, etc.). Almost everything we do as college students can be interpreted as a social expression. We are given a gift, being young people, to create caricatures of ourselves and wear them around for everyone to see.

One way I've seen this behavior interpreted is it's simply a way for people to mask their insecurities until they're more acquainted with who they are. Maybe that's the case with some, but at what other age is acting like a college student acceptable? There is a tremendous amount of freedom in not having to be a valuable member of society yet. I'm not saying there are no college students who are valuable members of society, but the point is: it's not our job yet. We're still learning and growing, and we are lucky enough to be given the time, space and contemporaries with which to do so.

This whole "You should like me because..." game is not always fun and something to laugh about. It can be frustrating and difficult to be stuck being a college student, not able to do much besides focus on who we think we are and what we're going to contribute once we're out in the real world. There's a duality in the "You should like me..." statement, because it can come off as "I like me, so you should like me," but a lot of the time that isn't the case.

If you don't know what I'm talking about, then go check out one of the all-freshman dorms. They're almost always noisy, and people are out in the hallways laughing, singing and doing their caricature thing. If you pay close attention, you'll see the energy is very much transient. I feel like freshman housing really hones in on the difficulties college presents in terms of socially establishing yourself. It brings the element of "we're all new at this college stuff" to the forefront, getting a little too close to the fact that we're all new at this life stuff. And paying too much attention to that can be very overwhelming, combined with everything else that's new and hard about college and growing up.

So, I guess what I'm saying is, when things are getting a little sketchy, or you're feeling overwhelmed, just remember you are young and you are free to be whoever you feel like being to get you through this college thing. Play Frisbee, run around shirtless and make friends however you can. At the end of the day, how much of the embarrassing stuff are you going to remember in 20 years anyways?

I'm still stuck on these weapons of mass destruction. During the first three years of the war, evidence of WMD programs was found all over Iraq. It was evident to anyone who would open their eyes that a massive cover-up on the part of the Saddam regime had taken place during the months we spent debating the Iraq War at the U.N. with nations that were never going to approve a war against a man who was bribing them. Those who refused to open their eyes to the truth were usually afflicted with a seething hatred of the Bush administration that bordered on a psychiatric condition.

Then, in June 2006, the National Ground Intelligence Center released a report stating that 500 chemical munitions had been found in Iraq since the beginning of the Iraq War.

Big news, right? You would think that something like that would be plastered all over the news for weeks.

Wrong. Despite finding sarin nerve agent and mustard blister agent in Iraq, the media gave scant attention to this story. Where I was studying in Germany last semester, I didn't see a single mention of it. When I told my European friends that WMD had been found in Iraq, they gave me a quizzical look which seemed to suggest that if such a momentous find had occurred, their news media would have informed them of it. Only when I e-mailed them the precious few American news articles I could find about it did their skepticism recede.

With barely a few minutes of research I turned up plenty of evidence that these claims were false; the weapons were indeed lethal, and the fact that they were older than 1991 did not make them an illegitimate find.

The press did everything it could to negate the importance of this find. They said the weapons were degraded and therefore not really dangerous, and they said the munitions were manufactured before the 1991 Persian Gulf War, and therefore, not really the weapons we were looking for. With barely a few minutes of research I turned up plenty of evidence that these claims were false; the weapons were indeed lethal, and the fact that they were older than 1991 did not make them an illegitimate find.

Just how much coverage should this type of story receive? Well, I'd be satisfied if it got 25 percent as much attention as the Abu Ghraib prison scandal. For almost the entire month of May 2004, I could not turn on the news without seeing that picture of the hooded Iraqi prisoner with wires attached to his fingers. The New York Times ran 43 front-page stories about the scandal in a period of 47 days. Anybody who wasn't living on the planet Qo'nos heard about the story.

How many front-page stories did the Times dedicate to sarin and mustard found in Iraq? Zero. After giving it a back-page mention, "the old gray lady" went right back to doing what it does best – bashing Bush, making the Democrats look good and tipping al-Qaeda off to our anti-terrorism measures.

Or maybe I would be satisfied if it got 30 percent as much coverage as Cindy Sheehan's traveling circus. She was just one woman standing outside the president's ranch like a boob, demanding to meet a man with whom she had already met and commented that she believed his concern for her son was genuine. Despite this, she managed to create a media bonanza like we hadn't seen since ... well, Abu Ghraib.

I would be satisfied if it got half the coverage of the Valerie Plame affair, which turned out to be much ado about nothing. It might be nice if it got as much attention as the president chewing with his mouth open and swearing.

It reminds me of the study done by the Program on International Policy in late 2003 that supposedly proved a Right-wing media bias because 34 percent of respondents believed that WMD had been found in Iraq. I can't tell you how many irate leftists have spewed that little factoid out at me, essentially implying that Americans are morons.

After the discovery of WMD, I thought that some organization might study the issue again just to see how misinformed we Americans are now. The closest thing I could find was a July 2006 Harris poll that indicated 50 percent of Americans believe Iraq had WMD at the beginning of the war. That's not exactly the same thing as saying 50 percent of Americans are aware that WMD have actually been found, but no such poll has been done to my knowledge. That also means at least 50 percent of the population does not know about these weapons.

And why should they? The story got about as much coverage as the Little League World Series. The most important news story of the year is being drowned out by phony baloney stories which seem pretty irrelevant in comparison.

There's no excuse for the staggering level of ignorance on this issue. It's an intentional media blackout. Shame on the press for failing to inform the public about information that is vital to forming an opinion about the Iraq War. I guess they're afraid that if more people knew the truth, we would be less apt to rabidly hate Republicans like they do. It's sickening.

Badfish sets the bait at Pearl Street

By Lauren Modisette
Collegian Correspondent

For everyone who knows Sublime and continues to hold a place for them in their hearts, Badfish, their tribute band, is of almost guaranteed familiarity.

Thursday, September 14, Badfish graced Northampton with an amazing performance that had the entire audience at their fingertips.

When they finally made their entrance on stage at 10:30 p.m., the crowd went nuts, screaming at the top of their lungs. After about three hours of standing around, relief finally came, every single person dancing and singing right along with the band.

They played all the familiar songs, and it was surprising that there were a couple of unrecognizable songs, which were hard to place a name to. During "In the End" it was difficult to even hear the vocalist, Dave, because the crowd was belting out the lyrics right along with him. They played songs like "Badfish," "Scarlet Begonias," "40-oz to Freedom," "What I got (reprise)," "Garden Grove," "Santeria," "Don't Push Me" and several more.

Before they went on-stage, we were catching some pictures of them and the drummer, Scott, asked the other members what they were going to play. When this came up in our interview preceding the show, they told me that they never know what they're going to play before going onstage; they come up with it as they go. Most bands these days have at least a set list to work with, even though they rarely follow it. These guys have a distinctive connection with each other that enables them to come up with a set as they play.

Immediately the crowd was a mess, and there was rarely a time when there wasn't someone crowd surfing. It was amusing to watch because several of them were dropped, which is an ultimate hazard.

It is truly amazing to witness how a tribute band can provide their audience with so much energy and movement. They sound so similar and do such an incredible job impersonating Sublime that you can easily forget that it isn't really them, but you can't get any closer than this.

The crowd wasn't the average stoner-hippy group of fans who just bob around to the rhythm of the music. They were jumping all over the place, even creating a mosh pit in the midst of the dancers and crowd surfers. These guys were driving their fans to the brink of exhaustion, and you could feel the temperature rising in the venue from all of the energy the audience was providing and, at that point, they had only played five songs.

After they finished playing every song, you were left with a tingling sensation on the surface of your skin and the echo of the music running through your veins.

R.P. Whitmore from Hampshire College told us, "It was decent. I've never been to a tribute band before, but they were great." Amber Bartosz said her favorite song was "Garden Grove." She was very pleased with the set they played, but she wished they had played "Saw Red." She also mentioned that the newest band member, Pat, had caught her attention and she would like to know more about him.

The band was gracious enough to let me ask them some questions while they packed up. Here's what they had to say.

Q: What's your favorite part of being on the road? The groupies?

A: (Dave-vocalist) I was never really into that. The best part is playing the shows.

(Pat- Sax, keyboard, occasional percussion) Yeah, it's like one big road trip.

Q: A lot of fans want to know if you have ever considered playing your own music.

A: (Pat) It's in the works. We've been in and out of the studio, and we'll have a demo by the end of the month.

Q: What is one thing you would like to see happen after coming this far?

A: (Dave) Keep playing shows. (Pat) I'd go with conquer the world. Going further, if you're not growing, then you're dying.

Q: Musicians have the power to manipulate their audience in almost every way, what is one thing you would like to see your entire audience do?

A: (Dave) It's crazy because you really can (manipulate the audience). Well, we wouldn't want things to get awkward.

(Pat) Yeah, I mean, if we told everyone to get naked, then everyone would be focused on the orgies and not us.

Q: Why Sublime?

A: (Pat) After Brad Nowell died the fans didn't get a show for their new CD, Sublime. It started as one show, and it sold out. We keep doing it because people want to hear it. Each show gets more and more fun, and each night it's like another party about to happen.

Q: Briefly describe what it's like to see how your music affects your fans.

A: (Pat) Powerful

(Scott- percussion and acoustic) It's great. It makes you play better. People are out there rockin' out, and it gets you more into it.

Q: Describe what your original music is like.

A: (Pat) It has elements of Sublime with more of a modern split.

Q: How can you be so passionate about music that you don't write?

A: (Dave) It's the same if you're in any band and one person writes the music.

(Pat) In the end it's all the art of expression.

Badfish left the venue with the surreal memory of their performance and the fans begging for more. We can expect great things to emerge from a tribute band about to take the next step and release their original music to the world.

The Alchemystics boost the experience

By Lauren Modisette
Collegian Correspondent

It was early Thursday night, September 14, and waiting outside of Northampton's Pearl St. Night Club for the doors to open seemed the thing to do. At that point, the only people around me were middle school and high school students impatiently waiting to get inside and out of view.

Upon entry, it was brought to my attention that there were two other bands playing before Badfish, The Alchemystics and Strictly for the Birds.

There were people waiting for about an hour for the band to start up so, when The Alchemystics began playing, the crowd was more than willing to head up to the stage and check them out. Even though I was there to cover Badfish, the Sublime tribute band, there was no help noticing the Alchemystics' sound.

By looking at them you would have expected another reggae band riding Bob Marley's wake, but as soon as they started up it became clear that their sound is one of a kind.

The Alchemystics opened with a funky reggae beat integrated with their own original musical styles and complimented with their smooth and feisty rap lyrics. The chorus of the first song got some knees bending and heads bobbing to "Roll it up, Light it up, Smoke it up."

According to the band, many of their artists have backed musical legends, such as Jurassic 5, Busta Rhymes and Spearhead. The rest of their set had more of a heavy feel than reggae but had a feel-good bass line that was perfect for dancing to.

Unfortunately, the entire crowd seemed a little reluctant to get into it, but as they continued to play more and more people wandered up to the stage, and more and more people started dancing and bouncing to their beat. By the third song the crowd had definitely warmed up.

They were, to put it bluntly, one of those bands you hear at festivals. To put them in a Bonnaroo-sized setting would be a bit of a stretch, but you could tell they would fit right in with a similar audience. They have a rhythm and beat that is easy to listen to and a lot of fun to dance to.

One of the last songs they played was a little slower but still had enough movement to keep you dancing and was sent out to all the ladies. They let out a final request for the crowd to give them some energy and finally get the entire crowd hopping to their words.

Sifting through the crowd, there were some fans apart from the teeny boppers that seemed to be wreaking havoc across the dance floor. Mike Buckley is a local man who has been following The Alchemystics for four months now. When I asked him why they appealed to him he said, "I like the music; the beat. Wherever they play we [he and his wife] follow."

I spotted the band members hanging around the venue after they finished their set and talked to one of the vocalists – a man by the name of Phaze. The band consists of five members. Demse on drums, Garrett on bass, Jay on keyboard, Force on vocals and Phaze. That night they also had Barak, a solo artist representing Western-Mass and Brooklyn. Both guest artists brought a Western-Mass flavor to the local feel of their performance.

"We've been playing for two and a half years. We're still coming up and still humble. Pearl St. is giving us the opportunity to play for a younger crowd, since we usually play for 21 and up," says Phaze. "My inspiration comes from within and music in general, and my son."

Norton and cast shine brightly in Victorian mystery flick

By Kate Bauer
Collegian Correspondent

Ed Norton and his fantastic hair star in "The Illusionist," a movie that combines fantasy, mystery, drama and romance all rolled into one. Set in 19th century Vienna, Norton delivers another fine performance, this time as Eisenheim, a mysterious magician with past ties to the lady Sophie von Teschein (beautifully portrayed by Jessica Biel), the future bride of Crown Prince Leopold (Rufus Sewell, in probably one of his best performances). On the trail of Eisenheim and by orders from the Prince to uncover the magician's tricks of the trade is Chief Inspector Uhl (Paul Giamatti – stepping away from his usual roles in past flicks).

'The Illusionist'
Directed by Neil Burger
Starring Edward Norton, Paul Giamatti, Rufus Sewell, Jessica Biel
Yari Film Group
110 mins.
Grade B+

The movie starts off with the two young lovebirds Edward and Sophie, who are forcefully separated because of their differences in class. Edward decides to leave Vienna and travel the world, re-emerging 15 years later as Eisenheim, a great magician. One night at one of his performances he is reunited with Sophie, now fiancée to the Crown Prince. They reignite their torrid love affair, only to have them discovered by Inspector Uhl. Now Eisenheim must devise a plan to escape with Sophie and "disappear."

At a glance, this movie has all the potential of being a disaster: two lovebirds attempting to escape their enemies and live happily ever after. But because the romantic part of the film is more understated than centralized, you focus more on the other elements of the film.

A big question that lingers throughout the film is whether Eisenheim's magic tricks are only tricks, or does he in fact possess supernatural powers? Much of the film is spent on the Inspector and the Prince trying to answer that question and uncover the magician's tricks, with Eisenheim gamely playing along.

In one scene in particular the magician is invited to the castle, where a sword-in-stone illusion results in the mockery of the Prince. But where the film plays strongly is its elements as a mystery, with its 'all will be revealed' ending putting all the pieces together and ultimately rewarding the patient viewer. Eisenheim's tricks are also entertaining to watch (each with a moral to go along with them), especially scenes with an orange tree sprouting from a seed and a mirror-reflecting trick.

Director Neil Burger, whose only previous experience was 2002's "Interview with the Assassin," does well pacing the movie, with exception of the ending, which felt rushed. He relies largely on his actors to carry the movie, capitalizing well on the performances, his simple frames and angles (with the help of cinematographer Dick Pope) leaving room for the actors to draw your attention.

Ed Norton, known for the intensity and intelligence that he brings to his roles, uses his sharp and penetrating eyes to great effect. Revealing little about his character throughout the film, he constantly keeps you guessing as to his next move. His best performance comes through in the later half of the film, as he becomes a man of lesser words.

Biel quite surprisingly does a fine performance, making the most of the scenes that she is in (which is less than what ads and trailers display).

Paul Giamatti delivers another fine performance as Inspector Uhl, a pawn of the Crown Prince, who in the end must decide between what is right and wrong.

Rufus Sewell, who again appears to be shuttled off to the side in order to make way for the other, more famous actors, easily melds into his role as a pompous and cold Prince, on a quest to overthrow his father so that he may become Emperor. Wonderfully performed, he easily changes from an uptight Prince with a cigarette to a man with a brandy glass losing his edge.

Beautifully shot with low light and old-fashioned film techniques, this sleepy-eyed look could in fact possibly put some people to sleep if it weren't for the superb performances.

Norton does a great job drawing the audience in, and all of the actors work well as an ensemble cast. Though this visually rich film takes its time, it keeps you drawn in by the performances and keeps you guessing as to what the final conclusion will be. What will be interesting to see is how it will hold up to "The Prestige," another movie involving magicians and again questioning trick from real magic, set to be released in November.

Paul Giamatti and Edward Norton joke with director Neil Burger.

Story of Dahlia murder leaks

By Glenn Lavell
The Los Angeles News

Brian De Palma and James Ellroy, a match hatched in "Pulp Fiction" heaven or maybe someplace south of there.

It was inevitable that De Palma, the Maestro of Mayhem known for the deliriously demented "Scarface" and "Body Double," would eventually throw in with Ellroy, best-selling author of "L.A. Confidential" and "American Tabloid."

And the story that brought these singular talents together? The grisly Black Dahlia murder case, still unsolved after almost 60 years.

"Why were we meant to collaborate? In a word, obsession," says Ellroy, 58, author of "The Black Dahlia," which, after two decades of false starts, has been filmed by De Palma. The Byzantine tale of betrayal, revenge and lurid necrophilia opens today, and Ellroy and De Palma, while pleased with the results, are bracing for tough reviews.

Josh Hartnett stars as a rookie homicide detective in postwar Los Angeles who falls in with Scarlett Johansson and Hilary Swank as he investigates a sensational mutilation murder. Ellroy's novel, like John Gregory Dunne's 1977 novel "True Confessions," was inspired by the 1947 slaying of starlet Elizabeth Short, whose body, severed at the waist, was found in a vacant lot in Los Angeles.

"We're both obsessive," the author continues in his best Mickey Spillane staccato. "Brian is obsessive with his work methods. I'm obsessive about my writing. And let's face it, this is the granddaddy of all sexual obsessive stories."

De Palma, brusque with the author in early meetings, now acknowledges a growing bond. "I guess we are kindred spirits," says the director, who turned 66 the same week he introduced "Dahlia" has 27th feature, at the Toronto International Film Festival. "I've spent a lot of time with Ellroy on this four. He's an original. He talks Ellroy-esque but it comes out in like Shakespearean sentences."

As for De Palma sharing Ellroy's laser-like focus, how else do you survive in La-La-Land? he laughs.

"Yeah, I'm obsessive," De Palma says. "You have to be in this business. In most of the movies I see there's not a great attention to detail, locations ... everything that goes up on that canvas we call the screen."

It certainly took uncommon resolve to bring "The Black Dahlia" to flickering life. The book was first optioned in 1988 by producer James B. Harris, who collaborated with Stanley Kubrick on the 1956 crime thriller "The Killing." Harris, who made "Cop" from another Ellroy novel, intended to adapt and direct "Dahlia."

But the project didn't come together, and it passed from producer to producer, director to director. At one point it was going to be shot in Berlin, and then Rome. Steven Soderbergh was mentioned as a possible director, and then

Making headway on migraines

By Michael Pricker
The Dallas Morning News

DALLAS — If you've never had a migraine headache, says Mel Pokorny, you just can't imagine what it's like.

"It's indescribable to most people," says Pokorny, who's suffered from migraines for more than 30 years. "You can hear the blood rushing through your head. You start seeing spots in your vision and within a few minutes you're throwing up."

Still, the malady isn't always apparent.

"You can't see a headache, and that makes it harder for people to understand how debilitating a migraine can be," says Suzanne Simons, executive director of the National Headache Foundation. "For many years, physicians as well as many people thought people with migraines were just complainers, or didn't handle stress well, or just wanted to get out of doing something."

These days, people know better — but not enough of them. Dr. Stephen Herzog, a neurologist at Baylor University Medical Center at Dallas, says that out of about 28 million Americans who suffer migraines, "only 10 million are properly diagnosed and only 4-5 million are properly treated."

Despite major advances in recent years, Herzog says, "There's probably no disorder that's as misunderstood and misdiagnosed and mistreated as migraine."

To try and clear that up, here are a few basics:

Migraine, says Herzog, is a "chemical disorder of the brain, like diabetes is a chemical disorder of the pancreas. Ninety percent of the time it's hereditary."

The pain is caused when blood vessels become dilated and inflamed, which can last a few hours or a few days. Depending on the severity, the pain can be accompanied by nausea and vision problems, plus extreme sensitivity to light and sound. That can happen once a week or once a year.

Though migraine is a chronic condition, headaches are often caused by triggers that vary from person to person. They can range from certain foods to stress, menstrual cycles to changes in the weather.

Treatments include preventive medications and lifestyle changes to ward off migraines, as well as medications — and actions — that minimize attacks when they occur.

The bad news, Herzog says, is that the condition has no cure. The better news is that there has been an "explosion of science to understand migraines and new medications to target them."

Proper treatment for migraines usually starts at a neurologist.

That's what Nancy Christy finally did about 15 years ago after suffering headaches for most of her life.

"I just thought it was normal all those years, and I just learned to function with it," says Christy, 60, who lives in Dallas. "But they were getting worse."

So with her doctor's help, she says, "I began to get educated, and I began to take control of this."

Taking control, Herzog says, begins with a comprehensive history, tracking when headaches occur, charting the patient's eating and lifestyle habits.

Then comes a process of trial and error: ruling out possible triggers, testing which medications may help, making changes ranging from losing weight to getting more sleep.

"It can take months to sort out, and it can involve some work for the patient, but we can do more than ever before both in acute treatment and preventive therapy," Herzog says.

Christy, a potter who does ministry work in her church, has made a lot of changes during the years.

She lost a lot of weight, worked on relaxation techniques and learned to watch out for too much sugar, red wine and MSG, among other things.

"I'm much better and much smarter than before," she says. "I couldn't make it without the preventive medicine, but I function real well. I don't let it become an all-consuming deal."

Pokorny, a 51-year-old empty-nester who's a student at the University of North Texas, took a similar approach — without medication.

After years of taking painkillers, she says she didn't want them in her system anymore. So she worked at relieving stress and learned what to do when she feels a migraine coming on: ice packs, a dark room and relaxation.

"If I don't catch mine right at the beginning, I can be down for a couple of days," she says. "But you learn what works for you and what you need to do. I have it down to about six a year."

Herzog and Simons are optimistic about the prospects for making progress against migraines. The battle rages on many fronts, from research into brain chemistry to drugs developed for other uses that may be effective in controlling migraines.

Baylor is one of 60 sites around the country studying the phenomenon that when some people have a small hole in their heart called the patent foramen ovale repaired, their migraines go away.

In the meantime, Simons says, the message should be clear: "People who have migraines don't just have to suffer. We want them to know there is something they can do."

Movie producers tell the grisly Dahlia tale

David Fincher ("Seven") took over. De Palma came aboard in 2002.

Reflecting its labyrinthine production path, the film arrives with what may be a record 16 producers. Harris, who had no creative input but says his approach would have been "more realistic ... less excessive" than De Palma's, is credited as executive producer.

"The Black Dahlia" was finally financed for $45 million, shot at a studio in Sofia, Bulgaria, and released through Universal. No stranger to the vagaries of international movie-making (he shot "Mission: Impossible" in Prague), De Palma shrugged, dusted off his passport and put another project, a thriller called "Toyer," on hold.

"It's always a little dodgy how these things happen," he says, laughing. "This picture kept falling apart and coming together ... I thought it was never going to get made."

De Palma says he was always fascinated by the Black Dahlia case, and had read a number of the non-fiction accounts. So, maybe he was destined to do a movie on the subject, which he calls "one of those legendary unsolved mysteries."

The new thriller — which fuses film noir shadows and Grand Guignol horror — might be seen as the director's definitive statement on voyeurism and sado-masochistic love. Ellroy calls it another of De Palma's homage's to Hitchcock's "Vertigo." De Palma's signature visuals (elaborate crane, tracking and point-of-view shots) are the filmic equivalent of Ellroy's hard-boiled prose. In the novel "Dahlia," victim Short never makes an appearance, except as a corpse. In the movie, De Palma frequently flashes back to her to hammer home Hartnett's perverse attraction. De Palma's ending is very different than Ellroy's.

"It's a compressed rendition that adheres to the overall dramatic arc of the novel," points out Ellroy. "Brian had his jaws wrapped tightly around L.A. in the '40s ... I never could have imagined that a movie shot largely in Bulgaria could have captured my themes so well, and the haunting obsessiveness of the Black Dahlia."

De Palma agrees that the film in some ways encapsulates his career. "But I favor more visual sequences," he says. "There are a lot of people talking, which happens with detective fiction where you've got to get a lot of information from place to place. It's not one of my favorite forms."

Over the years, many have put forth theories about the killer. John Gilmore, in "Severed: The True Story of the Black Dahlia," argues that it was his father, a Los Angeles cop in the 1940s. Ellroy's explanation is more elaborate.

What's De Palma's take?

"I think Betty was a girl a bit on the make, and I think she got picked up and didn't come across with what she was supposed to do, and somebody went wild and then disappeared or got arrested for another crime. But that, of course, is not as sexy as some of these other solutions."

Some are already rushing to call "The Black Dahlia" De Palma's "comeback" because it's his first film in four years. He laughs derisively at the catchphrase.

"I've come back so many times, I don't know how I feel about that," he says. "I've been making films for 40 years and I don't know if there's any reason for me to come back."

Does this mean he's thinking about retirement?

"No, but let's face it, someday when you jump out of bed those legs that always worked so well are going to have a little crick in them or something."

Then, De Palma quotes Tony Montana, the gangster Al Pacino played so memorably in his "Scarface": "Every day above ground is a good day."

Josh Hartnett, Scarlett Johansson, and Hilary Swank star in the gruesome story of The Black Dahlia, expected to be released later this year.

A change for Updike; novelist leaves suburban turf for terrorism

By Geeta Sharma Jensen
Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

In John Updike's latest novel, his protagonist, Ahmad Mulloy Ashmawy, the 18-year-old ardently Muslim son of an Irish-American mother and an Egyptian father, observes his high school teachers and thinks:

"The teachers, weak Christians and non-observant Jews, make a show of teaching virtue and righteous self-restraint, but their shifty eyes and hollow voices betray their lack of belief. They are paid to say these things, by the city of New Prospect and the state of New Jersey. They lack true faith; they are not on the Straight Path; they are unclean."

Ahmad also thinks his classmates, especially the girls who "sway and sneer and expose their soft bodies and alluring hair," are devils who "seek to take away my God." He further believes that his mother is loose and unclean. And, from grade school on, he seeks to replace the father who has abandoned them with a Sudanese imam at a mosque in New Prospect.

Updike, among the dons of the suburban American novel, is in strange new territory with Ahmad in "Terrorist," his 22nd novel and one that he acknowledges is "more headline-influenced than my other books are." Not only is Ahmad a teenager of mixed race, but he also is a suicide-bomber-in-the-making, an oddball if passionate kid who rejects the materialistic, free-wheeling, pop-cultured and sexually liberated mores of America — his native land and only home — even as he struggles with his natural instincts.

You almost cannot suspend disbelief here — in part because your knowledge of Updike gets in the way.

Updike's 74 now; an Episcopalian living outside Boston with his second wife, whom he married in 1977, a father of four grown children and still lionized for his signature novels, which explored white male angst and thought in the post-World War II decades. Some of his characters are alter egos.

Though he is among the more prolific of American authors and his oeuvre includes short stories, essays, poems and novels on witch lore and an African dictator, he is remembered for his fiction about Harry "Rabbit" Angstrom, a Swedish-American whose life Updike chronicles from his athletic and other conquests of his youth to his feeble last years in the late 1980s. The four "Rabbit" novels, published between 1960 and 1990, remain relevant jewels of precision and prose.

And now here he is, trying to enter the mind of a teenage fundamentalist and wannabe martyr. How–?

Updike is smiling in his gentle, un-offended way even before the question is asked fully.

"I'm always trying to break out of the white suburbs," he says, eyes alight beneath his bushy white eyebrows. "I feel good when I'm doing it. You don't need an awful lot of reality for this. I get carried along with my fancies ... One of the things art should do is be playful and be untimid ... You should treat it as a privilege and not be afraid to extend yourself."

The freedom of a fiction writer to go where his imagination takes him is among a broad range of topics Updike discusses agreeably on an overcast afternoon in Washington. Carefully dressed in slacks, a jacket and tie, he half lounges, half perches on one end of a couch in the lobby of a five-star hotel downtown. The place is noisy: Music plays, people walk by. Updike is not distracted. He is unfailingly courteous, generous with his smiles and conversation, reflective about his work — never mind that he has been talking and meeting with people all day during BookExpo America, the publishing industry's annual convention.

"The fact that I saw the skyscraper fall (on Sept. 11) — I had purchase," he explains. "I think it's important to understand these people, and this (my book) is my attempt to understand a homegrown terrorist, to explain it to the American public."

Updike saw the World Trade Center towers burning from a rooftop in Brooklyn while visiting relatives. In a piece in The New Yorker, he described the collapse of the south tower in chilling detail, remembering it "fell straight down like an elevator, with a tinkling shiver and a groan of concussion distinct across the mile of air." He and his wife knew, he said, that they "had just witnessed thousands of deaths."

In the next few months, like the rest of the country, Updike followed everything that had to do with the terrorist attacks. He remembers reading a news story about a Brooklyn imam who was counseling a couple; it made him realize that being a good Muslim in America was challenged "by all sorts of distractions you didn't have in the village" of a home country.

What struck him, too, he says, alluding to suicide bombers was "this fascinating potential for violence in young men who seem to have everything to live for."

His preoccupation with such issues led him to imagine a young Muslim protagonist instead of the Catholic priest he thought was going to be the focus of his next novel. Updike then revisited the Quran, which he had first studied when working on his 1978 novel, "The Coup," a post-colonial satire narrated by the exiled president of an invented African nation called Kush.

Despite his study of Islam and time spent imagining Ahmad, Updike acknowledges that he is closer to Jack Levy, the 63-year-old, disillusioned Jewish guidance counselor who takes an interest in Ahmad right from the first chapter. Levy is someone Updike understands, someone he's been writing about for years.

But, he says, Ahmad, too, is a character he can understand.

"Ahmad has a special life, a life that doesn't have to do with being a teenager," Updike explains, noting that the youth's passion is Quranic studies. "(He has) a private self — with hopes and aspirations." He could identify with that, he says.

"I was enough of an oddball that I could identify with Ahmad," Updike offers. "I was an only child. The sign of being an only child is you have a heightened sense of your own importance. I had these yearnings to be somebody – Errol Flynn, for example. I also wanted to be a cartoonist. I had a realistic but far-fetched hope."

Updike was born in 1932 in Reading, Pa., but was raised in nearby Shillington, where his mother worked in a department store and his father was a high school teacher. His father was also his homeroom teacher, and he remembers him as a gentle, good-natured man. (He is re-created fondly in Updike's 1963 novel, "The Centaur.")

"I was elected class president, but I felt I didn't quite hear the music other people were hearing," Updike remembers. "I couldn't jitterbug. I didn't have a girlfriend to teach me ... I was kind of a mutomouth — made jokes to get girls to laugh — I was fairly limber: I fell down stairs for fun. I wanted to be liked and I wanted to succeed."

Without siblings, Updike spent a lot of time reading — mysteries, at first, by such novelists as Erle Stanley Gardner, Ellery Queen and Agatha Christie. He also savored humor, borrowing the books of such writers as P.G. Wodehouse from the library. But more than anything else, he wanted to be a cartoonist for The New Yorker, which he began reading at age 11 after an aunt gave his family a subscription. He thought the magazine "was so funny and cool and sophisticated," he says.

Updike boldly sent The New Yorker a cartoon when he was 15. At Harvard University, he contributed to the Harvard Lampoon, starting first as a cartoonist, then moving on to poetry and prose. In 1955, the year after he graduated with a degree in English, Updike made it to The New Yorker — as a staff writer of poetry, editorials, criticism and stories.

That was it. He was 23 — and since then, he has earned his living mainly through his writing, with occasional speeches thrown in.

Updike was 27 and living in New York City when his first novel, The Poorhouse Fair," was published in 1959. It was about the residents of a nursing home.

The following year came his first Rabbit novel, "Rabbit, Run," which brought him instant fame. "The Centaur," a story of a schoolteacher and his son, arrived in 1963 and won him the National Book Award. Updike moved with his first wife and four children to Ipswich, Mass., which served as a model for his 1968 novel of partner swapping, "Couples."

His second Rabbit novel, "Rabbit Redux," didn't arrive until 1972. The third and fourth Rabbit books – "Rabbit is Rich" (1981) and "Rabbit at Rest" (1990) – won Pulitzer Prizes.

Updike's fiction is set mainly in New England, but he has traveled to such countries as Egypt and Morocco and says he believes regional novels are no longer enough. When he was working on "The Coup" he noticed "how America's position in the world was changing and attitudes were changing."

"I had a theory that being a French novelist or Indian novelist wasn't enough anymore," he says. "We really have to start writing global novels."

In that sense, Updike and other novelists like him are the cultural and social historians of America. If Updike's earlier novels captured the mood and experience of a certain America, white and vibrant and indulgent and liberated, "Terrorist," seeks to grapple with a changing America. Despite its flaws, it is a novel that explores the 21st-century issues of race and fundamentalism and equality and security.

Library may remove 'Braveheart' over Gibson remarks

By Charles Sheehan
Chicago Tribune

CHICAGO—Mel Gibson's plea for forgiveness because of an anti-Semitic tirade over the summer may not be enough to avoid having his "Braveheart" image removed from a suburban Chicago library.

On Tuesday, the Schaumburg Township Library Board will discuss a request to take down a poster that features Gibson in his film about the Scottish warrior William Wallace.

It was not clear whether the request to remove the poster came from the staff or from the public suggestion box, library President Anita Forte-Scott said Wednesday.

"I get e-mails every week on a wide range of topics from people who use the library, so it doesn't surprise me" that someone would complain about Gibson's conduct, Forte-Scott said.

"The request will be given some serious discussion and thought, but I don't think it's a real heated issue," she said.

Bob Doyle, executive director of the Illinois Library Association, said he had not heard of any other library that had discussed removing films or images of Gibson.

The association would support the library if it chose to retain the image and films that feature Gibson, he said.

"It doesn't take a quantum leap to see that if the poster goes, so go all of the films or anything else," Doyle said. "Libraries represent all types of thought, so if someone goes into a library and doesn't find something that is offensive to them, the library might not be doing a very good job."

Gibson was stopped by Malibu, Calif., police around 2:30 a.m. July 28 while driving on the Pacific Coast Highway.

Police said Gibson asked the arresting officer, "Are you a Jew?" and said Jews were responsible for all the wars in the world.

Gibson has apologized to the Jewish community for what he described as "belligerent behavior" and insisted that he was not a bigot. He pleaded no contest last month to a misdemeanor charge of drunken driving and was sentenced to 3 years of probation.

In the Schaumburg library, 20 small movie posters and four large ones are on the south wall of the movie rental section. Gibson is portrayed in a smaller poster.

Films that Gibson directed or which he starred in, such as "Lethal Weapon 3" and "Paparazzi," are still listed in the library catalog.

Patrons were divided this week over whether the poster should be removed.

Gerald Hayes, 68, a self-described film buff, said he visits the library several times a week.

"I don't agree with what (Gibson) said, not only because he's wrong historically," said the former Marine from Elk Grove Village. "But I'm very much against censorship because it goes right to the heart of the Constitution."

Hayes pointed out that the library walls were covered with controversial images, from baseball slugger Mark McGuire, who was suspected of steroid use, to pop singer Michael Jackson, who has been the subject of child molestation investigations.

"I guess my question is, where do you stop?" Hayes asked.

The poster should go, said Sharon Reese, 24, of Schaumburg.

"I'm not offended, but I do look at it and think, 'Hey, there's the guy who hates people because they're Jews,'" Reese said. "There are books here about Hitler, but they are about Hitler killing Jews."

"Ask The Attorney"

By Michele Leaf
SLSO Staff Attorney

Q: I got a letter from the Dean of Student's Office informing me that I am suspended from the University effective immediately. After celebrating at a large off-campus party, the police came to disperse the crowd. The crowd became rowdy, but I did not participate in any rioting. Although the police have claimed that an order to disperse was given, I never heard it. I was grabbed from behind by a plain clothes officer and arrested for disorderly conduct and failure to disperse. How can the Dean suspend me before I have been found guilty?

A: While it certainly looks and feels like this is the case, the Dean is not finding you "guilty" by taking this action to suspend you. You can be prosecuted in criminal court and charged with violating the Code of Student Conduct (CSC) for the same behavior. Although the protections are not as extensive as for a defendant in criminal court, a student accused of violating the CSC is guaranteed due process by the Fourteenth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution.

Many of the students arrested in this situation have been charged with violating the CSC by engaging in endangering behavior and failure to comply with the directions of University officials. Under normal circumstances, students accused of code violations are entitled to notice and a hearing before an impartial board before a serious sanction, like suspension, can be imposed.

In extraordinary circumstances the Dean can take immediate action and does not have to follow the usual due process guarantees. Courts have upheld interim actions by universities when there is an immanent danger of serious harm. In the case of students who are alleged to have been involved in riotous behavior at celebrations, the Dean's Office has taken the position that this is the case.

The Dean is exercising power under a special section of the CSC which states that interim restrictions are available whenever there is ground to believe the student is an "imminent threat" or the cause of "serious disruption" to the University community. Such interim restrictions are for the purpose of protecting the University community from further harm and are not considered to be a punishment for the charged student.

However, since the consequences are severe, because the effect of the interim restriction is loss of educational credits, tuition and University housing, this power must be used sparingly. Despite the University's concern about preventing and punishing riotous behavior, the interim restrictions should not be an excuse to deny students their rights to due process guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution and provided for in the Code of Student Conduct.

Students interested in learning more about the University judicial system are encouraged to attend an information session sponsored by the Student Legal Services Office and CCEHMS on Tuesday, September 26, 2006 from 6:30 p.m. to 7:30 p.m. at the Sylvan Cultural Center. Attorney Charles J. DiMare will lead a discussion on the University judicial process and answer any questions from the audience. Light refreshments will be served. Minutemen defeat Wildcats

Baylark opened the flood gates. The Minutemen went on to score 10 more points in the second quarter and take a 17-14 lead into halftime.

Several critical decisions awaited Brown in the second half.

On the Minutemen's second possession, Coen sparked the offense with a game-changing throw that Villanova coach Andy Talley called a "backbreaker."

Beginning on the UMass 10-yard line with 3:25 to go in the third quarter, Coen was sacked on second down, pushing the Minutemen back to their three-yard line. It was 3rd-and-17 and UMass was buried in the end zone.

But Coen let it fly to the left sideline where 6-foot-5 wide-out Rasheed Rancher turned and caught the ball by his outside shoulder before stumbling forward to the 39-yard line. A 36-yard pass on 3rd-and-17 for the first down.

"You're looking at giving them the ball on our side of the 50-yard line," Brown offered. "That single play right there turns field position around. It's a great throw and catch from Liam to Rasheed."

"[The Wildcats] were trying to get into the run game and trying to get their guys downhill," Coen said. "Having the faith that we have in this receiving corps helps me out a lot."

Coen consistently aimed down the field on Saturday. He completed passes for 34, 33, 43, 36 and 25 yards, all to different receivers.

After Rancher's acrobatic catch, the Minutemen marched into the endzone – after conversions on two fourth-down situations – and pushed their lead to 24-14, putting the game out of reach.

the vicinity of London. This time the two connected on a first down play that gained 34 of Coen's 350 passing yards on the day.

London ran a deep post and made a leaping catch to haul the ball in. He had formally returned.

"I think just having the faith that we have in this receiving corps helps me out a lot," Coen said.

London also showed his value on third down. In the second quarter, with eight yards standing between the Minutemen and a first down, Coen hit London along the sideline for a gain of 12 yards.

The play was UMass' only third-down conversion on the drive. It set up a Chris Koepplin 33-yard field goal that brought the score to 14-10 in favor of Villanova.

London grabbed his fourth reception of the game in the fourth quarter. On the tail end of the Minutemen's 90-yard drive, he caught a pass on third-and-goal from the 15-yard line. Coen dropped back and surveyed the field. He hit London on the left sideline at the one-yard mark.

Just before he reached the pylon, Rodney Badger pushed him out of bounds. UMass later scored on Coen's pass to Brad Listorti on fourth-and-goal.

Then it happened. London reached the endzone later in the quarter. The score made it 31-21 and pulled UMass away from the Wildcats.

The call from the sideline called for London to run another deep post. Coen put the ball only where London could catch it. It took a diving effort, but he hauled it in for the six points.

"I'm just running the route coach calls," London said. "I've been working on my routes all summer. When I know it's a passing down I'm trying to get open and make it easy for Liam."

Villarroel lifts UM over Yale

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team extended its winning streak to five in a gut-wrenching come-from-behind win against the Yale Bulldogs. Although senior captain Nadia Villarroel scored the game-winning goal, it was the outstanding play from a variety of players that enabled UMass to come back and win.

"Collectively, as a team we worked for each other," Villarroel said. "If one of us got beat, then there would be someone else on our team to back her up. That was a key component to our victory, as well as, always staying positive regardless of the score and time remaining."

Villarroel's game-winning goal came with just 45 seconds left in regulation that seemed destined for overtime. The goal squeaked in the top left hand corner of the net on a direct kick following a Yale foul.

"I thought the shot had missed," redshirt junior goalie Kristin Walker said. "But then I saw everybody celebrating, it was crazy, I started running up the field. It was like a movie scene, I can't even describe it."

Junior forward Britt Canfield, who tied the game with a goal of her own in the 70th minute, was equally as surprised as Walker when she realized the ball made it past Yale goalie Susan Starr.

"That shot was amazing," Canfield said. "Nobody was expecting it, not even Nadia. I think. She is a great player and works so hard. That hard work paid off in a big way."

In describing the goal, Villarroel was quick to credit her teammates in helping her have the chance for the game-winning kick.

"Kaelyn Caldwell gave me a great pass up the left side," she said. "I was past my defender, and I knew if I stepped in front of her sh would be called, giving us a direct kick. Normally I would have tried to hit Vanessa Patry or Christina Nunes on the far post for a header, but with the time and weather constraints I realized shooting was the best option."

Without Canfield's goal to tie the game, 1-1, Villarroel would not have had a chance at her heroics.

"Canfield is the best player we've ever had at UMass at shooting from angles," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "The fact that it went in was not surprising at all."

"I felt a bit relieved after her goal," Villarroel said. "A goal always helps attitudes on the field. At that point I think we were all really excited and just wanted to finish the game with a win."

Canfield is quick to credit her teammate junior defender Christina Nunes with helping her tie the game.

"Nunes gave me a great through ball past the defense," Canfield said. "It really brought us back into the game. Everyone worked their hardest and we did it."

Despite trailing, 1-0 at halftime, the mood in the locker was upbeat.

"Everyone was so enthusiastic, nobody had their heads down," Walker said. "We knew we were playing better than they did and we were so pumped going into the second half. We knew the goals would come."

Rudy was quick to mention how the play of his players that didn't score contributed heavily in the victory over Yale.

"We had to respond to their hard rush during the first 10 minutes of the second half," Rudy said. "The turning point was when Katie Ruggles came in and gave Villarroel a rest. She had four or five slide tackles in a row that disrupted their play. It changed the psychological dimension of the opposing team and took away their flow."

Rudy also praised the play of senior midfielder Elizabeth Weinsten and Walker.

"Weinsten had a really good performance," Rudy added. "She was hustling all over the field, getting to balls and slide tackling. Walker played her angles really well. She was dead to rights on the only goal she allowed. There was nothing she could do."

Even the fans played a positive role in the game according to Villarroel.

"They were motivating," she said. "It was really uplifting to see their enthusiasm throughout the game despite the weather. They never stopped cheering and didn't lose belief in us no matter what the score was."

The negativity towards the Minutewomen on the part of the Yale crowd only fueled the fire of the team, and especially for Villarroel.

"Personally, I loved it," she said. "Every time they would say something negative towards me I would just keep working harder to beat my own player and win my own individual battle."

The total team effort by his team pleased Rudy.

"The spirit they displayed to come back and push through was impressive," he said. "In those conditions we were under some serious pressure and they handled it well."

Walker echoed her coach's sentiments.

"It was actually fun to watch," Walker said. "Everybody played sick. It started with every single person. I think everyone played their best game of the season tonight."

Villarroel loved what she saw from all of her teammates Friday night.

"Something I have never experienced witnessing until this season was that everyone who wasn't playing was incredibly involved," Villarroel said. "We were all standing up and cheering. It was really motivating for us to see everyone so involved. It was such an incredible atmosphere."

Rudy's squad keeps winning part of the 2005 UConn Classic. The loss handed UMass, which finished the season with a record of 8-9-1, its second loss of the season.

Near-misses were the theme of Friday's game for most of the first half.

In the eighth minute, junior Britt Canfield took a stab at putting UMass up by a goal, but she hooked her shot wide. That instance would repeat itself numerous times before the first period drew to a close.

Scoring attempts off the feet of freshman Meghan Gould, sophomore Vanessa Patry, junior Jenny Roehrig and Villarroel would all curve wide in either direction throughout the duration of the first period.

Canfield had another chance to put the Maroon and White on top, but the misfortune would continue. With Yale's goalie, junior Susan Starr, on the ground after deflecting a UMass shot, Canfield booted a close-range shot towards the keeper-less net, but the ball was cleared out by Yale sophomore midfielder Hayley Zevenbergen.

Yale would eventually break the scoreless tie in the 42nd minute when senior Trista Chokst took a pass from freshman Sophia Merrifield a few yards away from the goal and deposited it into the back of the net, beating redshirt junior goalie Kristin Walker.

But Rudy admits it was a tough goal to save.

"The only way she was saving that was if they hit her with it," Rudy commented. "The [Yale player] was wide open at about eight yards [out]."

The goal was the first one Walker has allowed in the last three games.

She is coming off of knee surgery in January to repair a torn ACL that she suffered in the final game of the 2005 season. Despite the heavy operation and a protective knee brace she is forced to wear, Walker has lost only one game this season, while allowing five goals thus far.

Rudy was very pleased with how Walker's knee seemed to hold up on the Yale's sloppy field during Friday night's match up.

"[Her performance] was good because she played her angles well. There were a few times where I thought she could have come out and taken some of the through balls a bit earlier, but she did what she does well."

"A lot of the shots that came in were driven at her but they skipped and she ate them up," he added. "She just stopped them. They weren't going anywhere. And that's Walker's value."

Someone else who is very excited to see Walker's success is her backup, junior Melissa Jubinville – a recent transfer from St. Anselm College

"To see Walker come back from such a serious injury is great," Jubinville said. "She's doing an awesome job. It's nerve-wracking to see the ball come to her but once she makes the save we're all happy for her."

Walker, who registered four saves in the winning effort, is grateful to Jubinville and the rest of her teammates who she said have been very supportive.

"[My teammates] have been awesome," Walker said. "They've been there 100 percent."

During the 10-minute intermission, Rudy told his team that it was out shooting the Bulldogs, but that if it didn't settle down and rack up some numbers in the points column, it wouldn't matter how hard the women had played.

After a halftime pep talk from their coach, the Minutewomen seemed to get their second wind, as they ratcheted up their aggressiveness and intensity.

Rudy paid the women kudos for their physical play and well-executed slide tackles in the second period.

It all paid off in the 72nd minute, when UMass finally evened out the score.

Canfield, whom Rudy describes as being the best angles-shooter to ever play at UMass, got a great through-ball from junior defenseman Christina Nunes and put it through Starr's legs to tie it up at 1-all.

"I'm surprised it went in actually," Canfield said. "It went right between [Starr's] legs. She kind of dove down and it went under her because [the field] was slippery.

"It was a great [pass] by Nunes," Canfield added. "[The goal] really brought us back into the game."

After the goal, UMass knew it could come away with a victory.

With a new fire in their bellies, the Minutewomen's defense shut down their Yale opponents for the rest of the game.

Then with 45 seconds left before overtime, Villarroel was fouled to the turf just outside the Yale penalty area.

The co-captain set up for a free kick and let it fly. The ball flew over a wall of Yale defenders and squirted into the net between a diving Starr and the left post.

After the ensuing kickoff, the ball was dribbled around midfield until the clock milked away and the Minutewomen locked up their 11th win in 12 all-time games against the Ivy League school.

Prior to the start of the game, Rudy tried something a little unorthodox to try to take advantage of the miserable weather conditions.

He instructed all of his players to lie down flat on their backs and then on their stomachs before running a few quick sprints. Rudy said that gets the women used to the discomfort of the soggy field.

"I said, 'Let's get some mud on the jerseys right away,'" Rudy commented. "That way we wouldn't have to worry about that."

Rudy is now focused on UConn. He has studied the Huskies' squad and their style of execution, and he reports that he does not expect his team's strategy to alter. He plans to play them hard and attack them with speed and physicality.

a big turning point in the game. Unfortunately, we weren't able to keep that momentum from what he did for us."

Later in the game, another miscue nearly doomed the Minutemen. Vermont sent fluttball deep into UMass territory. Simmons had an easy play on it, but kicked the ball into the back of Browns legs. Vermont squandered the opportunity, kicking the ball over the net and out of play.

"We did some good things today," Koch said. "Unfortunately, we got disorganized in the back. We'll go over it, and we'll review exactly where the miscommunication was and make sure it doesn't happen again."

Although it ended on a sour note, the weekend began positively for the Minutemen with another one-goal victory, this time over Hartford 12-2-3).

Forward Brian Hogan scored his team-leading third goal in the 60th minute to put away the Hawks. The freshman beat two defenders one-on-one before shooting the ball just under the dive of Vermont's Matt Glaeser.

"It was a great finish," Junior back and team captain Kenny Cook said. "It was a great effort. He took two guys on there to finish. That's what we need out of guys to put the ball in the back of the net."

"I got [the ball] at midfield and luckily I have long legs so I was able to get around two guys and just poke by them at the last second," Hogan said. "I saw the goalie and I saw a guy coming in from the left side. I was running out of gas, so I figured I would just try to hit it on goal as hard as I could. I didn't hit it exactly how I wanted to but luckily it went in."

Forward Prince Dfosu, who started every game this season, was held out of Friday's game for "violating team rules." He was back in action on Sunday, but did not start.

He came in only to replace an injured Michael Jejna, who hurt his right knee early in the first half and did not return.

"He'll definitely be OK for Saturday. I don't know about Wednesday," Koch said.

Senior Jason Schildmore made his first start of the year in UMass' 7-0 loss to Vermont on Friday. He has seen 263 minutes of action.

a field goal on the game's ensuing four turnovers, three of which created extra points. [illegible]

"We're not going to give up, that's how we're coached," said Silva, who grabbed the ball before it hit the turf after it was deflected by linebacker Brian Francois to end the game. "We're coached to play the whole game and more."

And they weren't going to let their coach down this time.

"Everyone on the team was very honored to be a part of this game for coach," quarterback Matt Ryan said. "Guys really like him and it's easy to follow a leader like coach O'Brien. Everyone knows we have a very good coach and we're all happy for him. He deserves it."

Ryan came out of the game in better shape than either of the first two, when he first hurt his ankle and then aggravated the injury. O'Brien said his QB was walking without a limp for the first time in a while.

"He seemed to be better after the game than he was after the last game," the coach said.

Worse off was linebacker turned short-yardage fullback Brian Toal, who was nursing his already injured shoulder. O'Brien said Toal was about as sore as expected, but there was hope he would recover during the week.

BC is back to the Atlantic Coast Conference at North Carolina State on Saturday, Division 1-AA Maine the next week and then a Thursday night matchup against No. 11 Virginia Tech on Oct. 12.

Although the Eagles are happy to escape their two close calls with a pair of victories, O'Brien isn't convinced that they've come out of the struggles with a secret overtime formula.

"The thing I learned most is we'd like to do better in regulation so we don't get there," he said. "Generally, you don't win a lot of football games missing two extra points and turning the ball over four times. If we want to be a championship football team, which is what we all aspire to, we're going to have to tackle better."

Shutout streak ended by UVM

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

When sophomore midfielder Tony Bassett made a save with his head in the 55th minute of yesterday's game against Vermont, you could hear the sigh of relief from fans at Rudd Field.

It was set up for Bassett to be the hero. All UMass had to do was hold Vermont scoreless for the remainder of the second half, and the Minutemen would continue their most impressive shutout streak.

With 2:03 left to play, and after a flurry of Minutemen scoring opportunities, Vermont freshman forward TJ Gore put the first ball past UMass goalkeeper Zack Simmons in five games.

"It was a great feeling," Simmons said on his shutout streak that came to an end in yesterday's 1-0 loss to Vermont. "It was a testament to how hard we've worked all year, and how well we were playing, and how well we still are playing. One goal is not the end of the world."

UMass had gone 566 minutes and 55 seconds without allowing a single goal. Going into the game, the Minutemen were off to their best start since 1941.

"UMass is a great team," Vermont coach Jesse Cormier said. "They have great character. Sam [Koch] is one of the people in this profession that I really, really respect because he just does it right. At the end of the day, we got a good bounce, and it was unfortunate that someone had to lose."

"To come on the road and play a team as good as UMass is, and to come away with a victory is an upset," he added. "I'm proud of our guys as well to come through with it."

Now that its seven-game unbeaten streak is over, UMass can focus on the few games before Atlantic 10 play heats up.

"We've got New Hampshire on Wednesday and they're a hard team to play against," Koch said. "We've got them here, at our place, and we've got to get ready for that. We have to work on getting better position of the ball and be able to move the ball quicker by... they're going to put the ball behind our defense a lot. And we've got to be prepared for that. We'll work on that on Tuesday, and then we've got another game on Saturday. So it's bing-bing-bing this week. It's quick."

"It's tough," he added. "I feel bad for them, but that's the start of the game to... You've got to finish your chances. That's what we've been doing against other teams, and now we have it come back and beat us."

Gore's goal with just over two minutes remaining was still devastating because of the way it was scored. The Catamounts got a long ball up field and junior Elliot Hasanan was able to take advantage of UMass' defensive miscommunication and come in all alone.

His shot was saved by Simmons, but Gore was there to put the ball in the back of a wide-open net.

"It was nice, but it's over," Koch said. "It was nicer yesterday."

So it's over. The streak is done. UMass let up one goal. It suffered its first loss of the season. But the players and coaches will tell you, they're still 6-1-1.

Now the focus is off of the scoring streak. It's out of the minds of the Minutemen. They're over it.

"They got past that on Tuesday," Koch said. "They want to play well and get one step closer to start the conference games start. I mean, we played well today, but unfortunately, we got disorganized in the back."

"It's hard for a goal to occupy one's mind with everyone talking about it," Simmons said after the game. "It's just a fact of life. But despite the fact that it was on our minds, it didn't mean that it affected us."

Junior Greg Cirillo leads UMass in assists with four on the season. He has started in all eight contests for the No. 22 Minutemen.

16 carries.

Smith completed 21-of-30 passes for 203 yards before taking most of the fourth quarter off. Ginn was limited to five catches for 33 yards, including touchdowns of 12 and 9 yards.

No. 8 Texas 52, Rice 7

HOUSTON – Texas had no trouble rebounding from last week's loss to Ohio State as Colt McCoy and the Longhorns defeated overmatched Rice. Texas (2-1) easily avoided losing two straight games for the first time since 1999 while Rice (0-3) has lost 19 of its last 20.

McCoy threw for 124 yards and two touchdowns and Selvin Young and Jamaal Charles both ran for more than 100 yards and scored a touchdown each.

The Longhorns scored on their first three possessions and then tacked on touchdowns on defense and special teams to take a 31-0 lead.

The Longhorns committed a school-record, 19 penalties for 148 yards.

No. 9 Florida State 27, Clemson 20

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. – James Davis' 1-yard run with eight seconds left gave Clemson and Tommy Bowden a victory over Florida State and Bobby Bowden.

Florida State (2-1, 1-1 ACC) struggled again offensively. Its first offensive touchdown came on Joe Surratt's 1-yard run with 10:27 left in the game and Drew Weatherford hit Chris Davis for the 2-point conversion to tie the game 20-20.

Davis, the ACC's leading rusher, had been held in check until the game-winning drive that started when a replay overruled an official's decision on a fumble that had momentarily awarded the ball to Florida State.

Clemson (2-1, 1-1) had not won at Florida State since 1989.

Florida State's Tony Carter ran back two blocked kicks, one for a touchdown, and another for two points on a blocked extra point.

No. 10 Georgia 34, UAB 0

ATHENS, Ga. – Freshman Matthew Stafford scored his first touchdown in a winning debut as Georgia's starting quarterback and the Bulldogs put up their second straight shutout.

C.J. Byrd scooped up a blocked punt and returned it 12 yards to the end zone midway through the third quarter, which gave Georgia (3-0) a 20-point lead and, essentially, finished off a team that couldn't muster anything offensively.

After beginning the season with a surprisingly close 24-17 loss at Oklahoma, UAB (1-2) managed only 163 yards against a defense that shut out South Carolina 18-0 the previous week.

No. 12 Louisville 31, No. 17 Miami 7

LOUISVILLE, Ky. – Louisville came up with one of its biggest victories, even though it lost Heisman hopeful Brian Brohm to a hand injury.

Brohm threw for 181 yards and a touchdown for the Cardinals (3-0) before getting knocked out of the game. Brohm, who tore ligaments in his right (throwing) hand, is expected to have surgery Sunday and miss three to six weeks.

Backup Hunter Cantwell finished up and threw for 113 yards and a touchdown. Miami fell to 1-2 for the first time since 1997.

The Cardinals had already lost one Heisman Trophy contender for the season, when running back Michael Bush broke his leg in the season opener.

No. 14 Virginia Tech 36, Duke 0

BLACKSBURG, Va. – Sean Glennon and Virginia Tech's offense started slow, but the Hokies' fly-to-the-ball defense was again more than capable of shouldering the load, holding Duke to 139 total yards.

The Hokies (3-0) even had more points than Duke had total yards after Glennon's second touchdown pass, a 25-yarder to Josh Morgan midway through the third quarter.

The play gave the Hokies a 30-0 lead, and the Blue Devils (0-3) had 25 yards.

No. 18 Oregon 34, No. 15 Oklahoma 33

EUGENE, Ore. – Dennis Dixon rallied Oregon for two touchdowns in the final 72 seconds – with help from a disputed onside kick – and the Ducks blocked a field goal on the final play in the wild win.

Dixon's 16-yard keeper with 1:12 left brought the Ducks within 33-27 and set up the onside kick attempt.

The Ducks (3-0) recovered the kick on their own 48, but Oklahoma (2-1) argued that an Oregon player touched the ball before it went 10 yards, which would have given the Sooners possession. Officials delayed play for an instant replay review, but the call stood, and Dixon went to work.

After a pass interference call on Oklahoma again had Sommers coach Bob Stoops shaking his head on the sideline, Dixon threw a 28-yard TD pass to Brian Paysinger with 46 seconds, to give Oregon the lead.

Oklahoma's wasn't done though as Reggie Smith returned a punt kick 55 yards to the Duck 27...

Brady Quinn and the Notre Dame Fighting Irish dropped 10 spots in the poll to No. 12 after their 47-21 loss to Michigan on Saturday.

Road woes continue for UM

the goal, it deflates you," Shea said. "We have to save the savable shots, and we're not doing that in the beginning of games."

Northeastern would tally another score at the 22-minute mark to take a 3-0 lead. While the Huskies carried play early in the game, the Minutewomen began to take control towards the end the first half.

Freshman midfielder Cher King put UMass on the board with 3:50 left before the break.

The positive momentum for the Minutewomen continued from the outset of the second half, throwing a flurry of shots at junior goalkeeper Liz Centofanti. UMass was unable to capitalize on several opportunities, including its first penalty stroke of the season.

Centofanti stood out as the star for the Huskies in the second half, making two key saves against sophomore forward Erin Parker. On UMass' fifth penalty corner of the half, Parker blasted a shot that seemed labeled for the left corner of the net, but Centofanti made an impressive kick save.

Down by two goals with time running out, Shea had the Minutewomen playing aggressive hockey. UMass would pay the price for the offensive press, as Northeastern took advantage and nailed home the backbreaker with 7:33 left in regulation.

UMass out-shot Northeastern 12-10 along with a 5-4 advantage in penalty corners.

The following day against Boston University, the Minutewomen got better play from Letourneau but could not solve the defensive press of the Terriers.

Again, the Minutewomen fell behind early when Gabby Hajjar scored just over five minutes into the game. That would be the only scoring for the Terriers until the very end of the game, when a goal was scored on a penalty stroke after time had expired.

The Minutewomen could not generate any sustained offense, taking only five shots, none of which were on goal.

Going into the game, Shea wanted the team to make better passes and utilize open space more effectively.

"One of our main things we say on the sidelines is to attack the open side," Shea said. "Sometimes we make some poor decisions, and try to force the ball instead of looking for the open side of the field."

Against a pressing BU team, UMass had trouble getting into the offensive zone, let alone creating scoring opportunities.

"Offensively we tried to do it all with one pass, instead of using multiple passes," said Shea. "We didn't know our game plan very well."

Shea emphasized a lack of offensive organization and cooperation as reasons for the struggles against the Terriers defense.

Both teams the Minutewomen faced this weekend finished with 16-6 records last season, while the Terriers received a NCAA tournament berth. Last season, the Minutewomen dropped a 2-1 decision against BU in overtime, and fell 4-1 against Northeastern.

"We know we can compete with these teams," Shea said. "One of the biggest things is we have to be more disciplined to stay within a game plan and we have to have the ability to trust our decisions and our teammates' decisions."

Shea is confident that improved team play will lead to more victories. "We can't do it individually," Shea said. "We have to do it as a unit."

Looking forward, the performance of Letourneau or Williams will be the key. Letourneau played a solid game against the Terriers, keeping the Minutewomen within striking distance.

Up next for the Minutewomen is the final game of their eight-game road trip on Wednesday at Dartmouth.

Sophomore forward Katelyn Orlando is third on UMass in points with four. Her two assists is tied for the most on the team.

O'Brien sets school record with 69th win

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON — The winningest coach in Boston College history left the stadium after his school-record 69th victory and had dinner at home with his parents.

For Tom O'Brien, the best thing about his personal milestone is that it's now in the past.

"I'm honored to be able to do it," he said Sunday, a day after BC won its second consecutive double-overtime game, beating Brigham Young 30-23. "But there's a lot of people who have a lot to do with it. I certainly am not totally responsible for any one of the victories."

All week, whenever he was asked about surpassing Joe Yukica's win total, O'Brien tried to turn the conversation to the game against the Cougars. But after BC (3-0) held off BYU (1-2) with Jamie Silva's replay-review interception in the second overtime, his players lifted him to their shoulders to celebrate.

"I'm just glad they put me back down," O'Brien said.

The victory moved BC from 23rd in The Associated Press Top 25 to No. 20, tied with Arizona State. Although BC beat then-No.18 Clemson in its previous game, the Tigers were ranked 19th in the poll released Sunday after beating No. 9 Florida State 27-20 in Tallahassee.

"We only beat an 18th ranked team and they beat a ninth ranked team," O'Brien said. "I guess that's why they're there."

Though O'Brien tried to spread the credit, his players said he's the one who sets the tone that kept the team focused on overtime despite Boston College defeated Brigham Young 30-23 in overtime on Saturday. The win gave Eagles' coach Tom O'Brien a school-record 69th victory.

Hurricanes knocked out of national poll

By Ralph D. Russo
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Miami is out of the rankings for the first time since 1999, and Auburn is the new No. 2 in The Associated Press Top 25.

The Hurricanes' latest lopsided loss — a 31-7 debacle at Louisville — ended a streak of 107 consecutive poll appearances that was the nation's longest current streak.

"That doesn't really change anything," Miami coach Larry Coker said Sunday. "The poll didn't help us yesterday and the poll won't help us tomorrow. Doesn't change anything."

With seven games matching ranked teams on Saturday, the poll got its first significant shake-up of the season.

Not at the very top, though, as Ohio State remained No. 1 for the fourth straight week. The Buckeyes received 59 first-place votes from a panel of 65 media members.

Notre Dame's first loss of the season vacated a spot right behind Ohio State, and Auburn took advantage.

The Tigers, who beat LSU 7-3, have their highest ranking since tying for No. 2 with Oklahoma on Nov. 13, 2004. The Tigers received two first-place votes and are the third team to hold the second spot in the Top 25 this season, along with Notre Dame and Texas.

"We've got a lot of games to play. We're very fortunate to be where we're at," Auburn coach Tommy Tuberville said. "I don't know whether we're a top-five team. We're playing pretty good, but we're not playing to our potential on both sides of the ball yet."

Auburn was 13 points ahead of No. 3 USC.

West Virginia was up to No. 4. Both the Trojans and Mountaineers received two first-place votes. Florida was fifth, up two places after a 21-20 win at Tennessee.

In the USA Today coaches' poll, Ohio State was No. 1 with USC second and Auburn, West Virginia and Florida rounding out the top five.

Michigan moved up five spots to No. 6 after its 47-21 victory at Notre Dame, and the Fighting Irish fell 10 spots to No. 12. Texas was No. 7, and the Longhorns now have the longest current streak of poll appearances at 96, dating to Oct. 15, 2000.

Louisville moved up four spots to No. 8 after sending Miami to its first 1-2 start since 1997. The Hurricanes received 78 points, leaving them second behind Alabama among the others receiving votes.

Georgia was No. 9 and LSU slipped four spots to No. 10. No. 11 was Virginia Tech, followed by Notre Dame and Oregon, which jumped five spots after its wild 34-33 victory over Oklahoma.

No. 14 was Iowa and Tennessee dropped two spots to 15th. TCU moved up four spots to No. 16 after extending the nation's longest winning streak to 13 games. Oklahoma dropped two spots to No. 17 and Florida State fell nine spots to No. 18 after it lost 27-20 to Clemson. The Tigers' victory put them back in the rankings at No. 19.

Arizona State and Boston College were tied at No. 20. The final four were California, Nebraska, Penn State and Boise State. Nebraska was down four spots after a 28-10 loss at USC, and Boise State joined the rankings for the first time this season.

AP Sports Writers Tim Reynolds in Coral Gables, Fla., and John Zenor in Auburn, Ala., contributed to this report.

Tyrone Moss and the Miami Hurricanes are out of the Top 25 rankings for the first time since 1999 after their 31-7 loss to Louisville on Saturday.

Louisville quarterback Brian Brohm led his team to a 31-7 victory over Miami on Saturday. The win knocked the Hurricanes out of the national rankings.

Fighting Irish drop to No. 12 in the nation

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — Take that, Notre Dame.

No. 11 Michigan finally put a Big Blue bruising on the second-ranked Fighting Irish in a 47-21 rout Saturday — the most points scored against Notre Dame at home in 46 years.

Chad Henne threw three touchdown passes to Mario Manningham, and the Wolverines intercepted Brady Quinn three times and shut down the rest of the Irish offense.

Prescott Burgess intercepted Quinn on the second play of the game to set the tone. The Wolverines were ahead 26-7 before the Irish had their initial first down.

The Wolverines (3-0) ended a two-game losing streak to Notre Dame (2-1), as well as a three-game slide at Notre Dame Stadium. The 47 points were second only to the 51 scored at Notre Dame by Purdue in 1960.

It was a huge win for Michigan coach Lloyd Carr, who had been under fire for failing to win big games the past two seasons — twice in bowl games and twice each to Notre Dame and Ohio State. Carr, though, improved to 4-1 against No. 2 teams and 16-6 against Top 10 teams.

It was just the eighth time the Irish have given up at least 40 points at home.

Henne finished 12-of-22 for 220 yards; Quinn, who has never had a big game against Michigan, was 24-of-28 for 234 yards with three interceptions and a lost fumble.

No. 3 Auburn 7, No. 6 LSU 3

AUBURN, Ala. — The Auburn Tigers survived another bruising showdown with LSU thanks to a stingy defense that wouldn't budge and a reversed call that went their way late in the game.

Eric Brock deflected a pass near the goal line to stop one late drive and then made a game-saving tackle on the final play to preserve the win for Auburn (3-0, 2-0).

With LSU (2-1, 0-1 SEC) facing fourth-and-8 from Auburn's 31 and 2:43 left, JaMarcus Russell lired the ball to Early Doucet near the goal line. A diving Brock deflected the pass, but Zach Gilbert was called for pass interference that would have kept the drive alive.

The officials overturned the call, although replays showed the contact came before the ball was tipped by Brock. LSU got the ball back at its 20 for another try with 1:11 left, drove to the Auburn 24 but a final pass completion fell 6 yards short of the goal line on the final play.

No. USC 28, No. 19 Nebraska 10

LOS ANGELES — If there was any doubt, USC declared itself a national title contender for a fourth straight season with a victory over Nebraska.

USC (2-0) won for the 36th time in 37 games, the lone defeat coming to Texas in the final seconds of last January's Rose Bowl. The Trojans' home winning streak is now 28 straight games.

Making his second career start, John David Booty was 25-for-36 for 257 with no interceptions and three touchdown passes for USC in a Leinart-esque performance.

All-American receiver Dwayne Jarrett, the one holdover star from last year's record-breaking offense, caught 11 passes for 126 yards, including two touchdowns. He became USC's career touchdown receptions leader with 31, breaking Mike Williams' record of 30.

Freshman Emmanuel Moody ran for 70 yards on nine carries.

The bigger story on this day may have been the Trojans' defense, which dominated the Cornhuskers (2-1).

No. 7 Florida 21, No. 13 Tennessee

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. — Dallas Baker caught a 21-yard touchdown pass from Chris Leak that gave Florida the lead in the fourth quarter and the Gators held on to beat Tennessee.

Florida's Urban Meyer's first trip to Neyland Stadium as a head coach was a success as he made it two straight against the Vols.

The No. 7 Gators (3-0, 1-0 Southeastern Conference) preserved the victory when Reggie Nelson got his second interception of the game after Tennessee went for it on fourth down at the Florida 45.

Leak finished 15-of-25 for 199 yards with one interception and freshman QB Tim Tebow provided a spark with his running.

Tennessee (2-1, 0-1) was held to minus-11 yards rushing, and Ainge struggled in going 17-of-32 for 183 yards.

No. 1 Ohio State 37, Cincinnati 7

COLUMBUS, Ohio — Ohio State took a while to get on track before Troy Smith and Ted Ginn Jr. hooked up on two touchdown passes to start the Buckeyes on their way to victory.

The defense held the Bearcats (1-2) to minus-4 yards on 22 attempts. The Buckeyes (3-0) had eight sacks for minus 59 yards.

Still, they didn't have a firm grip on the game until fullback Antonio Pittman raced 48 yards around left end for a score with 10 minutes remaining to push the lead to 27-7. Pittman finished with 155 yards on

Maroon and White comes out on top in A-10 opener

VILLANOVA, Pa. – The Massachusetts football team (2-1, 1-0 Atlantic 10) is known for its stingy defense. The Minutemen held opponents to a slim 13.3 points per game last season, and suffocated Navy's lethal option offense last Saturday, allowing a season-low of 21 points.

Early on against Villanova (0-3, 0-1 A-10) yesterday, in UMass' first conference game of the season, the Minutemen's defense turned in a sub-par first half (14 points allowed) before putting the clamps on and dealing the Wildcats a 31-21 loss at Villanova Stadium.

Villanova	21

Sophomore quarterback Liam Coen tossed his third-career 300-yard passing game, scattering 21 completions to seven different receivers for a hefty 350 yards in the air.

"Liam, obviously, played really well," UMass coach Don Brown said. "He did a great job managing the football game."

Senior wide receiver Brandon London caught five passes for 104 yards, the fourth 100-yard game of his career.

"I have to give credit to Villanova," Brown said. "The game was certainly a difficult one. It was a typical, hard-fought Atlantic 10 football game."

For Brown, the defensive guru who piloted UMass to a national championship in 1998 as the team's defensive coordinator, the start to yesterday's game couldn't have been worse.

The Wildcats started at their own 28-yard line and, on the first play from scrimmage, executed a flawless end-around play that gained 48 yards before a stunned UMass defense recovered from the play fake.

From UMass's 24-yard line, the seas parted for DeQueve May, who scurried into the endzone untouched on a counter play.

It was 7-0. Just 42 seconds had ticked off the clock.

"[Villanova] came out with the reverse and hit the counter play for a touchdown," Brown stated. "But I thought we settled down and made some adjustments through the second quarter and through the half."

Running back Steve Baylark plowed in from the 10-yard line to notch UMass's first score at the 14:19 mark of the second half, tying the game at 7-all. Baylark, the Minutemen's 1,000-yard rusher three seasons running, finished the day with 104 yards on 23 carries.

With his touchdown at the beginning of the second quarter,

Return of London sparks UMass offense

VILLANOVA, Pa. – After hitting several big plays in the first quarter against Navy last weekend, the Massachusetts football team couldn't get much going on offense in the last three quarters of the game.

One of the main reasons was because it was without one of its key offensive weapons – senior wide receiver Brandon London. He – along with linebacker Brad Anderson – sat out that game due to a violation of undisclosed team rules.

"It hurt watching it on the TV," said London of missing the game last week. "I hate being without my boys. I wish I could have been there, but I put that mistake behind me. All week [I was] hungry just waiting for an opportunity like this."

This week, London returned to his usual position on the outside in UMass' 31-21 defeat of Villanova.

Against the Wildcats, he returned in a big way. London caught five passes on the day for 104 yards and a key fourth quarter touchdown that sealed the win for the Maroon and White.

Saturday marked the fifth time in his career in which he recorded a 100-yard receiving day. Also, his second catch of the day was the 100th of his career with the Minutemen.

London's 6-foot-4, 225-pound frame gave him an advantage over the Wildcats' secondary all day. Allyn Bacchus – a Villanova defensive back and the team's leading tackler Saturday – checks in at 6-feet 205 lbs.

"It's really tough, especially when their guys are [6-foot-5, 6-foot-4] on both edges. It's kind of like pick your poison," Bacchus said.

Villanova coach Andy Talley echoed Bacchus' remarks. "There were some mismatches there with their wide receivers," he said. "We just weren't as physical with them as they were with us."

The Minutemen tried going to London early in the game. On their first drive, sophomore quarterback Liam Coen tried to hit him on a deep out, but the ball fell incomplete.

Again on the team's second possession, Coen threw to Another 1-0 score glowed from the scoreboard over Rudd Field at the end of Sunday's game for the Massachusetts men's soccer team. For the first time this season, however, the game's single goal belonged to the visiting team.

No. 22 UMass (6-1-1) dropped its first game this season to Vermont (3-3-2) in another close battle. The Minutemen take the field again on Wednesday when they host New Hampshire.

Sunday's game also marked the first time this season that the Maroon and White have been shut out. UMass coach Sam Koch's first reaction to the game was "disappointment."

"We played well, we moved the ball well and we created chances," Koch said. "We had good opportunities to finish and we didn't. Then we gave up a bad goal with two minutes left."

In the 89th minute, Vermont forward Tyler Hasman broke through the defense on the right side of the field. UMass goalkeeper Zack Simmons committed to that side and made the save, deflecting the ball toward the middle of the field.

Vermont's T. J. Gore moved forward to field the rebound. He then drove in an easy goal past a helpless Chris Brown, who tried to fill the void left by Simmons, who was still on the ground after the initial save.

"I hesitated," Simmons said. "At this level when you hesitate, the other team takes advantage of it. It was just a ball over the top, and I should have been off my line for it, but I hesitated.

"It's frustrating because I feel like I made a mistake," he added. "It's a tough feeling to feel like I let the other guys down, but you've got to move on."

Despite the loss, Koch is still confident in his goalkeeper, who is only in his second season.

"He's done a great job for us all season," Koch said. "I thought there were a couple times where the ball was right at the edge of the 18, and he handled it well. But a couple times he showed that that's something we've just got to keep working on. He's been very good for us all season, so I've got no complaints.

"It looks like there was some miscommunication in the back," he continued. "It's unfortunate, but it happens. We can't worry about it because we've got to get ready for Wednesday. We play New Hampshire on Wednesday so we've got to fire right back up and get ready to go."

Twice earlier in the game, UMass experienced a near miss when a Vermont player brought the ball inside the box.

Eight minutes into the second half, Vermont brought the ball into the box and caught Simmons slightly out of position towards the right side of the net. The shot came across to the left side, but sophomore midfielder Tony Bassett headed the ball out of the zone from inside the net, ending the Vermont attack.

"That was a big save for us," Koch said. "That could have been

The Minutewomen (5-1) came from behind to upset the Ivy League Bulldogs (1-3-1) in New Haven, Conn., despite cold and rainy weather conditions.

Senior Nadia Villarroel scored the game-winning goal with 45 seconds remaining in regulation.

Citing that both teams played well, UMass coach Jim Rudy mentioned it was a shame that both teams could not have come out as the victor.

"Nobody should have lost this game," Rudy said.

He is now setting his sights on the Connecticut Huskies, whom his team is scheduled to play on Tuesday.

In last year's contest between the two squads, No. 19 UConn bested the Minutewomen by a score of 4-0. The Huskies, who outshot the Minutewomen 16-1, scored three second-half goals to clinch the victory in what was

While the mercury climbed in Boston this weekend, the Massachusetts field hockey team dropped two games against tough opponents.

The Minutewomen (2-5) lost a 4-2 decision against the Northeastern Huskies (3-3) at Sweeney Field on Saturday. While play was better the following afternoon at Jack Berry Field, the result was the same as the Boston University Terriers blanked UMass 2-0.

With temperatures pushing 80 degrees and traffic speeding by on Huntington Avenue, the Huskies ran over the Minutewomen early, scoring two goals in the first six minutes of play. Junior goalkeeper Becky Letourneau allowed two goals in the first three shots.

UMass coach Patty Shea, a former goalkeeper standout in her playing days, was quick to point out the vital role of the backstop.

"We needed better play from our goalkeeper early," Shea said. "So we had to sub her out [for freshman Sarah Williams] and we settled down right after that."

Playing from behind is something the Minutewomen have grown accustomed to this season, having been scored upon first in all seven contests.

Shea does not attribute the team's early game woes to a lack of preparation.

"Sometimes we're afraid of how good we are and how powerful we can be at the beginning of games," Shea said. "The bottom line is that we feel we are ready and prepared to play."

Woman is kidnapped by parents for abortion

BY KATHARINE WEBSTER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

SALEM, N.H. – A Maine couple was ordered held Monday on $100,000 bond each after police said they became so infuriated their 19-year-old daughter was pregnant, they tied her up, loaded her into their Lexus and headed to New York to force her to get an abortion.

Real estate developer Nicholas Kampf, 54, and his wife, Lola, 53, of North Yarmouth, Maine, were arrested at a shopping center in Salem on Friday after their daughter, Katelyn, escaped by persuading her parents she needed to use the restroom and called police. They were arraigned Monday on kidnapping charges.

The alleged abduction began with an argument earlier Friday at the parents' home, police said.

"Her parents chased her out into the yard, grabbed and tied her hands and feet together," Salem Police Officer Sean Marino wrote in a court affidavit. "Katelyn states that her father then carried her to their car and they headed toward New Hampshire."

At some point, Katelyn Kampf managed to hide her father's cell phone in her pants, police said. When Nicholas Kampf couldn't find the phone, he stopped in Salem to buy a temporary phone, and that's when his daughter sought permission to use the restroom, according to police.

Authorities found her parents circling the shopping center parking lot in their car. When police stopped them, Lola Kampf opened the door, and an officer saw rope, duct tape and scissors, police said.

Salem Police Prosecutor Scott McFarland said that during the more than two-hour car trip from Maine through New Hampshire and Massachusetts, the parents repeatedly "threatened to kill the victim, the unborn child, the father and his family."

Defense attorney Mark Sisti said there was no evidence of any threats. In fact, he said during the arraignment Monday, Katelyn Kampf told police she was not hurt during the trip and that she and her parents "had been talking cordially," Sisti said, reading from a police affidavit.

"What we're dealing with here is a terrible family tragedy with some unfortunate misunderstandings and some overreaction, perhaps on all sides — but not an attempt to terrorize anybody," he said.

Judge John Korbey set bail at $100,000 cash or bond for each of the Kampfs and ordered them to have no contact with their daughter. He also ordered them to turn in their passports and forbade them to leave New Hampshire or Maine. They must return to court for a probable cause hearing Sept. 26.

If convicted, the Kampfs face 7 1/2 to 15 years in prison. They also could face charges in Maine or federal charges, because they

Massachusetts professors endorse Patrick

BY MATT BELLIVEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP) has announced their official support of Democratic candidate Deval Patrick in the Massachusetts race for governor.

The MSP, which consists of faculty and librarians from the University of Massachusetts, endorsed Patrick after inviting all of the gubernatorial candidates to campus to discuss their policy positions.

"Deval Patrick is the best candidate to advance the cause of public education in Massachusetts," said MSP Vice President Dan Clawson. "Deval's plan, 'Moving Massachusetts Forward,' charts an encouraging course for our colleges and universities, the K-12 system, and early childhood education."

Patrick pointed out the advantages of investing in UMass as a means to advance important research and to promote economic development. Patrick heavily criticized the Romney-Healey administration for cutting funding for public higher education. Massachusetts now ranks 47th in the nation in state support for higher education.

"We have confidence in Deval Patrick because he recognizes the professional talent and the potential of our public university resources," said Max Page, president of MSP. "Massachusetts citizens deserve the best public research university system in the country. We believe Deval Patrick shares that vision."

Patrick, 50, has not held elective office but he has served in significant appointed office, as chief of the civil rights division in the U.S. Justice Department under President Clinton.

Patrick currently holds onto a huge lead in a CBS4 East Track survey, ahead of Chris Gabrieli by 17 points going into today's primary. Tom Reilly is 24 points behind.

According to a East Track survey of 682 likely Massachusetts Democratic Primary voters, conducted exclusively for CBS4, Patrick received 46 percent while fellow candidate Chris Gabrieli has received 29 percent and Tom Reilly, 22 percent. Three percent are still undecided. The margin of error is 3.8 percent.

In the East Track survey, Patrick appears to be drawing most of his support from the most liberal, educated, and affluent voters.

Gabrieli leads among conservatives and voters who have not attended college. He also runs strongly among younger voters, male voters, and independents.

Patrick has been on top in the last six surveys, but he's been building huge support in the last four weeks.

Democratic gubernatorial hopeful Deval Patrick pats Dale Morcia on the back as he greets voters at Downtown Crossing in Boston, Sept. 18, 2006.

Deval Patrick, runs neckandneck with his opponents in the Democratic gubernatorial race. The question whether Massachusetts voters are ready to elect their first black governor will be answered in the Democratic primary today.

JFK's sister dies from pneumonia complications

BY KAREN MATTHEWS

NEW YORK — Patricia Kennedy Lawford, whose marriage to Peter Lawford lent Hollywood glamour and Rat Pack cool to the Kennedy political dynasty, has died at age 82.

Lawford died Sunday of complications from pneumonia at her New York home, brother Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass, said through a spokeswoman.

"My sister Pat is irreplaceable," Kennedy said in a statement. "Everyone who knew Pat adored her. She was admired for her great style, for her love and support of the arts, her wit and generosity — and for the singular sense of wonder and joy she brought into our lives."

Her death leaves three surviving Kennedy siblings: the senator, Eunice Kennedy Shriver and Jean Kennedy Smith.

In his 2005 best-seller, "Symptoms of Withdrawal," her actor son, Christopher Lawford, wrote of his mother that "her lightheartedness and vibrancy made her my grandfather's favorite." But he said she also felt resentment toward her father "at not being allowed fully to live up to her potential."

She met the handsome British-born actor Peter Lawford through her brother John F. Kennedy, the future president, in 1949. They were married in 1954 and had four children.

Lawford was a member of Frank Sinatra's circle of friends dubbed the Rat Pack, appearing in the original version of "Ocean's Eleven" in 1960. Christopher Lawford wrote that Sinatra, Judy Garland, Henry Fonda and Milton Berle used to drop by the Lawford family's California beachfront home and that his mother thought of Marilyn Monroe as "her little sister."

But the Lawford-Kennedy marriage was troubled and ended in 1965 in a bitter divorce, the first for a member of the staunchly Roman Catholic Kennedy clan.

Laurence Leamer, author of "The Kennedy Women," said that Patricia Lawford couldn't handle her husband's philandering and well-documented drinking and drug use.

"When she married Peter Lawford she was very much an innocent thrown into this world

54 people arrested at parties this weekend

The Amherst Police Department (APD) remained busy for the second weekend in a row.

Officers responded to nearly 30 noise complaints throughout the weekend. Six individuals were arrested and over 500 college-aged individuals were cleared out of a large party on Gray Street.

Officers were also forced to respond to numerous complaints in a North Amherst apartment complex. Four individuals were arrested and approximately 200 to 400 people were dispersed from the areas, during which beer cans and bottles were hurled at officers.

All arrested individuals will be arraigned this week in the eastern Hampshire District Court.

The department's busy weekend came just a week after the APD arrested 54 people, broke up a party of 1,500 people at the Amherst Town Houses, took over 203 calls "for service" and heard over 31 complaints of noise disturbance, assaults, domestics and several reports of vandalism to private property.

U.S. falls behind in students earning degrees

BY JULIE STEINBERG
DAILY PENNSYLVANIAN (U. PENN)

PHILADELPHIA—The United States boasts the world's largest economy, its strongest army and perhaps the most diverse population in the world.

But when it comes to its citizens graduating from college, America can't claim any similar superlative.

The United States has slipped behind other nations in the numbers of students who finish their degrees, according to a report released by the National Center for Public Policy and Higher Education, a California-based think tank.

And a significant generational gap is emerging.

Though the United States still ranks among the top nations in the proportion of 35- to 64-year-olds with college degrees, it has dropped to seventh in the 25-to-34-year-old demographic.

Yet Penn officials say these statistics don't reflect the University's own graduation rates.

According to statistics from the Penn Office of Institutional Research and Analysis, the six-year graduation rate for both 2004 and 2005 was 94 percent.

Colleges throughout Pennsylvania are keeping up, too.

According to the Measuring Up 2006 State Report Card — a publication that assesses individual states' performances in education — Pennsylvania received an A for degree-completion rates.

Across the nation, though, graduation rates are plummeting.

Education policy advisers say that there are several reasons for the decline, with financial and cultural factors contributing.

More and more lower-income students are heading to college, according to Tony Palz, a spokesman for the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities.

But tuition rates are simultaneously spiraling up, he said, while federal grants are decreasing in value.

Ultimately, this means that more poorer students are heading to college but cannot afford to finish which contributes to a higher drop-out rate, Palz said.

Associated Press photographer detained in Iraq

By Robert Tanner
Associated Press

IRAQ—The U.S. military in Iraq has imprisoned an Associated Press photographer for five months, accusing him of being a security threat but never filing charges or permitting a public hearing.

Military officials said that Bilal Hussein, an Iraqi citizen, was being held for "imperative reasons of security" under United Nations resolutions, and a Pentagon spokesman reiterated that stance on Monday. AP executives said the news cooperative's review of Hussein's work did not find anything to indicate inappropriate contact with insurgents, and any evidence against him should be brought to the Iraqi criminal justice system.

Hussein, 35, is a native of Fallujah who began work for the AP in September 2004. He photographed events in Fallujah and Ramadi until he was detained on April 12 of this year.

"We want the rule of law to prevail. He either needs to be charged or released. Indefinite detention is not acceptable," said Tom Curley, AP's president and chief executive officer. "We've come to the conclusion that this is unacceptable under Iraqi law, or Geneva Conventions, or any military procedure."

Hussein is one of an estimated 14,000 people detained by the U.S. military worldwide — 13,000 of them in Iraq. They are held in limbo where few are ever charged with a specific crime or given a chance before any court or tribunal to argue for their freedom.

In Hussein's case, the military has not provided any concrete evidence to back up the vague allegations they have raised about him, Curley and other AP executives said.

The military said Hussein was captured with two insurgents, including Hamid Hamad Motib, an alleged leader of al-Qaida in Iraq.

"He has close relationships with persons known to be responsible for kidnappings, smuggling, improvised explosive device (IED) attacks and other attacks on coalition forces," according to a May 7 e-mail from U.S. Army Maj. Gen. Jack Gardner, who oversees all coalition detainees in Iraq.

"The information available establishes that he has relationships with insurgents and is afforded access to insurgent activities outside the normal scope afforded to journalists conducting legitimate activities," Gardner wrote to AP International Editor John Daniszewski.

Hussein proclaims his innocence, according to his Iraqi lawyer, Badie Arief Izzat, and believes he has been unfairly targeted because his photos from Ramadi and Fallujah were deemed unwelcome by the coalition forces.

That Hussein was captured at the same time as insurgents doesn't make him one of them, said Kathleen Carroll, AP's executive editor.

"Journalists have always had relationships with people that others might find unsavory," she said. "We're not in this to choose sides, we're to report what's going on from all sides."

AP executives in New York and Baghdad have sought to persuade U.S. officials to provide additional information about allegations against Hussein and to have his case transferred to the Iraqi criminal justice system. The AP contacted military leaders in Iraq and the Pentagon, and later the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad.

The AP has worked quietly until now, believing that would be the best approach. But with the U.S. military giving no indication it would change its stance, the news cooperative has decided to make public Hussein's imprisonment, hoping the spotlight will bring attention to his case and that of thousands of others now held in Iraq, Curley said.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said on Monday that military authorities have reviewed Hussein's case and recommended his continued detention. Whitman said it would be up to Iraq's criminal court to charge Hussein.

But Whitman is being "disingenuous," said Dave Tomlin, AP's associate general counsel, because the military's decision to detain him indefinitely means that the Iraqi court system can't charge him. The AP has specifically asked that his case be turned over to Iraqi courts, so he gets a public hearing.

One of Hussein's photos was part of a package of 20 photographs that won a Pulitzer Prize for breaking news photography last year. His contribution was an image of four insurgents in Fallujah firing a mortar and small arms during the U.S.-led offensive in the city in November 2004.

In what several AP editors described as a typical path for locally hired staff in the midst of a conflict, Hussein, a shopkeeper who sold cell phones and computers in Fallujah, was hired in the city as a general helper because of his local knowledge.

As the situation in Fallujah eroded in 2004, he expressed a desire to become a photographer. Hussein was given training and camera equipment and hired in September of that year as a freelancer, paid on a per-picture basis, according to Santiago Lyon, AP's director of photography. A month later, he was put on a monthly retainer.

During the U.S.-led offensive in Fallujah in November 2004, he stayed on after his family fled. "He had good access. He was able to photograph not only the results of the attacks on Fallujah, he was also able to photograph members of the insurgency on occasion," Lyon said. "That was very difficult to achieve at that time."

After fleeing later in the offensive, leaving his camera behind in the rush to escape, Hussein arrived in Baghdad, where the AP gave him a new camera. He then went to work in Ramadi which, like Fallujah, has been a center of insurgent violence.

In its own effort to determine whether Hussein had gotten too close to the insurgency, the AP has reviewed his work record, interviewed senior photo editors who worked on his images and examined all 420 photographs in the news cooperative's archives that were taken by Hussein, Lyon said.

Associated Press photographer, Bilal Hussein was deemed a security threat and has been imprisoned in Iraq for five months.

The military in Iraq has frequently detained journalists who arrive quickly at scenes of violence, accusing them of getting advance notice from insurgents, Lyon said. But "that's just good journalism. Getting to the event quickly is something that characterizes good journalism anywhere in the world. It does not indicate prior knowledge," he said.

Out of Hussein's body of work, only 37 photos show insurgents or people who could be insurgents, Lyon said. "The vast majority of the 420 images show the aftermath or the results of the conflict — blown up houses, wounded people, dead people, street scenes," he said.

Only four photos show the wreckage of still-burning U.S. military vehicles.

"Do we know absolutely everything about him, and what he did before he joined us? No. Are we satisfied that what he did since he joined us was appropriate for the level of work we expected from him? Yes," Lyon said. "When we reviewed the work he submitted to us, we found it appropriate to what we'd asked him to do."

The AP does not knowingly hire combatants or anyone who is part of a story, company executives said. But hiring competent local staff in combat areas is vital to the news service, because often only local people can pick their way around the streets with a reasonable degree of safety.

"We want people who are not part of a story. Sometimes it is a judgment call. If someone seems to be thuggish, or like a fighter, you certainly wouldn't hire them," Daniszewski said. After they are hired, their work is checked carefully for signs of bias.

Lyon said every image from

Suicide bombers leave 19 dead

By Noor Khan
Associated Press

KAFIR BAND, Afghanistan — Three suicide bombers killed at least 19 people across Afghanistan on Monday, including four Canadian soldiers in an attack that tested NATO's claim of success in driving insurgents from this volatile southern region.

The deadliest attack was in the usually calm western city of Herat, where a militant strapped with explosives and riding a motorbike killed 11 people and wounded 18, including the deputy police chief, officials said.

The third attack, a car bombing in the capital, Kabul, killed at least four policemen and wounded one officer and 10 civilians.

Afghanistan has been suffering the heaviest insurgent attacks since the Taliban was toppled in late 2001, and the bombings came a day after NATO ended a two-week offensive against Taliban fighters in this region that the commander called a "significant success."

"It does appear that they are resorting to these despicable tactics after the pressure we have them under in their strongholds," a NATO spokesman, Maj. Luke Knittig, said in Kabul.

NATO's Operation Medusa centered on southern Kandahar province's Panjwayi district, where the first of Monday's suicide bombings killed four Canadian infantrymen delivering aid and wounded an unspecified number of other troops, the Canadian military said.

The bombing was claimed by a purported Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousaf Ahmadi, in a telephone call to an Associated Press reporter.

NATO said 25 civilians also were wounded in the blast in Kafir Band, a clutch of mud-brick homes surrounded by grape and pomegranate orchards.

"Fifty to 60 soldiers were patrolling on the main street when a man on a bicycle stopped and blew himself up near the forces," said Fazel Mohammed, a farmer who lives near the blast site.

The explosion tore through the Canadian patrol, shredding uniforms and military equipment. Blood soaked into the dusty road, and the bomber's legs ended up near a gold-colored military patch torn from a soldier's uniform.

Four helicopters hovered over the village, and at least two landed to retrieve the wounded and dead soldiers, Mohammed said.

"This attack amounts to a serious violation of international humanitarian law," said Tom Koenigs, the top U.N. official in Afghanistan.

The commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. David Richards, said the attack took place as Canadian troops were arranging aid, reconstruction and development for villagers in the district, which suffered heavy damage during the NATO offensive.

"It is beyond comprehension that a suicide bomber should choose this time to attack, knowing that he could kill innocent children," Richards said in a statement.

At least 36 Canadian soldiers have been killed in Afghanistan since 2002. Five died during Operation Medusa, in which NATO estimated it killed at least 510 insurgents with airstrikes and ground assaults.

On Sunday, Richards called Operation Medusa a success and said NATO had reclaimed crucial territory from the Taliban.

Most of the village's 25 families fled the fighting and only the desperately poor stayed behind, Mohammed said.

"Taliban were in this village before, but now there are fewer remaining," said another villager, shopkeeper Jan Mohammed. "But if you kill 100 or 1,000 Taliban, another 1,000 will come to continue the fighting."

Equipment fails on space station

An equipment failure caused the first-ever emergency aboard the international space station Sept. 18, 2006.

By Seth Borenstein
Associated Press

HOUSTON—An oxygen generator on the international space station overheated and spilled a toxic irritant Monday, forcing the three-man crew to don masks and gloves in the first emergency ever declared aboard the 8-year-old orbiting outpost.

NASA said the crew members' lives were never in any danger. They cleaned up the spill with towels. A charcoal filter scrubbed the irritant out of the air. And within a couple of hours life, aboard the station 220 miles above Earth was nearly back to normal.

But it was the biggest scare this smooth-running space station has had.

Although it paled in comparison to two fires and a collision on two previous Russian space stations and the nearly fatal explosion on Apollo 13, the incident served as a reminder of how life-and-death emergencies can come out of nowhere. It is why an emergency space capsule is always parked at the outpost in case of a sudden order to abandon ship.

NASA never came close to ordering the crew to leave the station, space station program manager Mike Suffredini said. But astronauts did reveal they were worried.

About three hours after the emergency, station commander Pavel Vinogradov tried to explain what happened to Moscow Mission Control, saying "different thoughts came to my mind." Russian flight controllers interrupted, telling him: "We were kind of nervous here, too."

NASA and the Russian space agency were investigating what caused the problem.

"We don't exactly know the nature of the spill ... but the crew is doing well," Suffredini. "It's not a life-threatening material."

The astronauts sounded an alarm after the equipment began smoking and turned off the ventilation system to avoid spreading any fumes from leaking drops of potassium hydroxide, which is used to power batteries.

FBI ends record-releasing program

By Elizabeth Geli & Lauren Perez
Daily Trojan (USC)

LOS ANGELES—The FBI has just ended a data-mining project that used student financial aid records to search for possible terrorists after Sept. 11.

Project Strikeback began soon after Sept. 11, 2001, and ran possible terrorist names against the files of students who had recently filed for financial aid, primarily through the Federal Application for Student Aid. The search spanned schools across the country; however, fewer than 1,000 names were looked at.

"[Students] have no reason to be concerned; we were using a system that's been in place since 1974, and we exercised all of the proper safeguards," said Mary Mitchelson, counsel to the inspector general of the Department of Education. The project ended in June because of very little activity.

John Miller, assistant director of public affairs for the FBI, said that it "exhausted the pool" of suspects. Miller could not comment on the results of the searches because of ongoing investigations.

Neither Miller nor Mitchelson could confirm if University of Southern California student records were searched in conjunction with Project Strikeback.

"I want to assure students that this was not at all widespread; it was a very limited effort," Mitchelson said.

FBI and Department of Education officials maintain that Project Strikeback was in concordance with the Privacy Act and a privacy notice on the FAFSA itself. Miller said that this was always public and posted on several government Web sites.

Most students, however, didn't read the fine print. "I don't remember what kind of waivers about release of information are on the FAFSA, but I certainly don't remember ever giving the FBI permission to search through my stuff," said Andrew Tomlin, a sophomore majoring in music industry.

Miller said that there were no "requirements" to notify students within the "guidelines" of the law.

This project began because intelligence at the time thought that terrorists might have been using student visas for identity theft and student-loan fraud.

"I understand that they were concerned because the majority of these terrorist students attended aviation schools," said Cathy Thomas, associate dean of Admission and Financial Aid at USC, in a voicemail. "I don't like student financial aid records being used for a phishing expedition without there being some charge of the individual student."

Most students said they do not see how the FAFSA is related to terrorism.

"What are they going to find in a FAFSA? I doubt how much money somebody's grandma gave them for college is going to identify them as a terrorist," Tomlin said.

local photographers is always "thoroughly checked and vetted" by experienced editors. "In every case where there have been images of insurgents, questions have been asked about circumstances under which the image was taken, and what the image shows," he said.

Executives said it's not uncommon for AP news people to be picked up by coalition forces and detained for hours, days or occasionally weeks, but never this long. Several hundred journalists in Iraq have been detained, some briefly and some for several weeks, according to Scott Horton, a New York-based lawyer hired by the AP to work on Hussein's case.

Horton also worked on behalf of an Iraqi cameraman employed by CBS, Abdul Ameer Younis Hussein, who was detained for one year before his case was sent to an Iraqi court on charges of insurgent activity. He was acquitted for lack of evidence.

AP officials emphasized the military has not provided the company concrete evidence of its claims against Bilal Hussein, or provided him a chance to offer a defense.

"He's a Sunni Arab from a tribe in that area. I'm sure he does know some nasty people. But is he a participant in the insurgency? I don't think that's been proven," Daniszewski said.

Information provided to the AP by the military to support the continued detention hasn't withstood scrutiny, when it could be checked, Daniszewski said.

For example, he said, the AP had been told that Hussein was involved with the kidnapping of two Arab journalists in Ramadi. But those journalists, tracked down by the AP, said Hussein had helped them after they were released by their captors without money or a vehicle in a dangerous part of Ramadi. After a journalist acquaintance put them in touch with Hussein, the photographer picked them up, gave them shelter and helped get them out of town, they said.

The journalists said they had never been contacted by multinational forces for their account.

Horton said the military has provided contradictory accounts of whether Hussein himself was a U.S. target last April or if he was caught up in a broader sweep.

The military said bomb-making materials were found in the apartment where Hussein was captured but it never detailed what those materials were. The military said he tested positive for traces of explosives. Horton said that was virtually guaranteed for anyone on the streets of Ramadi at that time.

Hussein has been a frequent target of conservative critics on the Internet, who raised questions about his images months before the military detained him. One blogger and author, Michelle Malkin, wrote about Hussein's detention on the day of his arrest, saying she'd been tipped by a military source.

Carroll said the role of journalists can be misconstrued and make them a target of critics. But that criticism is misplaced, she said.

"How can you know what a conflict is like if you're only with one side of the combatants?" she said. "Journalism doesn't work if we don't report and photograph all sides."

Defense says daughter left Maine on own accord

crossed state lines.

Investigators said rope, duct tape, scissors and a .22-caliber rifle were found in the Kampfs' vehicle and Nicholas Kampf had a loaded .22-caliber magazine clip and several bullets in his pants pocket.

Katelyn Kampf had been a student at Boston College, but was withdrawn by her parents because they disapproved of her boyfriend, Salem police told the Boston Globe.

She transferred to George Washington University in Washington, but secretly dropped out and returned to Maine, where she was living with her boyfriend's family in Portland.

The boyfriend, 22-year-old Reme Johnson, last week began serving a 6-month theft sentence at Androscoggin County Jail in Auburn, Maine.

Sistl said that based on the police affidavit, there was no evidence Katelyn was tied up while in New Hampshire.

"It's not a kidnapping. She freely went her own way ... without pursuit by either parent," he said.

Authorities in Maine were investigating what led up to the kidnapping, but said the parents apparently thought that, in light of their daughter's stage of pregnancy and differing state abortion laws, the abortion should be performed in New York.

Maine law prohibits the termination of pregnancy after the fetus is able to live outside the uterus unless the mother's life or health is at stake.

Lola and Nicholas Kampf were arrested Sept. 18, 2006 for kidnapping their own daughter.

While the law does not specify an age, it is generally between 20 and 27 weeks of pregnancy, said Dr. Dora Ann Mills, director of the Maine Center for Disease Control and Prevention. New York law prohibits abortions after the 24th week of pregnancy unless the mother's life is at stake.

Salem police declined to say how far along Katelyn Kampf's pregnancy was, but WMUR-TV said it was about 20 weeks.

The Kampfs moved from New York to Maine in the mid-1980s, and bought several properties in Portland. They renovated and sold the State Theater several years ago.

Lawford driven to alcoholism of incessant liquor and blatant sexuality and drugs," Leamer said in a telephone interview.

Leamer said Patricia Lawford was driven to alcoholism herself by her failed marriage and her brother's death in 1963.

"She was the gentlest, the sweetest of all the Kennedy sisters, and she suffered the most from the assassination of her brother," he said.

Patricia Kennedy was the sixth child and fourth daughter among Rose and Joseph Kennedy's nine children. She was a gifted athlete who could have been a professional golfer, Leamer said.

Inspired by her father's career in the movie industry, she set her sights on Hollywood soon after her graduation from Rosemont College, a Catholic liberal arts college.

She began working as an assistant in NBC's New York production department and then moved to Los Angeles with the goal of becoming a producer and director. She worked as an assistant for Kate Smith's radio program and for Father Peyton's Family Theater and Family Rosary Crusade, where the slogan "The Family that Prays Together Stays Together" was coined.

Patricia Lawford traveled the country in support of her brother's presidential campaign in 1960 and was involved in the political campaigns of brothers Robert and Edward.

She was at Robert Kennedy's bedside when he died after being shot by Sirhan Sirhan in June 1968.

After her divorce, she moved to New York, where she became a supporter of the arts. She founded the National Committee for the Literary Arts at Lincoln Center and worked with the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University and the Kennedy Library.

Joseph Califano Jr., president of the addiction center, called her "a great friend, who with a marvelous sense of humor helped make the world a better place for all of us."

Kennedy Library Chairman Paul Kirk Jr. said in a statement, "Whether she was personally overseeing the refurbishing of the library's formal reception room, representing the Kennedy family at public events and ceremonies or being fully engaged at board meetings, Pat Lawford embraced the mission of making the Kennedy Library a living and vibrant memorial to her brothers John and Robert."

Student body not protected

Debbie Friedman

There is a serious epidemic raging on college campuses all across the country. Sexually transmitted diseases plague millions of students, and the numbers continue to grow each year. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reports that in the United States alone, 19 million new infections occur annually. Of those infected, nearly half are aged between of 15 and 24.

So, what are we doing about it? Not much. What is the University of Massachusetts doing about the problem? Even less. If an illness of any other kind were hitting proportions of this size, there would be hysteria. Yet, for some reason, sexual health remains below the radar. Even though sex itself is openly discussed and represented in the media in a socially acceptable way, STD testing continues to face an unshakable stigma, and it has to stop.

According to the American Social Health Association, three out of four sexually active people have HPV (human papillomavirus), which can lead to cervical cancer. In 2004, there were nearly 1 million reported cases of chlamydia and over 300,000 cases of gonorrhea, according to the CDC. These diseases often go undiagnosed and can lead to serious health problems, such as infertility.

According to the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, it is estimated that every one out of five people have genital herpes — a painful viral infection that has no cure and can be passed on to your children. The scariest ones of all, HIV/AIDS and syphilis (in extreme cases), can even kill you.

It should not take becoming infected to understand the impact of this serious health issue. Practicing safe sex (i.e. using condoms) is one way to stop the spread of disease. However, getting tested is the only way to ensure your health and the health of your sexual partners. For college students in particular, the STD test is of extreme importance. Unfortunately, our lack of action is leading us to flunk in alarming numbers.

There are a million reasons why you might want to avoid getting tested. It can be uncomfortable, inconvenient and sometimes expensive. It's also easy to feel as if contracting an STD could never happen to you. However, it's naive to consider yourself invincible, and becoming infected or infecting someone else is sure to be accompanied by all the same unpleasant elements, only worse.

It's naive to consider yourself invincible, and becoming infected, or infecting someone else, is sure to be accompanied by all the same unpleasant elements, only worse.

It is for these reasons that STD testing should be a priority, instead of something to avoid or ignore altogether. When it comes to your health and the health of your peers, responsibility has to triumph over the awkwardness that may accompany getting tested.

Students are not the only ones to blame for the failure to make STD testing routine on campus. Many students are in the dark about where to go, who to call or what to say, which is something the University could help to change. Health Services needs to do a better job of publicizing their STD testing services, perhaps by submitting advertisements similar to those of Tapestry Health (a local health facility that also offers testing). Not only will more publicity better inform students about testing services, it will also serve as a form of encouragement to go get it done.

Full confidentiality is the most important policy that a campus can offer students when providing STD testing. The University of Michigan offer testing with the guarantee they will not send any records to your insurance company, and Salisbury University in Maryland offers discounted fees, which can be paid up front. These options ensure no records will ever reach your parents — which is a great concern for students. Some schools, like Dickinson College, even offer completely free testing, which is what every campus should strive for. UMass Health Services does not offer any of these options, and therefore is not doing all it can to make STD testing accessible and convenient for students.

Despite the flaws, Health Services does offer the option to have the direct medical bill sent to you, instead of home. They also label the test as generic blood work, so when it is sent to your insurance company it will not blatantly state, "STD testing." As far as cost, University health insurance and most other insurance carriers cover the fee for testing. UMass has everything in place to help; they just need to make a few important policy changes in order to better serve the student body's needs. Ultimately, it will take a joint effort from students and the administration to make any kind of impact in the effort to stop the spread of STDs.

Our generation is extremely sexually educated; however, for the most part, sex-ed only emphasizes the importance of contraception and, in the process, overlooks testing. While throwing condoms at people our age will help slow down the transmission of infections, it is not nearly enough. The best preventative measure you can take with regards to your sex life is to get tested on a regular basis and to hold any potential partner to the same standard.

Changing the perception of sexual health is in our hands. There is nothing shameful about getting tested — it is only shameful to ignore the issue and contribute to the already overwhelming crisis. If we continue to fail in this attempt, sex will never be safe.

'Name-calling and embarrassment tactics'

Joshua H. Wilder

I am sure we can all remember those days in elementary school when all the kids would get together to gang up on someone and make them feel bad. Often, the target child would then get his little buddies together, and the two groups would descend upon the playground for an extreme name-calling and rock-throwing session. While this columnist spent many minutes of recess being hit with debris and starting trouble, I certainly thought things would change once we became adults.

Yet, interestingly enough, while watching the news over the last few weeks, it dawned on me that nothing has changed. The political realm in this country has been reduced to a playground full of little kids involved in nothing more than name-calling and embarrassment tactics. The aforementioned offenders have formed two major groups: Democrats and Republicans.

Last week, President Bush used the five year anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks to call out Democrats on their politics and to divert attention from his own mistakes during his term. While Republicans insisted Bush's speech was innocent in nature, the fact stands that it was in poor taste to choose such a moment in time to try to belittle political opponents.

With the mid-term elections quickly approaching, Americans should come to expect these kinds of Bush-league tactics and prepare to see them ad nauseam. As if politics weren't polarized enough in this country, now we have the chance to contribute to the mindless feuding frenzy by choosing one of the two affiliations we have been spoon-fed and told to support. These days, you are either a conservative warmonger or a liberal hippie. Try watching the news or reading the newspaper and finding a happy medium between the two.

Perhaps things wouldn't be this way if we had some mature, intelligent politicians in office right now. Bush's comments on Sept. 11 were just the tip of the iceberg when it comes to the lengths politicians will go to convince the masses to vote for them. It seems that all it takes is to have a stand on one or two broad issues, or talking points, right before the election to sway voters. Recently, Republicans have insisted that Democrats are trying to cut and run from the terrorists and put us in danger. Instead of debating some pressing issues, they spend the thousands of dollars raised for campaigning to attack the character and integrity of their opponents.

Half of us will be on the right, ready to invade any country harboring terrorists and supporting tax cuts, while the other half is on the left making up new Bush jokes and sporting their "No Blood for Oil" shirts.

Democrats are no better themselves. They choose to point out the many, many blunders of the current administration and basically say vote for us, or else. Yet they offer no solutions to the problems facing our country; they have no plan. Instead, they hope to be elected through their use of name-calling, twisting around the issues and convincing enough Americans that they are competent enough to be in office. They aren't.

These are the politicians we are forced to vote for, but what makes things worse? These clowns wearing suits and sporting fake smiles have already created a large enough rift between the two parties, but our news media works to make Americans choose sides. Now we have people like Bill O'Reilly, Geraldo Rivera, Al Franken, that tool Sean Hannity and anyone else on CNN pretending to be honest journalists. The problem is that these people already have an agenda and just aren't reliable.

If you spend enough time watching shows like these, you will begin to see just how biased they are. It takes a certain eye to be able to sift through the garbage and lies to actually read between the lines. Many everyday Americans either don't have these skills or flat out don't care, especially when the new "Survivor" is on.

So what is supposed to happen? We each choose a side on the playground and take a hard-line approach to politics. Half of us will be on the right, ready to invade any country harboring terrorists and supporting tax cuts, while the other half is on the left making up new Bush jokes and sporting their "No Blood for Oil" shirts. Being divided like this as a people is what the government wants, but it's all just manipulation, my friends.

Anyone who makes up their mind on a subject before hearing the facts is just not rational. Is there any way to just quit this political charade and actually debate the issues? Throughout the next few weeks, as you see countless political advertisements promising to serve the people, just think about the current state of affairs. The rich keep getting richer while the cost of living rises, gasoline is outrageously expensive and people are dying in Iraq and Afghanistan every day.

Politicians on the Left and the Right are only out to serve their party and themselves. As the future of this country, let's try to see these con artists for what they really are, and stop arguing amongst ourselves about who is supporting the better liar. After all, we left the playground a long time ago.

Keeping the faith

Domenic Poli

In these years known as college, students are much more inquisitive and well-spoken than they were in high school. Believe it or not, members of a collegiate student body don't just talk about booze, weed and sex; they also engage in insightful conversations from time to time.

One situation I've found myself in more than once is one in which I chat with two or three atheists/agnostics about our differing belief systems.

Now, before I continue, let me tell you a little bit about my background. For a span of nine years, kindergarten through eighth grade, I attended a Catholic school. That's right — nearly a decade in a parochial prison in which the inmates wore either sky blue polo shirts and black pants or checkered skirts and slacks.

Whether it was that experience or merely from having a 100 percent Christian heritage, I became a practicing Catholic. But I like to consider myself an open-minded one. I believe whole-heartedly in separation of church and state, I believe in evolution, I'm for the most part) pro-choice, I support same-sex marriage and I am well aware that the Church has deeply perverted many of the Holy Bible's teachings. And, believe me, I've been wondering for years whether Catholicism is the right way to go.

Despite my typical teenage confusion, however, one thing has never wavered: my fervent belief that there is a God. During any one of these talks, my atheist friends really seemed to enjoy being the majority opinion and subtly poking fun about my beliefs.

The common arguments from atheists against the existence of God vary, but never by very much. They claim that no God can exist because of all the calamity in the world, the lack of any convincing signs from above and that the notion simply goes against all the laws of physics.

This is the part where I usually open my mouth with nothing to say, and my friends declare a checkmate. I'll admit they all have excellent arguments, but they'll always come to no avail.

I'll also confess that I have no good reason for believing in the Heavenly Father; I just choose to. You read correctly — I choose to believe in God. All countering points are well-taken. In a world in which we're told a higher power is there to look over us, a lot of unexplainable devastation and pain exists.

I have no explanation for why atrocities such as the Holocaust, 9/11 and Hurricane Katrina happen. I don't know why innocent children die of horrendous diseases, despite the desperate prayers and pleas from family members and loved ones. I don't know a lot about science (scratch that, I know nothing about science), but I'm sure that the idea of a supernatural deity is preposterous to any physics major.

Nevertheless, this college sophomore does believe. I believe for one reason: I have faith. Some of my atheist friends say they are actually agnostics, which means they can't really have faith until they get all the answers to their questions. I'm not sure if they understand how silly that sounds to people that believe.

I'll admit there are plenty of scientific reasons not to believe in the concept of God. The trick is to believe anyway.

I believe, and I'm not the only one, either. Nicholas Copernicus, Sir Francis Bacon, Galileo Galilei, Sir Issac Newton and the great Albert Einstein all believed in a superior being. All of these brilliant men of science could not fathom an un-created universe. They all felt science displayed the existence of God.

Nicholas Copernicus, Sir Francis Bacon, Galileo Galilei, Sir Issac Newton and the great Albert Einstein all believed in a superior being.

Even Dan Brown, author of such religiously controversial novels as "Angels and Demons" and "The Da Vinci Code," is a practicing Christian, despite what some angry fundamentalists may suggest.

It's true that Stephen Hawkings, probably one of the greatest living scientists, does not believe in a personal God. But, of course, he is entitled to his opinion, as is everyone else.

However, according to the British Broadcasting Corporation, the world contains two billion Christians, 1.2 billion Muslims and .75 billion Hindus. Clearly, that has to say something. Even though their ways of worship can differ greatly, the aforementioned, along with many millions of other people around the world, all believe in a power greater than us.

I'm not writing this in hopes that the atheists out there will have a revelation, drop to their knees and dedicate their lives to God. I'm just trying to say that there are a lot of mysteries in this universe of ours, and there has to be something out there that neither you, nor I, nor even Stephen Hawkings will ever be able to fully comprehend.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

U.S. CITIZENS WORK HARD

In response to Lauran Modisette's article on foreign workers in the United States, I must clear up some common misconceptions: one, that Americans are lazy, and two, that the statement about George W. Bush putting a strangle hold on the immigrant community was utterly false.

The first point about Americans being lazy, well, our country may be moving that way, but that certainly isn't the situation as of right now. One only has to look across the ocean to see the epitome of laziness; the Europeans are the extreme. They work a 35-hour work week, get weeks upon weeks of vacation time and can't be fired from their jobs. (Remember the French riots last year caused by legislation that stated youths could actually be fired from a job?)

How could anything productive take place in that sort of environment? I will concede that some of the youth of America, especially a lot of the coastal trust fund babies, do not work, or at least not often. But that leaves quite a number that work full time or better.

I will use myself as an example, which is why I am writing here, because the column that ran really generalized and disregarded true working Americans. I have always worked in agriculture, not that it was a family business or anything, but I have worked for a couple of different farms since I was 13. Presently, I work a large hay farm, where I have been since I was 14 years old.

Since then, I have worked no less than 50 hours a week, and during peak times of the year, up to 70. I work seven days a week and think nothing of it because the work needs to be done. There is no way around it. The work is not always all that pleasant, either, but it needs to get done.

I was listening to the radio the other evening, and I heard people talking about the economy. People were calling in and saying things were going pretty well, but when pressed a bit, conceded they were working two jobs or 60 hours a week. But that is what it sometimes takes.

That is the greatness of America. You are rewarded for your work, and for those callers to live in extra comfort, two jobs is what it took. As for George W. Bush trying to control Immigrants, he is far too weak on immigration. And many in his political party are not afraid to say so.

If he wanted to be really serious in his War on Terror, he would close up our porous borders and get those immigrants whom work here to have proper and tamper proof identification. Immigrant labor may be needed in certain sectors of our economy, however, that need is not as widespread, and Americans aren't as lazy as many are led to believe.

NEW MUSIC TUESDAY

Ohio duo bizarre but good

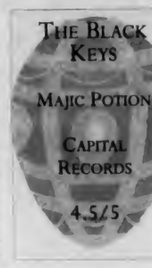
After three full albums that received wonderful attention from the media and an EP released earlier this year, The Black Keys have built up a reputation unlike any band you see today. Spawning from Akron, Ohio, these college dropouts had little going for them besides a love for music. Their influences span from Devo to electric Mississippi blues, but the two seemed to have pulled it off. It's almost as if they took it upon themselves to keep the blues rolling in the shady corners of underground music.

Many critics realize that the The Black Keys are a force to be reckoned with; this is a band who is coming off a tour with Radiohead, easily the hottest rock band to hear on the road. Though their music is completely distinct, The Black Keys certainly deserve their fair share of props for making it work with Radiohead. The gift they gave us at the end, "Magic Potion," is definitely something of a triumph.

If you've ever wondered what happens when two white boys from Ohio want to scour their way through southern blues and American rock 'n' roll, you might think the answer would lie in a bland, perhaps unoriginal sound. It's unfathomable that these two friends could make it in today's music world. But then you have to consider a truth about popular American music: being original is risky. People don't want to hear something foreign and strange.

But then there is an instance when something gets around MTV's Iron Curtain, a bright jewel of sorts. Meet the Black Keys.

They waste no time getting it started with their newest venture. The album hits the ground running with their most complex guitar riff to date. Loud and heavy, "Just Got to Be" lets you know what's in store for the next 45 minutes.



Next we have "Your Touch." On what is probably the catchiest song on the album, The Keys play around with distortion and lay down strong a quick, strong punch of solid rock. They strum hard and rock out. This is air guitar music.

With "You're the One," it's clear to see the switch in direction. Here we have an almost-ballad, slow and measured. It's not exactly a foreign sound, but in obvious contrast to the beginning.

It takes the duo some time to get things moving in a couple songs ("Strange Desire," for one example), but the wait is worth it. "Strange Desire" undulates up and down with experimental vocals that weave in and out with powerful lyrics. At first it's hard to decipher, but the song pieces itself together quite nicely. The guitar solos are slow and melodic, and it's almost as if they are toying with listeners, leaving a lot of breaks and silences. Their slower songs have an incredible internal power to them, though, and feeling is wholesome.

The Black Keys drag you through their music in a loud but important way. Entering "The Flame" is an experience like no other. The guitar strings pull and cry out, perfectly complimenting Auerbach's howl.

The album is amazing, granted you have to let it grow on you. The music is different; it's not everyday that you hear black gospel-type vocals sung by a young white kid. It's bizarre, but completely worth it.

Method Man returns

Perhaps one of the most widely loved and respected rappers that's not an out-and-out superstar, Method Man indicates the smoke has cleared with the title of his fourth solo album. For a man who has seen his profile grow and grow to a monumental stature in the years that have passed since his stand-out performance on his own song on Wu-Tang's "36 Chambers," Meth definitely seems upset at everything that has clouded his talent. Following 2004's "Tical 0: The Prequel," an album that was perceived as a disappointment, even allegedly to the man himself, Method Man does indeed have a lot to prove. In interviews running up to "4:21"'s release, critics who spent more time discussing Meth's dalliances in Hollywood than his raps got slammed left and right, and the attitude that permeates this album isn't much different.

On the intro track, which leads with a chant of "Make marijuana legal" and an impassioned speech about the advantages of pot over cigarettes and alcohol, Meth starts throwing blows immediately, rhyming about people "dumb enough to think that Method's number's up" and posing the final question, "How could you ever say I'm washed up when I'm the dirtiest thing in sight?"

And while the man who calls himself Johnny Blaze definitely comes with some strong rhymes on "4:21" — check out "Is It Me," "4:20" and "Ya'Meen" — the credentials say it all. After "Tical 0," which was littered with subpar guest spots and producers, Meth seems to have a good handle on how to put his album together. Surrounding himself with his Wu-Tang brethren, Method is able to stand out as a solo artist while still finding the best people around to compliment him. With a total of 6 songs produced by RZA and the majority of the Clan popping up, not to mention long-time counterpart Redman, Meth sounds at home trading verses with some of the best and, as always, his charisma rubs off on others.

However, at the end of the day, "4:21" is still missing something. "The Glide" and "Presidential MC" are incredibly strong tracks, especially the latter with its dense, creeping beat, but there aren't too many moments on the album that reach previously set bars. Meth doesn't sound lazy, for sure, but he rarely seems to be in top form. Attempts at pop crossover are, of course, present and while they aren't terrible, "Let's Ride," with Ghuwine, and "4 Ever," with Megan Rochell are unnecessary. "Say," with Lauryn Hill is a successful collaboration, and it certainly is a memorable track and a highlight but it still feels lacking. Meth's anger at critics and the rap industry is certainly deserved and sharply focused, but it seems to be the only subject he can successfully rap about. "4:21" is otherwise filled with bravado which is also deserved but much less fulfilling. "4:21" is a strong return from a naturally talented rapper, and there are prolonged moments of greatness, but it often feels too weak to be the massive comeback that it wants to be. Surely a solid entry into Meth's discography, it will be more interesting to see where he goes next.

Pizza enthusiasts come together for team competition

By Erin Ailworth
The Orlando Sentinel

ORLANDO, Fla. – When trying out for the U.S. Pizza Team, the recipe for success is simple: Be one with the dough.

That's how Chris Bailthrop, 31, wowed the judges at the dough-tossing tryouts for the 2007 team, which took place recently at the Florida Restaurant & Lodging Show at the Orange County Convention Center in Orlando.

It's all in the flick of the wrist, Bailthrop said as he practiced with a rubber round of faux dough before taking the stage for a demonstration with his new teammates. They will travel to the World Pizza Championship in Italy later this year to show off their skills a mix of break dancing and juggling with floury dough.

"The main trick is called the whip: Throw it (the dough) up and catch it underneath it," said Bailthrop, who works at Lupis Pizza Pies in Chattanooga, Tenn. "That's where it all starts."

For pizza chef Jason Samesky, the secret to his first-place finish was in the spices.

Judges sampling pie slices during the baking competition called Samosky's use of cheese, avocados, artichokes and grape tomatoes a "tidal wave" of flavor.

"This stuff cost me $35 an ounce," the chef from Valley City, Ohio, joked of the basil-oregano mix he sprinkled on his "Heartocado" pizza.

"He was on OBT, and he picked it up cheap," said competitor Eric Lippman of Cypress, Texas, his tongue firmly in cheek.

"I wanted to win," Samosky quipped.

The competitions were sponsored by PMQ Pizza Magazine, a trade publication from Oxford, Miss. Co-publisher Linda Green laughed as she described most people's reactions to finding out about the U.S. Pizza team.

"They scratched their heads," she said. But most quickly catch the fan fever.

"Pizza is a universal food," Green said. "Pizza is like a blank canvas and you have so many artists that do different things."

Self-described "well-known pizza guy" Ed Zimmerman agreed. But he still prefers his pizza naked.

"Pizza is really personal," said Zimmerman, the president of Success Foods Marketing in Novato, Calif. "You have to look at pizza plain ... toppings really mask the flavors of crust and cheese and sauce the real guts of the pizza."

Knowing a good pizza isn't just about the taste, however. PMQ culinary editor and baking-competition judge Evelyne Slomon said she also looks at the crispness of the crust and the gooeyness of the cheese.

"It hits all the buttons just ding, ding, ding," Slomon said of knowing when you've tasted an exceptional pie. Added fellow judge Ed LaDou, owner of Caioti Pizza Cafe in Los Angeles: "It's like fireworks in your mouth. It just feels right."

And oh, how Eric Lippman's steak-and-potato pizza felt right to Norma Amalia Fernandez de Miccio, a spectator, who owns a gelato business in Sarasota, Fla.

"Very rich, the pizza," she said in Spanish, sighing and closing her eyes as she went in for a bite.

Another convention-goer, Rebecca Gessner, was just as excited.

"This looks much better than the pizza I used to make at Chuck E. Cheese's," said Gessner, 27, a former chef from Clearwater, Florida.

Not all the dough at the pizza competitions was edible, however.

During the pizza-stretching portion of the day, competitors spread their dough as wide and round as they could across the stage floor.

"When you're competing, you're in your own little world," said competitor Roger McColly of Upper Sandusky, Ohio. "It's just you and the dough."

Different culinary teams from across the country compete in different categories such as pizza stretching and best recipe.

'Black Dahlia' fails to capture old Hollywood charm

By Peter Frisman
Collegian Staff

Like his other mid-twentieth-century police procedural "The Untouchables," Brian De Palma's "The Black Dahlia" features the graphic murder of a child, this time feeling more like an audience manipulator than anything else. Seemingly having admitted to himself that he wasn't going to gain audience sympathy with his heavy-handed adaptation of James Ellroy's novel alone, he resorts to a quick sucker punch to force the viewer into taking the film seriously.

It's one of the many dabs of artificiality that glaze over a potentially intriguing interpretation of the real-life brutal slaying of Elizabeth Short, known as the Black Dahlia, in post-war Los Angeles. Josh Hartnett stars as boxer turned LAPD officer, partnered with another former pugilist, Aaron Eckhart. Together they are assigned "the Black Dahlia" case, the effects of which encroach upon both their personal lives. Hartnett must simultaneously deal with the case, his partner's obsession over the case, and sexual tension between himself and both Eckhart's quasi-girlfriend (Scarlett Johansson) and a mysterious Dahlia look-alike (Hilary Swank) whose connection to the case is as bizarre as the murder itself.

Josh Hartnett (left) stars in director Brian De Palma's new movie "The Black Dahlia." Unlike his previous movies De Palma finds himself overwhelmed with the complexities of the plot in "The Black Dahlia."

"The Black Dahlia" attempts to mimic the style of classic film noir while maintaining the modern Hollywood mantra of "loud and unsubtle." The film is narrated by Hartnett, who employs pseudo-Spillane dialogue to mask somewhat obvious descriptions of discoveries and epiphanies. At one point, he literally shoots at a massive crystal chandelier, causing it to fall and crash in a cascade of glass shards. The movie is slathered with unnecessary flourishes, from a musical trill accompanying a switchblade opening to laughably trite allegories concerning fire and ice. "The Black Dahlia" presents solid proof that cinematic overkill doesn't mesh with an intricate murder mystery.

A permanent fixture on the short list of love-them-or-hate-them filmmakers, De Palma most definitely wasn't the best choice to direct "The Black Dahlia," despite what "The Untouchables" may have led producers to believe. He proves himself once again to be the master of style, whisking audiences along the film like a savvy tour guide who knows all the most amazing points of interest.

But as a highly visual director can be expected to do, he seems to focus more on the movie's logistics, glossing over the lives of its characters (who can be easily determined by the audience to be what would have driven the film had they been pain more attention.) De Palma's bravura addiction was more than welcome in his previous feature, "Femme Fatale," which didn't need to be taken nearly as seriously as "The Black Dahlia."

Likewise, in the "Untouchables," his craftsmanship and showmanship mixed wonderfully with David Mamet's David Mamet-style screenplay.

But this time around, De Palma finds himself overwhelmed by the complex plot and character development, and tries to cover up his haphazard treatment of these elements by applying layers of shock cuts, sweeping camera movements, and blood. It's as if he considered how audiences enjoyed the "Battleship Potemkin"-homage staircase scene, and figured that they must be truly enthralled by a movie containing nothing but such scenes.

Perhaps "The Black Dahlia" would be better received if there were no indications that the plot needed to be deeper, that everything was nicely polished and audiences were reassured they needn't concern themselves with any plot intricacies and they only needed to marvel at another sumptuous demonstration of De Palma's skills as a visual artist. But as it is, we are consistently given hints of something big underneath the film's surface, and we're never allowed a closer look.

Ball chasing history

had a breakout game. He rumbled for 144 yards on 24 carries and a three-yard touchdown run.

This week Brian Bradford led the Towson Tigers en route to earning Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Week. He had 14 tackles last Saturday.

CHASING RICE

New Hampshire's senior wide receiver David Ball is still three touchdown receptions short of tying Jerry Rice's all time I-AA record of 50. Ball only tallied three receptions this past week for seven yards, but he is hardly to blame for this. The Wildcats rushed 54 times this past Saturday for a total of 418 yards.

In order for Ball to catch Rice, he will need a few more competitive games so he gets a few more looks. There is still plenty of time for Ball's pursuit of history to end on a positive note, but his team's chase of their first ever national championship is the focus right now.

UNH takes on Dartmouth this coming weekend.

CONFERENCE PLAY ABOUT TO HEAT UP

This Saturday will showcase three conference match ups. No. 11 Delaware will look to rebound from this past week's loss at the hands of Albany as they head to Rhode Island. Both teams are currently 1-1 and will be looking to start their conference seasons with a victory.

In other A-10 action, Towson brings their 3-0 record to Hofstra (1-1). Northeastern (1-2) will visit no. 15 James Madison, another team stuck at 1-1 for the time being.

Ex-Northeastern player among victims in Duquesne shooting

BY RAMESH SANTANAM
Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — More than 300 students gathered at a Mass following the shooting of five basketball players, including a former Northeastern star, trying to understand how the violence could have come to their tranquil, close-knit campus.

"We're shocked because an event of this sort has never happened," Duquesne President Charles Dougherty said. "It's a safe campus and known to be a safe campus."

Police searched for the gunman, and the downtown school stepped up its round-the-clock police protection with armed university police officers guarding dormitories and other buildings.

Two players had been walking near a dormitory, when they met a man who apparently had been disruptive at a student union dance, authorities said. The players attempted to pacify him and walked away, but were shot. Players who rushed to their aid were also shot.

In critical condition was forward Sam Ashaolu of Toronto, a transfer from Lake Region State College and a cousin of former Houston Rockets star Hakeem Olajuwon. In serious condition was Stuard Baldonado of Columbia, a transfer from Miami Dade College who was considered the school's best recruit.

Treated and released were Shawn James of New York City, the nation's leading shot blocker last season at Northeastern University in Boston before he transferred to Duquesne, and Aaron Jackson of Hartford, Conn., a guard who is one of only two returning players from Duquesne's 3-24 team last season.

James, an NBA prospect expected to be Duquesne's top player when he becomes eligible in the 2007-08 season, was shot in the foot, but no bones were broken. Mensah was believed shot in the shoulder. Jackson was shot in the hand.

Crisis counselors were available for students, the university posted a letter from Dougherty on its Web site and was fielding phone calls from parents, spokeswoman Bridget Fare said. Officials will decide Monday whether to set up a specific phone line for parents seeking information, she said.

Duquesne coach Ron Everhart, formerly at Northeastern, had rebuilt the school's program after being hired in March by bringing in 10 recruits — one of the most sweeping upheavals of any Division I program in recent years.

Dougherty said several witnesses saw the gunman leave campus after a half-dozen to a dozen shots were fired. He said witnesses reported seeing two guns — the second on someone in a group with the gunman — but he couldn't confirm whether both were fired.

Dougherty, who said the gunman and the others with him were not students, said he did not know what sparked the violence.

After changing plea, Clarett sentenced to 7 1/2 years in jail

Since winning the national championship in 2003, Maurice Clarett's life has been a downward spiral. Yesterday, he was sentenced to 3 1/2 years in jail.

with two counts of failure to comply with an order from a police officer and improper handling of a firearm, in addition to the concealed-weapon charge.

Defense attorneys said they hope Clarett can be placed in a state prison with workout facilities so he can stay in shape for a possible return to football.

"It's been a sobering experience for Maurice to stay the least. He's come to terms with certain things," attorney Nick Mango said.

Assistant Prosecutor Tim Mitchell said the plea deal is consistent with how his office handles similar cases and that Clarett did not get special treatment.

Had Clarett been convicted on all charges in both cases at trial, he would have faced three to 34 years in prison, O'Brien said.

Mitchell said he expects Clarett will serve just over four years, with his last six months spent outside prison at a community-based corrections facility.

The plea deal was finalized Monday morning after prosecutors met with the robbery victims. Authorities said Clarett flashed a gun and robbed two people of a cell phone early Jan. 1. One victim said all he wanted was an apology, but prosecutors were adamant about prison time, Mitchell said.

A victims' assistant from the prosecutor's office read a statement from the robbery victims, who said the ordeal has been hard on all aspects of their lives.

"Mr. Clarett, we hope you will use this opportunity to help someone along the way," the statement said.

Clarett had been drinking heavily on New Year's before the robbery, attorney Michael Hoague said. But the attorney did not explain why Clarett had a gun in his waistband.

"Obviously, that was a bad decision," Hoague said.

The case generated such intense media coverage Clarett's attorneys asked the court to pay for a public opinion poll to determine if an impartial jury could be seated for the robbery trial. Fais denied the request.

Clarett scored the winning touchdown in the second overtime in Ohio State's championship game, but that was the last time he played for the Buckeyes as a freshman.

After dropping out of Ohio State, he lost a U.S. Supreme Court case challenging the NFL's requirement that players wait three years after high school before turning pro. The Denver Broncos made Clarett a surprise third-round pick in the NFL's 2005 draft but cut him during the preseason.

Despite emotions, Clarke to play

BY DOUG FERGUSON
Associated Press

STRAFFAN, Ireland — The shiny gold trophy sat on the table, and Ian Woosnam wasn't sure whether to take it with him.

Standing to leave his news conference Monday at The K Club, the European captain clutched it in his right hand and was headed out the door when he walked past Darren Clarke and instinctively handed him the Ryder Cup.

For all the emotions swirling around Clarke in the five weeks since his wife died, it was a reminder why he is here.

"A lot of people understand the position I'm in," Clarke said. "I've had a very emotional time of late. But as soon as the bell goes, I'm there to play golf, and I'm going to try to play as best I can. And hopefully, my best will be enough to earn some points for the team."

Clarke contributed 3 1/2 points to Europe's landslide victory last time in the Ryder Cup, a festive occasion.

Two weeks after returning home from Oakland Hills, however, he learned that breast cancer had returned to his wife, Heather, and quickly spread through her body. She urged him to keep playing, even as her condition worsened.

A year ago at the BMW Championship at Wentworth, players and their wives were in tears to hear that Heather had suffered another setback and wasn't expected to live more than a week. Clarke always called her a fighter, and that much was clear.

She rallied time and again, strong enough to join him in the Bahamas the week before the Masters. But after Clarke opened with a 68 in the Houston Open a few weeks later, he withdrew to fly home to London when she took another turn for the worse.

Finally, he called it quits after missing the cut at the British Open, wanting to spend as much time as he could with his family.

"We went on a family holiday," he said. "We went to Greece for a day, and didn't like that, ended up in Portugal for a little bit. And after that, a bit of a rush to get back home on an air ambulance, just had a bit of a nightmare. But we got back home, and things went downhill rather rapidly."

She died Aug. 13, leaving behind her husband and two sons, 8-year-old Tyrone and 5-year-old Conor.

Clarke would come home from the hospital in her last few weeks and his balls, mostly to take his mind off a helpless situation. He returned to practice after the funeral because he wanted to be ready if he felt he should play in the Ryder Cup.

Woosnam offered him a captain's pick and Clarke accepted, for no other reason than Heather would have wanted him to play.

"I have my moments," he said. "But overall, I'm very comfortable with what I'm doing. I did think long and hard about whether I should be here this week, and I came to the conclusion that I would help the team if I was here. So that's why I'm here. I want to play. I want to compete. And I want to help my teammates."

And while he has continued to work hard on his game, his routine has changed.

Clarke takes his oldest son to school in the morning before going to the golf course. He comes home to eat lunch with Conor and returns to practice until it's time to pick up Tyrone in the afternoon.

If there is any good that has come out of this, he has grown closer to his boys.

"I've had to look after them a bit more than what I normally have done," Clarke said. "Heather suffered for four years, basically, and it was very difficult to watch that. But since she's passed away, I'm happy with my relationship with my kids."

He has thought about bringing them to opening ceremonies on Thursday — a time when players make a grand entrance with their wives at their sides — but isn't sure he can take them away from school. And they won't be around when the matches start at what is expected to be the biggest sports event in Ireland.

"They're not quite tall enough to see over everybody," he said.

The unknown is how his game can stack up to the pressure of the Ryder Cup, and how his emotions handle three days of the biggest frenzy in golf. The loudest cheer all week might be when Clarke's name is announced on the first tee.

This past summer, Darren Clarke lost his wife, Heather, to breast cancer. He says the ordeal has brought him closer to his two sons.

Conference play opens

BY MIKE WALSH
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Atlantic 10 football conference once again took to the fields this past Saturday and saw a flurry of breakout offensive performances coupled with the start of conference play.

New Hampshire once again looked very impressive on both sides of the ball. They solidified their No. 1 ranking in Division 1-AA with their 62-7 drubbing of Stony Brook. The ranking is the highest the Wildcats have ever held this early in a season.

The Richmond Spiders, who jumped over the Massachusetts Minutemen in the rankings to No. 8 earlier in the week, proved deserving with a 58-7 shellacking of the Virginia Military Institute. They look to be the team most qualified to take on New Hampshire for the conference crown. However, the Minutemen may have a claim of their own.

DIVISION PLAY BEGINS

Four teams set A-10 conference play into motion this past weekend in what should prove to be a very competitive season.

The Maine Black Bears improved to 1-0 on the young season (1-1 overall) with a tough road win at William & Mary, 20-17. The win marked the first time that the Black Bears have ever taken out the Tribe in Williamsburg.

The road team once again came away victorious in the second of two in-conference games as Massachusetts (1-0, 2-1 A-10) took out Villanova, 31-21. The Wildcats did compile 359 yards of total offense against what is usually a stingy Massachusetts defense, but this was not enough to keep Nova from falling to 0-3 on the season.

A-10 Notebook

The Minutemen's offensive barrage was strong, to say the least. They boasted a 350-yard passer, a 100-yard rusher, and a 100-yard receiver.

OFFENSIVE AND DEFENSIVE PLAYERS OF THE WEEK

UMass sophomore quarterback Liam Coen was well deserving of his Offensive Player of the Week status with his near flawless performance against Villanova. Coen completed 21-of-28 passes on his way to 350 yards and two touchdowns.

On the other side of the ball, Towson junior linebacker Brian Bradford took the honor of Defensive Player of the Week. He had a game-high 14 tackles, three of which occurred behind the line of scrimmage.

Other players with standout statistical performances that deserve mention are UNH's sophomore running back Robert Simpson and Richmond's freshman running back Justin Forte. Simpson compiled 120 yards on just 12 carries and two scores while Forte

Senior running back Steve Baylark was one of three offensive stars for UMass last week. His 104 yards gave him his 17th career 100-yard game.

UMass one of few schools without golf

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

All but two of the 14 schools in the Atlantic 10 Conference field Division 1 golf teams. Unfortunately for New England golf fans, the University of Massachusetts is one of those without a squad.

The UMass Athletic Department acknowledges that it has no plans to create a men's or women's program, and the reason is purely financial.

"I would love to start golf programs, but unfortunately we do not have the resources to do so," UMass Athletic Director John McCutcheon wrote on the school's website in May of 2005. "In fact many of our existing sports are not fully funded so until that is done we really can't consider adding more sports."

A-10 Notebook

If UMass added a men's golf program, then it would be required to add a women's golf team or spend an equal amount of extra money on women's athletics.

This requirement is based on the ninth section of the Education Amendments of 1972, commonly known as Title IX.

One of the provisions in the law states that any college or university receiving federal funding must spend equal amounts of money on men's and women's athletics.

At UMass and most other schools, a few high profile men's sports — such as football and hockey — require large budgets to maintain their competitiveness. In order to make up the spending difference, UMass offers 11 women's sports, as opposed to 10 men's sports.

Besides cost, another factor that likely influences the athletic department's decision is the New England climate. The cold and snowy weather of the trademark winters in this area make it impossible to play golf year round.

Athletes of other outdoor sports, such as lacrosse and baseball, can practice effectively inside during the winter. But golf is different. It is a game of feel and touch. An indoor driving range, even if a school is fortunate enough to have one, can only take a golfer so far.

This is precisely the reason that the vast majority of the schools with nationally competitive golf teams are located in warm climates.

Golf Digest magazine — which evaluates collegiate golf programs based on factors such as team stroke average, academics, facilities, and weather — did not place any New England schools among the top 150 in its 2006 rankings.

In fact, even a glance at the rankings reveals that only a handful schools located north of Virginia makes the list — though two A-10 schools, Xavier and Charlotte, were ranked at No. 19 and 22, respectively.

This phenomenon is part of the larger picture of college athletics, more specifically its competitive unbalance. Just as southern schools dominate sports such as golf and baseball, schools in the Northeast and Midwest rule indoor sports like hockey.

Many colleges will invest heavily in high-profile sports like football and basketball because of their revenue-generating value, while outer-rim sports like volleyball, golf, and tennis — which don't necessarily provide a financial boost — may fall by the wayside.

Unless the financial situation of the UMass Athletic Department drastically improves, students, fans, and alumni will have to look elsewhere to follow competitive golf.

49ERS ON TOP IN A-10

Charlotte was chosen as the 21st best team in the nation in the preseason Golf World Coaches' Poll. The 49ers are flanked by two other North Carolina schools in the rankings — UNC and Duke.

The defending A-10 Conference Champions opened their season with a victory in the Scenic City Invitational on Sept. 10. The team still has a lot of work left if it wants to eclipse its highest ranking ever in the polls. The 49ers ended last season ranked No. 17.

Charlotte will probably receive the most competition for the A-10 title from Xavier, a team that boasts senior leadership and promising young players.

GOLFER OF THE WEEK

St. Bonaventure's Andy Whelan was named the conference's Golf Performer of the Week. In the Rutgers Invitational this past weekend, Whelan finished in 10th place out of 80 golfers. His final-round 69 (-2) earned him the 11th top-10 finish of his career.

He along with A-10 Rookie of the Week, Nathan Peck, helped the Bonnies improve 21 strokes in one day at the invitational.

ROOKIE OF THE WEEK

Xavier golfer, freshman Alan Glynn, was honored for helping the school win the Air Force Invitational. Glynn, who hails from Middlesex, England, fired a personal best of 66 (-6) in the final round. Golf Week magazine named Charlotte golfer, Corey Nagy one its Top Freshmen to Watch for the 2006-07 season. Temple, Saint Joseph's, and La Salle begin their seasons at this week's Towson Invitational in Myersville, Md.

A-10 Volleyball rich in history

BY MICHAEL CHANDLER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Right now, Atlantic 10 universities are playing a sport where "shooting," "spiking," and "jousting" are common strategies, and the team with the most "kills" claims victory.

Citing financial reasons, the University of Massachusetts chooses not to participate Volleyball, the Olympic team sport combining the strategy of chess with the physicality of basketball, has been played in the A-10 since 1982, becoming organized and widespread in 1984.

A-10 Notebook

Despite the sport first being played down the road in Holyoke, UMass chooses to forgo hosting a volleyball team, unlike most of the A-10 conference. Richmond and Saint Joseph's are the only other A-10 universities without a team. Both are schools with fewer than eight varsity sports.

"Back in 1993 we were in a huge financial crisis," UMass Associate Athletic Director Elaine Sortino said. "The entire University was struggling, and obviously the Athletic Department is part of the University. We were asked by the board of trustees to reduce the university's 29 sports, and unfortunately, volleyball was one of them."

When asked if the school had plans to reinstate the sport, Sortino said "Not to my knowledge."

In 1990, the last UMass volleyball team posted a 4-29 record.

Even without the participation of the largest A-10 school, volleyball has continued to thrive. Much of A-10 volleyball history has been dominated by dynasties.

A SPORT WITH TRADITION

Remarkably, since the inaugural 1984 season, 63 percent of the conference championship teams won the title the previous year. It's also worth noting that 80 percent of all A-10 volleyball titles have been won by the same four teams: Penn State, Temple, George Washington, and Rhode Island, usually coming in streaks. Some of these teams have put together successful runs unparalleled by anything else in the A-10.

Temple dominated during the 1995-2005 regular seasons, winning quietly but consistently, and arriving at a 198-80 record.

Intriguingly similar to the Atlanta Braves of the same era, their continuing regular season success is stifled only by a lousy playoff record (18-19) and one lonely title.

Dayton represented another force in the early to late 1990s. Paralleling the success of the Dallas Cowboys in terms of star power and purely overmatching opponents, Dayton peaked at 138-40 with four titles.

But it is futile to even try to avoid the impact of Penn State on A-10 volleyball. The Nittany Lions — currently No. 2 in the country — took a stranglehold on the 1980s in a way only comparable to the Boston Celtics dominating basketball, the other sport invented in the Connecticut River Valley.

Not losing a game until their 8th season, Penn State rattled off a 49-0 margin against other A-10 teams and won seven conference titles. The team moved up to Division I after the 1990 season when they won the NCAA tournament.

HERE AND NOW

The rich tradition of A-10 volleyball will be continued this week with 17 separate matches. Many of the A-10 teams will be on the road all week. Charlotte (6-5), however, will be at home hosting A-10 rival Xavier (6-7). Duquesne (8-11) will host Temple (6-7) at home as well.

La Salle (4-9) — where junior Erin Sullivan was named to the 2006 Volleyball Invitational All-Tournament team — will be traveling to Missouri in hopes of toppling heavily favored St. Louis.

Dayton (7-3) hopes to continue their streak of wild success after shocking No. 18 Arizona. In an important A-10 match up, Dayton will meet George Washington (5-3), who is coming off a dramatic overtime win.

Fordham (5-8) will be attending the Brown Invitational where they are slated for a doubleheader against North Dakota State and Delaware State. Like Fordham, Rhode Island (3-11) will also be playing in a tournament, participating in the Yale Invitational against Albany and Central Connecticut State.

Rugby loses close game in season-opener

BY KEVIN BRODERICK
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts rugby club opened its season on Saturday by suffering a tough loss to their heated rival Connecticut, 12-10.

Holding a five-point lead through much of the second half, UMass (0-1) could not hold the advantage, letting in a try close to the end of the game.

"We couldn't finish," said Captain Jared Polansky. "It was our game to win, or it was our game to lose. They didn't win it, we lost it."

UMass plays its next game on Sept. 23 against Norwich at home. They play on the pitch behind McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

For most of the second half, the ball worked its way up and down the pitch. After many near-scores, Connecticut scrum-half Rob Pritchard broke off of a ruck and advanced the ball. The ball eventually made its way into the hands of forward Rob Thiacchio for a try.

UConn took the lead with the conversion kick by Matt Haly, placing the score at its final resting place.

Pritchard noted the intensity that UMass brought to the pitch on Saturday.

"UMass is playing some hard rugby," Pritchard said.

Early in the first half, UMass flanker Eric Borreson hit a penalty kick to take a three-point lead, scratching the first marks onto the scoreboard. Borreson later missed a penalty kick midway through the second half.

Connecticut quickly came back when Thiacchio made a break and threw the ball to Steve Rachal who touched the ball down for a try.

"[Thiacchio] made a great break and I was just there to support," Rachal said.

Haly kicked the conversion wide, keeping the score at 5-3.

Nearing the end of the first half, UMass took the lead again when they scored their only try of the day. Captain inside-center Stevie Cetenich touched the ball down for the five points. Borreson followed that by completing the conversion, bringing the score to 10-3 at the half.

UMass coach Craig Ruberti seemed enthusiastic about the rest of the season, but saw improvements that needed to be made.

"We were feeling good about our team coming into the game with skill and fitness levels," Ruberti said. "We need to execute our game plan better. Our back line needs to play at the level they are capable of."

After the loss to UConn, Ruberti said his team has work to do this week.

"[We need to] take the good things from here and bring them back into practice," Ruberti said. "[And] get ready for Norwich."

UMass is up against a powerful Norwich squad this week at home. Like UConn, they are an intense rival of UMass.

"We have a tough schedule," Ruberti said. "We're in the top league in New England. It's tough to lose this one."

There were objections from the Connecticut side after the game about certain calls that might have had a large impact on the final score.

"Both sides had calls that were unfavorable," UConn assistant coach Anthony Osborn said. "There is only one referee, and he can't see what's happening all the time."

Latest Clarett saga ends with jail time

BY RUSTY MILLER

COLUMBUS, Ohio — Former Ohio State football star Maurice Clarett was sentenced to prison for at least 3 1/2 years Monday after pleading guilty to aggravated robbery and carrying a concealed weapon.

Judge David Fais announced the agreement on the day jury selection was to begin in a case in which Clarett was accused of holding up two people outside a bar.

Sentenced to 7 1/2 years with release possible after 3 1/2 years, Clarett also agreed to serve five years of probation after the prison sentence.

The 22-year-old said he understood he was pleading guilty and reversing his earlier plea.

"I'd like to apologize for my behavior, and I accept the time that is given to me," he said.

After the deal was announced, Clarett looked at his mother, who was sobbing and holding his 8-week-old daughter while sitting next to his girlfriend.

Franklin County Prosecutor Ron O'Brien said he was pleased with the agreement.

"Our view all along was that the conduct demanded a prison sentence, and that's been accomplished," O'Brien said. "It's in a range that will allow him to get his life back together after his release."

The concealed-weapon charge was from Clarett's Aug. 9 arrest after a high-way chase with police who found four loaded guns in Clarett's sport utility vehicle. Clarett's attorneys said those guns came from his mother's house and were intended for someone else, but the attorneys did not elaborate.

Clarett, who led Ohio State to the national championship in 2002, had been charged in that police altercation

Young adults lacking in political awareness

BY MATT BELLIVEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As America observes the 35th anniversary of the right to vote for 18-year-olds, a new national survey shows that the vast majority of young adults lack awareness of the political offices on the November elections' ballot.

Eighty-one percent of young adults (18-to-24-year-olds) aren't aware that their member of the U.S. House of Representatives will be elected on Nov. 7, 2006, according to a new national survey. In fact, all 435 members of the U.S. House of Representatives; one-third of the U.S. Senate (33 seats); and numerous local, city and county public offices are up for election this year.

To help combat the lack of awareness among young adults, the Ad Council and the Federal Voting Assistance Program (FVAP) are running a national public service advertising (PSA) campaign using humor and satire to educate young adults about the midterm elections and encourage them to register and vote on Nov. 7.

The "Pay Attention & Vote" campaign Web site, www.PayAttention.org, contains state-specific information on local candidates running for office, as well as tips for registering and voting in the midterm elections. Visitors to the Web site can download a voter registration form, learn more about candidates and find information about absentee voting procedures for their state.

Although recent studies have shown that a high percentage of young adults plan to vote on Nov. 7, just 54 percent of 18-to-24-year-olds said that they were registered to vote, according to the survey. Twenty-two percent of young adults said that they were not planning to register. The nationally representative survey also revealed that 91 percent of young adults are unfamiliar with the deadline to register to vote in their state.

"Young adults have the opportunity to cast nearly 43 million ballots during this midterm election, yet many don't realize how easy it is to register, get information about the candidates and vote," said Polli Brunelli, director of FVAP. "Young voter turnout has lagged for the past 35 years, but young adults have the ability to make a dramatic difference in 2006 by showing up at the polls and casting their ballots."

FVAP aims to provide U.S. citizens worldwide with a broad range of non-partisan information and assistance to facilitate their participation in the democratic process — regardless of where they work or live.

FVAP also acts on behalf of the Secretary of Defense to administer the federal responsibilities of the National Voter Registration Act, which designates armed forces recruiting offices nationwide as voter registration agencies, allowing eligible U.S. citizens to apply for voter registration, or apply to change voter registration data, at more than 6,000 Armed Forces Recruitment Offices nationwide.

Program helps war veterans return to school

BY SARAH LUKIANOV
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The transition into college can be difficult for any student. It can be even harder when the student is a service member or a military veteran returning to school.

In an effort to make the college experience an easier adjustment for these students, Jon Schnauber and Jon Zagami, along with Lyle Phipps, all former service-men, created the Veterans and Service Members Association, or VASMA. This Registered Student Organization, created last spring at the University of Massachusetts, is the first organization on campus to deal with military personnel.

Jon Schnauber, 34, is currently a student at the UMass and is majoring in sociology and minoring in psychology and military leadership. He joined the active air force in 1990 and served during the first Gulf War. He joined the Army National Guard in 2000 and was activated for service the day after 9/11. He also served as a sergeant and military policeman in Afghanistan.

"College is a tough place, and it's not a normal environment for a military person to operate in," explained Schnauber. "Things are really slow in school and there's a lot of red tape to get through."

"In the military you have someone who will direct you every minute of the day," said Schnauber. "Coming to academia and not having any direction ... you have to figure everything out," he continued. "I mean, I know that's the way it is for everybody, but we've gone through an indoctrination of training where this is your life and this is the way you live it, and all the sudden, we're not there anymore."

Jon Zagami, a 22-year-old junior economics major at UMass, joined the Army Reserves in 2002 in high school and was activated as soon as his training was over. He served as an engineer and specialist in Kuwait and Iraq.

"I wasn't quite sure that I was going to be able to handle college," Zagami said. "So I figured the army would help me get to where I felt I needed to be before I came to school and started throwing money at an education that I wasn't quite sure I was mature enough to handle," he continued. "But I never wanted an education so bad until I got deployed."

The three core functions in VASMA are awareness of veteran needs, service and volunteerism, and social support.

"One of the foundations of being in the military is your service and serving your community," explained Schnauber. "One of our values is 'selfless service,' and I think bringing that in here brings a little bit of the military for the people who are used to that, so it makes it a more comfortable environment for them," he added.

VASMA currently has about 30 members and is working to increase its membership through publicity efforts throughout the five college area.

Schnauber estimates that there are approximately 250 veterans at UMass, but expects the number to be much larger since the original estimate only counts those using GI Bill Benefits. The organization welcomes members of the Reserve Officer Training Corps (ROTC), as well as family members of service men.

"By creating a social support network on a campus as large as UMass, it lets you feel at ease," said Zagami. "It gives you somewhere to turn, especially after you come back and you have issues or problems ... you can go to a meeting and say, 'Hey, this guy probably knows what I'm going through, he's been there, done that,'" he added.

VASMA members aim to help one another solve institutional, academic, and personal issues. They observe a democratic model and stress their nonpartisan standpoint, allowing members to openly discuss what needs to be worked on and facilitate a way to solve presented issues.

"Just being in the military, there's a different language that you learn to speak, and I mean, that alone sets us apart from everyone else," said Zagami. "The way we carry ourselves, the lives that we live ... we know what it's like to get up before the sun to go do our PT before the day even starts, whereas a lot of kids on this campus ... I'd be amazed if they'd be able to get up before noon."

MassPIRG to hold 'kickoff' ceremony

23 University of Massachusetts students traveled to New Orleans to help Hurricane Katrina victims in Spring 2006.

BY MATT BELLIVEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) will hold a kick-off meeting at the University of Massachusetts Earthfoods Cafe in the Student Union at 6 p.m. today to celebrate 34 years of "finding and implementing solutions to social and environmental dilemmas on campus, in the community, and nationally."

MassPIRG is a student-run, student-funded organization that has passed numerous legislations in recent years.

In 2004, MASSPIRG registered 9,700 college students to vote in the Fall 2004 election, through the national, non-partisan new voters project. The state effort, combined with the national campaign, resulted in a 10 percent increase in turnout for 18- to 24-year-old voters from the 2000 to the 2004 election.

MassPIRG also gathered hundreds of public comments from hunters and fishermen at sportsmen shows across the state and submitted them to the Environmental Protection Agency in order to keep strong clean air laws in place at the national level. They also sent 900 letters to the state Department of Environmental Protection to ensure strict regulation of mercury emissions from five of the state's power plants in 2004.

This semester, MassPIRG will be working on a variety of campaigns, including the "Campus Climate Challenge," in which MassPIRG aims to stop the effects of global warming and urges campuses to conserve energy and use clean, renewable energy sources.

"MassPIRG is a group of students that make change happen instead of just talking about change," said Marni Wasserman, organizer of "Campus Climate Challenge." "The kick-off is an opportunity for everyone interested to get involved and find out more about our campaign," she added.

MassPIRG also plans to unveil their New Voters Project that pushes young people between the ages 18-24 to register and pledge to vote on Election Day.

Another campaign is "Water Watch," which tries to preserve and clean up local watersheds by organizing local stream and river cleanups, as well as educating elementary school students about the importance of water resources.

The organization is also heading several community outreach projects that urge politicians to address social concerns related to hunger and homelessness, both at home and abroad. Another campaign aims to expose the unfair practices and pricing in the textbooks industry and provide more affordable educational resources to students.

MassPIRG is working on relief projects for Sudanese refugees from Darfur, and is actively lobbying the United Nations to intervene and provide more aid to this war-ridden nation.

In 1982, MassPIRG passed the Bottle Bill, which encouraged the recycling of bottles with a 5-cent deposit, and in December 2005 MassPIRG was able to pass the highest energy efficiency standards bill in the country for 17 common appliances.

Montreal school reopens after shooting

BY ROBERT MELNBARDIS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

MONTREAL — Holding hands, weeping and worrying, students and staff returned to Montreal's Dawson College on Monday as it reopened after a shoot-out that killed one student and injured 19 others.

Teachers and staff were the first to re-enter the building, which had been closed since Wednesday's shooting. Some admitted they did not know if they would teach this week or if they would just give their students a chance to talk.

"I know it's going to be enormously difficult for some of them," said Hanford Woods, an English literature professor who has taught at Dawson for 30 years. "I've prepared a class, but if the class doesn't happen, I'm prepared to deal with that, to talk with the students if they want to talk."

Onlookers had already created a shrine of flowers, cards and candles outside the school, which has some 10,000 students aged between 16 and 19.

Many of the flowers were pink, in memory of Anastasia DeSousa, the 18-year-old student who was shot and killed by Kimveer Gill, 25, who opened fire on the street and inside the college at lunchtime on Wednesday.

Two shooting victims remain in critical condition, while five others are also in hospital, in regular recovery wards.

Dozens of students, staff and parents gathering at the school also wore pink clothing such as sweaters and scarves.

Police said DeSousa was shot nine times. Her funeral is scheduled for Tuesday.

Some students held hands as they entered the building to collect items abandoned during the rampage, while others walked away after a brief visit, trembling and in tears.

But many waited until 12:41 p.m., the time when the shooting started, and walked in to applause from the crowd, a symbolic gesture meant to signify they were "taking back" their college.

"It was really hard. All I could think about was what happened on Wednesday," said Lina Cioffi, a 17-year-old student who was on the main building's third floor when the shooting began. "As long as we all work to get through it together, everything is going to be okay."

Dawson officials, including Director General Richard Filion, greeted the students at the front door.

Inside the entrance atrium and snack bar area where the shooting took place, students, faculty and visitors mingled before memorial panels where people wrote messages and offered condolences to the victims and school.

"We can't let hatred rule our lives," read one message.

A bouquet of pink roses from DeSousa's family was placed on a table near where she was fatally shot.

Princeton drops early admission program

BY JUSTIN POPE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Princeton University on Monday became the second elite university to drop its early admissions program, following Harvard in a move the Ivy League schools say will benefit disadvantaged students and reduce anxiety.

"We agree that early admission 'advantages the advantaged,'" Princeton President Shirley Tilghman said, echoing Harvard's comments last week.

Harvard's announcement last week that it would evaluate all applicants in a single pool prompted speculation about whether other universities would follow suit — a change that could transform the admissions process for high-achieving students.

Princeton had an "early decision" program, meaning applicants get word by Dec. 15 of their senior year, but must attend if accepted. Harvard's early program was non-binding "early action," meaning students could still weigh offers from other schools in the spring.

Such programs — particularly early decision — have been criticized for increasing the anxiety of the application process and informally discriminating against less sophisticated applicants.

We believe that elimination of early admission programs can reduce some of the frenzy, complexity and inequity in a process that even under the best of circumstances is inevitably stressful for students and their families," Tilghman said.

Princeton was considered the most likely of the prominent private universities to follow Harvard. Yale, MIT, Dartmouth and the University of Pennsylvania, among others, have all indicated they would likely keep their current systems — at least for now.

Harvard's decision — and the prospect of other universities following — was praised by many college guidance counselors, who say the pressure to find a college to apply early to has consumed students with anxiety. But others criticized the move, saying for many students early admissions reduce stress, by allowing them to get the process over with and enjoy the second half of senior year.

Princeton admitted about half of this year's entering freshman class of 1,230 through early decision. At most universities with early decision, a higher proportion of applicants are admitted in the early round, but the applicant pool itself is also stronger.

However, early applicant pools are tilted toward students who do not need financial aid — especially at colleges like Princeton that have binding early decision. More than 55 percent of Princeton students receive financial aid under a first-of-its-kind financial aid grant program that does not require any student to borrow any money to attend. But Princeton officials said they were concerned the system might discourage poorer applicants nonetheless.

The decision was discussed by Princeton's board over the weekend, the university said, and announced to faculty at a meeting late Monday.

Thailand's army commander ousts prime minister

By Grant Peck
Associated Press

BANGKOK, Thailand — Thailand's army commander staged a coup Tuesday night and ousted Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra while he was in New York, circling his offices with tanks, declaring martial law and revoking the constitution.

Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, who is known to be close to Thailand's revered monarch and is a Muslim in this Buddhist-dominated nation, took power without a shot being fired. He will serve as acting prime minister, said army spokesman Col. Akara Chitroj.

Thaksin, who was first elected in 2001, has faced calls to resign amid allegations of corruption and abuse of power, and the coup came on the eve of a major rally — the first in months — that was scheduled for Bangkok by a coalition of his foes.

"The armed forces commander and the national police commander have successfully taken over Bangkok and the surrounding area in order to maintain peace and order. There has been no struggle," the new leaders said in a statement on national television. "We ask for the cooperation of the public and ask your pardon for the inconvenience."

As soldiers and armored vehicles moved through drizzly Bangkok, the military declared a provisional authority loyal to King Bhumibol Adulyadej, calling itself the "Council of Administrative Reform."

The council, it said, soon returned power to a democratic government but did not specify what reforms they would carry out.

The military ordered all troops to report to their duty stations. There was no sign of resistance to the coup in the hours after it was announced late Tuesday.

The coup leaders also said schools, banks and the stock market will be closed Wednesday. Civil servants, including permanent secretaries of ministries, heads of state agencies, and heads of universities in the Bangkok metropolitan area were ordered to report to the council on Wednesday morning.

Akara said Deputy Prime Minister Chitchai Wannasathit had been removed from his post.

An army general, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation, said Chitchai and Defense Minister Thammarak Isaragura na Ayuthaya — two Thaksin loyalists — had been arrested.

"The government is no longer administering the country," Akara said.

Thaksin was in New York at the U.N. General Assembly, and he declared a state of emergency in an audio statement via a government-owned TV station in Bangkok in a vain attempt to stave off the coup.

Thaksin, who had been scheduled to address the General Assembly, canceled his speech.

Government spokesman Surapong Suebwonglee, who was with Thaksin in New York, said the coup leaders "cannot succeed" and was confident they would fail "because democracy in Thailand has developed to some ... measure of maturity."

At least 14 tanks surrounded Government House, Thaksin's office. A convoy of four tanks rigged with loudspeakers and sirens rolled through a busy commercial district of Bangkok, warning people to get off the street for their own safety.

The coup went largely unnoticed in Bangkok's popular tourist districts, where foreigners packed bars and cabarets, oblivious to the activity about two miles away. But word raced among street vendors hawking T-shirts, who packed up their carts quickly and started heading home.

Hundreds of people gathered at Government House, taking pictures of themselves with the tanks.

"I don't agree with the coup, but now that they've done it, I support it because Thaksin has refused to resign from his position," said university student Sasiprapha Chantawong. "Allowing Thaksin to carry on will ruin the country more than this. The reputation of the country may be somewhat damaged, but it's better than letting Thaksin stay in power."

The White House was monitoring the events closely, "but the situation at the moment is unclear," said Frederick Jones, a spokesman for President Bush's National Security Council. "We look to the Thai people to resolve their political differences in a peaceful manner and in accordance with principles of democracy and rule of law."

Former Prime Minister Chuan Leekpai, and a member of the opposition Democrat Party, said Thaksin had forced the military to act.

"As politicians, we do not support any kind of coup but during the past five years, the government of Thaksin created several conditions that forced the military to stage the coup. Thaksin has caused the crisis in the country," he told The Associated Press.

It was the first coup in Thailand since 1991, when an attempt by Prime Minister Suchinda Kraprayoon, a military general, to retain power was later countered by mass street demonstrations and Suchinda's ouster.

After that, the military vowed to remain in its barracks, in contrast to earlier decades when military coups were a staple of Thai politics.

Massive rallies earlier this year forced Thaksin to dissolve Parliament and call an election in April, three years early. The poll was boycotted by the opposition and later annulled by Thailand's top courts, leaving it without a working legislature.

Thaksin's Thai Rak Thai Party twice won landslide election victories, in 2001 and 2005 and had been expected to win the next vote on Oct 15, bolstered by its widespread support in the country's rural areas.

In March, Sondhi sought to ease speculation the military might join the political fray, as it last did in 1992 and more than a dozen other times during earlier crises.

"The army will not get involved in the political conflict. Political troubles should be resolved by politicians," Sondhi said at the time, echoing comments of other top military officials. "Military coups are a thing of the past."

On Monday, Thaksin had said he might step down as leader of Thailand after the upcoming elections but would remain as party leader, despite calls for him to give up the post.

The first sign of the coup came when army-owned TV channel 5 interrupted regular broadcasts with patriotic music and showed pictures of the king. Later, several hundred soldiers were deployed at government installations and major intersections in Bangkok.

Thaksin's critics wanted to jettison his policies promoting privatization, free trade agreements and CEO-style administration.

Opposition to Thaksin gained momentum in January when his family announced it had sold its controlling stake in telecommunications company Shin Corp. to Singapore's state-owned Temasek Holdings for a tax-free $1.9 billion. Critics allege the sale involved insider trading and complained a key national asset moved to foreign hands.

Thaksin also has been accused of stifling the media and mishandling a Muslim insurgency in southern Thailand that flared under his rule.

In the mostly Muslim-south, separatist insurgents have waged a bloody campaign that has left at least 1,700 dead, mostly civilians, since 2004. Citizens there have complained of rights abuses by soldiers and discrimination by the Buddhist majority.

Bhumibol, a 78-year-old constitutional monarch with limited powers, has used his prestige to pressure opposing parties to compromise during political crises. He is credited with helping keep Thailand more stable than many of its Southeast Asian neighbors.

He is the world's longest-serving monarch, celebrated his 60th year on the throne with lavish festivities in June that were attended by royalty from around the world.

Many Thais had been counting on him to pull the country through its political crisis, which has left it with no functioning legislature and only a caretaker government after the inconclusive election.

Bhumibol was born in Cambridge, Mass. He became the ninth king of Thailand's Chakri dynasty on June 9, 1946, succeeding his older brother, Ananda, killed by an unexplained shooting.

Since then, he has reigned through a score of governments, democratic and dictatorial. He has taken an especially active role in rural development.

In 1992, demonstrators against a military strongman were gunned down before the king stepped in to end the fighting and usher in a period of stability.

Police charge two men in near-fatal Duquesne shooting

Pittsburgh police detectives lead 18-year-old Brandon Baynes (center) from police headquarters in Pittsburgh on Sept. 19, 2006.

By Dan Nephin
Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — Police charged two men Tuesday with shooting five Duquesne University basketball players after a school dance, and they accused a 19-year-old sophomore of helping six men into the dance despite knowing some were armed.

Brandon Baynes, 18, faced arraignment on charges of aggravated assault, reckless endangerment, carrying an unlicensed firearm and criminal conspiracy. Police were still hunting Tuesday for William Holmes, also 18 and wanted on the same charges.

Three players remained hospitalized following Sunday's shootings after the dance. The most seriously wounded, junior forward Sam Ashaolu, 23, was in critical condition with bullet fragments in his head.

Brittany Jones, accused of helping get some young men with guns into the party, was arrested Monday on charges of reckless endangerment, carrying a firearm without a license and criminal conspiracy. She was arraigned and posted bond Tuesday morning.

According to the criminal complaint, Jones — who is active with the Black Student Union, which sponsored the dance — got a call from a man asking whether he and his brother could attend. They arrived with four others about midnight.

While walking to the party, Jones told police, she became aware that several of the men had guns, authorities said.

They asked Jones if they were going to be "patted down" before entering, officials said. The doorman reportedly told Jones partygoers weren't being searched, and the men went into the dance, police said.

It wasn't immediately clear whether Baynes and Holmes were part of the group. Police Cmdr. Thomas Stangrecki did not take questions at a news conference announcing the charges against the men.

In interviews Monday with The Associated Press, several players said the shooter was a non-student unhappy that the woman he accompanied to the dance had talked with a player. The shooter and at least one other man followed the players when they left the dance to walk to their dormitory, they said.

Jones' attorney, James Ecker, would not confirm Tuesday whether she was cooperating with authorities and would not comment on reports that authorities may drop charges if she provides information to the police.

"I can say she's spent a lot of time with police in the last couple of days, Sunday and Monday," Ecker said. "Until this case goes to a hearing or trial, she's presumed innocent," he said.

University president Charles Dougherty said he was grateful to police for the "swift arrest of the individual who may have been the shooter in the vicious attacks on Duquesne University students last Sunday morning."

Besides Ashaolu, the other injured players were junior guard Kojo Mensah, 21; 6-foot-7 forward Stuard Baldonado, 21; junior center Shawn James, 23; and Aaron Jackson, 20, a guard who is one of only two returning players from Duquesne's 3-24 team last season.

Ashaolu remained in critical condition Tuesday with a buffet, shattered into three pieces, in his head.

Baldonado was in fair condition Tuesday with arm and back injuries, he likely won't play this season because his back injury will require two to three months of rehabilitation. He was expected to be released from the hospital by the end of the week.

Mensah, shot in an arm and shoulder, was kept at a hospital to receive additional injections of antibiotics but was expected to be discharged later Tuesday. In an interview with The Associated Press on Monday, Jackson said he and teammate Stephen Wood dropped to the ground when shots rang out. Mensah, Baldonado and Ashaolu were the first players hit in the attack. James was wounded on the foot but escaped by running across the football field.

Return government to people

Nick Milano

After the 2004 presidential election, analysts, historians and politicians spoke at great lengths about the highest voter turnout the country had seen since 1968. A shocking 55.3 percent of the voting age population went to the polls, but the same year Australia's federal elections drew a truly impressive 94 percent of its voting age population. How does Australia make the United States, the birthplace of democracy, look so out-of-touch with its democratic traditions?

The government records the citizens who do not vote and asks them to give a reason for not voting, or pay a $20 fine. Despite campaigns to get out the vote, they have not caused a consistent rise in voter turnout, and it is time for drastic measures. A compulsory voting law here in the United States would return the government to the people.

The simple explanation for low turnout is that the importance of voting is not fully realized by a majority of American citizens, especially by the younger generation, our generation. It is said that one vote does not make a difference, but when 100 million eligible voters believe their one vote matters not, democracy fails. Proof of this is the fact that since 1960, not one national election has seen a turnout of over 63 percent of eligible voters. In recent years, participation in mid-term elections has hovered at just over one-third. This indifference is both limiting democracy and adding to the radicalization of the national government.

Witnesses to this radicalization are Sens. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., and Lincoln Chaffee, R-R.I., who have been ostracized just for being Moderates. Lieberman was so bold as to defend the war in Iraq, and the result was his defeat in the Connecticut primary. Sen. Chaffee is currently under attack for voting in favor of a resolution to pull U.S. troops out of Iraq. Neither of these gentlemen was sucked into the extremes of their respective parties, and may now lose their jobs to more Liberal and Conservative candidates. The two Moderates are among the last of their kind, and if neither are elected, the Senate will be even more unbalanced.

The people who do vote consistently in every election are the party activists. Party activists are traditionally very active in politics and are also some of the most Liberal and Conservative members of their respective parties. On the other hand, the largest group of Americans, self-identified Moderates, fails to vote consistently. It is those who stay at home who keep politicians playing to the far Left and Right, not to the middle.

By no means should people go to jail for not voting, but why should they not be punished for failing to fulfill the vital civic duty that keeps the government accountable?

Thus, the solution to this problem is to make voting a mandatory civic duty similar to jury duty. A simple fine like Australia's $20 would make prospective voters think twice before staying home on Election Day. Democracy works best when it has the full participation of the people, not just a minority. Compulsory voting laws are not a new idea by any means, and the country most famous for these laws is Australia. Turnout there in the 1922 election was below 60 percent, but in the first election after voting was made compulsory, the turnout hit 91 percent. After its strong beginning, turnout in Australia's elections has never fallen below 90 percent. The government was interested in hearing the voice of not only those taking the time to vote, but also from the entire population.

The opposition to compulsory voting will argue that voting is a right, not a duty. Forcing people to go to the polls would actually make the United States less democratic and infringe on civil rights; however, there are other civic actions which are enforced by law. It is the law to attend public school, it is the law to pay taxes and most comparably, it is the law to attend jury duty when called. Not performing jury duty when selected is first punishable by fines and followed with imprisonment. By no means should people go to jail for not voting, but why should they not be punished for failing to fulfill the vital civic duty that keeps the government accountable?

Other detractors of compulsory voting will argue that the government will spend too much money trying to track down non-voters, but the price is never too much to pay for near full participation by the body politic. Australia has also found the number of ballots not finished correctly has stayed below 5.2 percent, and of that 5.2 percent only 28 percent are suspected to be incorrect on purpose.

Compulsory voting is surely a controversial idea, but it has been proven to increase democracy in over 30 countries. Australia has a system that if copied by the United States, would force the government to respond to the will of the true majority, not just the majority of a minority.

Since this country was first founded, voting has served the dual purpose of choosing representation and affirming belief in the democratic system. In this kind of system, all voices are to be heard. To relinquish this right and voice is to desire freedom from democracy. Elections were designed to keep the elected honest, but to do this everyone needs to vote.

Point-Counter-Point
Discourse on literary courses

James Mathews

Wesley Miller

James: I went to an English class for the first time yesterday. I've never had my intelligence assaulted on so many fronts. I had to leave. Are you still a major? I hope not.

Wes: James, how could you say such things about my beloved English major? I suppose you're about to raise the contention that we're all a bunch of lost souls floating willy-nilly on a sea of bad Hemingway and prose.

James: Oh, come on — have you seen the way they teach English these days? Have you been inside an English classroom during a full-on analysis? It's like a secret club, playing the secret game of literary cheap-talk. It makes me sick.

Wes: Have you been inside an economics classroom lately? Do you understand the phrase "supply and demand?" We need complicated language, the "game" as you say. If not, our analysis of literature would be confined to pointless value judgments: "It was good, it was bad, it was funny, it was sad."

Wes: After all, a world without strife, challenge or satisfaction would not be worth living in, and we have a word for that word. That word is "Amherst."

James: Complicated language? I couldn't care less about the fact that you have a discourse. Everybody has a discourse. Even the guys over in Stockbridge have a discourse, but at least they admit that a cow is a cow and a field is a field. But you, you say that a book could be anything. Chew on this: the real book burners are bad readers, who talk and analyze their books to death.

Wes: First of all, a cow isn't a discourse. A cow is a cow. If I asked you to show me a cow, you could probably take me out to the Hadley farm and show me one. If I asked you to show me a man's soul, you'd be hard pressed to find one drinking out of a trough. To show me a soul you need special language. Though we burn our books through the process of analysis, as you might say, the heat generated is what pulls us through the cold.

James: Wes, you Massachusetts Liberal. You might as well take all that is holy in the English language, throw it in your passenger seat and drive it off the bridge in Chappaquiddick. If all that "man" is going to do is generate a lot of brainless hot air and pretend that it's some kind of romantic, sustaining heat, then his soul is the last thing I care about. Do you need to fulfill your urge to create? Write your own book. All of this "the author could've meant anything," nonsense is just a cheap way out of the fact that books have intended meanings. People write them with purpose.

Wes: Hot air makes the balloon fly, and the higher we are above civilization the better we can gain perspective on it. When you use the phrase "could have," we attribute a very special quality to literature, the same quality that binds us to it, that makes reading worthwhile. Take John Milton's epic, "Paradise Lost." In it, he vows to justify the ways of God to man. His idea of the "fortunate fall," (our ejection from Eden) proliferated a whole new way of thinking about our unfortunate lot in life. After all, a world without strife, challenge or satisfaction would not be worth living in, and we have a word for that world. That word is "Amherst."

James: Amherst is dead, I agree, but if John Milton were alive today, he'd punch you in the face.

James: Amherst is dead, I agree, but if John Milton were alive today, he'd punch you in the face. Sure, the man was interpreting, but at least he wasn't telling a freshman writing class that the old man was the human heart, the sea was just a sea of loneliness, and the only reason he caught the shark was so he'd have somebody to love, or something like that. Milton would've respected the author, and he would've told you that an English major would be worth the world if you were taught to read like a rational, thinking person. He'd have hated the way it's done these days just as much as I do.

Wes: Well, old man Mathews, it's true that Milton was a Christian, and he wouldn't have said what he said if he didn't think God meant it, but I find your obsession with being so rational limiting. After a while, reason and rationalism start to function like a prison. Imagine a man confined to a cell, with only a small window and a single view of the world. After a certain time, that would be all he could know or understand. The English major operates in a different way entirely. We seek to liberate the individual. How? With empathy and identification. Development of elastic concepts and a nuanced, pliable idea of reality will ultimately be our salvation. Unfortunately, you need intellectual freedom for that sort of thing.

James: Imagine an English major confined to a cell. He's not going to get out by whining for his freedom through the window to the stars. He's got to think. Reason, Mr. Miller, is not a prison. Reason is the great liberator of men, and the source of all your poetics on empathy. Get rid of reason, and your precious elastic concepts will go right out the window with it. I don't know what kind of department teaches its students not to think, but I'm ashamed that there's one on, well, every campus in the country.

Wes: You're right — maybe we should have more English majors in jail — prison literature is a lucrative business. But let me ask you this: if English majors don't think, why is your average English discussion characterized by pensive silences, heated debates and heady insights? It seems to me a major like English would require the most intense thought processes on campus. It sure beats furiously copying down notes verbatim and pointless memorization. Anybody that approaches an English major this way has really missed the point.

James: Missing the point, as you say, is my main concern here. I'm aware that at least a bit of healthy philosophical dialogue goes on every day behind the closed doors of 2nd floor, Bartlett Hall, but I'm just not sure what it amounts to. Are you learning about life, are you coursing through the history of man like you say, or are you wasting your time by putting your own words into the mouth of one author or another? If it's the latter, I'm concerned for you and for every student enrolling in the major, wherever they may be. If you and they both fail to learn that the beauty you see in Shakespeare or the truth you find in Milton is yours and belongs to you and you only, then you'll take it all for granted and all will go to waste.

Wes: Well, James, I suppose literature is ultimately a medium by which we can approach all of these things. And until we've perfected a time machine and we can take John Keats out to the Moany to buy him a pint and ask what he meant by beauty, truth, truth beauty, literature will be subject to our experience. What is a poem if it does not make us laugh, fight back tears or feel righteous indignation? That's the truth and beauty of literature: what we value about certain texts speaks volumes about the nature of our beings. Through literature we can explore the whole gamut of human endeavor. As English majors, we feel that language and literature is the key to all these things and more.

James: I'm all for exploring the history of man, and "the whole gamut of human endeavor" is a good six words for what should be studied in colleges throughout the Western world. I'm fine with the way you engage yourself creatively, the steps you take to explore yourself: they're necessary for any aspiring artist's development. But I'd beware of putting words in people's mouths. I know I get pretty angry when it's done to me, even in a little discussion on the steps of the Student Union.

"I'm frustrated with the administration," I'll say. "So you hate Republicans?" "No." Imagine this happening to your novel. You spend more than a few good years of your life writing something out, perfecting your plot, your word choice and your rhythm, only to have your little masterpiece thrown to the sharks of analysis who immediately chomp it down to digestible socio-historical bits. Only the skeleton remains.

Wes: Nice interpretation of Hemingway, man. Maybe you ought to drop by Bartlett some day and offer us a few interpretations. You're uglier than Socrates and dumber than Plato. Better luck next time.

James: You can find me in Bartlett, but I'll be in the philosophy department, where my Hemingway actually means something, you insufferable poet. I hope you die lonely, just like Emily Dickinson. I'll see you tomorrow.

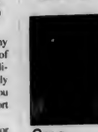
Frank talk about safe sex



Greg Collins

I noticed something very disturbing at the start of this semester. In plain view to the public, located near kiosks intended to help students find their classrooms, were large jars filled with condoms. As part of a promotion to raise awareness for safe sex education, students were encouraged to guess how many condoms filled up the whole jar. The counting contest raises the issue of the methods through which public officials and concerned advocates go about promoting safe sex initiatives on campus.

The University of Massachusetts has been the location for various safe sex programs within the past few semesters. During the summer before my freshman year, the Not Ready for Bedtime Players, a popular student group on campus sponsored by the Health Education Department of University Health Services, organized a performance on serious issues confronting students, like underage drinking and date rape. A substantial portion of this presentation focused on the proper ways to use a condom and on other information intended to raise awareness of safe sex.

Another student group, VOX: Students for Choice, organized an event called "Sex on the Lawn" last spring. Inspired by a similar event held at the University of Florida, VOX set up tables on the Student Union campus lawn where condoms, safe sex literature and other pamphlets and flyers were distributed. "Captain Condom," a student dressed up in a condom costume, welcomed visitors to the event. According a Daily Collegian article that quoted the president of VOX, the purpose of "Sex on the Lawn" was, among other reasons, to "promote safe practices [and] comprehensive sex education."

The condom jar exhibit was merely the most recent occurrence of wide-ranging efforts by safe sex advocates on this campus to promote responsible sexual behavior. Few would disagree with the notion that safe sexual practices, whether this includes abstinence or other forms of birth control, should be acknowledged as an important topic of discussion. Yet, the questions that safe sex proponents at UMass Amherst should seriously consider are whether these efforts have actually proven to be effective in combating self-destructive sexual behavior and in heightening awareness of safe sex education, and also whether such methods are the best way to accomplish these tasks.

The questions need to be raised because I believe these public events, while organized with good intentions, are ineffective. Holding safe sex initiatives in a public setting, such as in an auditorium, communicates to the viewers that sex is a public topic. Regardless of the messages transmitted by cultural trends, through which the public is confronted with sexually explicit images and rhetoric consistently on television and other societal entertainment venues, frank talk about sex absent the rhetoric is best nurtured in private settings which facilitate more honest, open discussion.

Sex should be treated as a private, personal and serious subject by safe sex advocates because while the potential satisfaction of sexual activity is high, its possible unintended consequences transcend the ramifications of other activities of pleasure.

This is why putting on safe sex events in an entertaining manner, as the Not Ready for Bedtime Players, VOX and others have done, is a severe misjudgment. How can students receive the message that sex is a pleasurable act but also a serious one when safe sex advocates give performances which downgrade the latter and emphasize the former, when it should be the opposite?

Yes, students may feel less compelled to attend events if they are not entertaining. So, if the intention of safe sex proponents is to amuse students about sex, then safe sex advocacy on campus should continue to put on public demonstrations and provide condoms on campus lawns in public.

However, if the UMass Amherst administration, Health Services and current safe sex proponents are serious about promoting responsible sexual behavior, then they should reform their efforts by instituting a decentralization process by encouraging serious thought and dialogue on the matter in more private settings. For instance, a part of this initiative would place more responsibility in the hands of resident assistants to educate the residents of the floor about STDs, using a condom, etc., through periodic floor meetings. Have RAs make clear that there will be condoms available within the dorm (this is what my RA did last year by putting them on a support made of paper attached to his door).

Also, have the Not Ready for Bedtime Players and VOX visit dorms to give presentations on safe sex (in a much more private setting than auditoriums) in a serious, rather than entertaining, manner. Organize peer-to-peer relationships to better increase dialogue between concerned students and safe sex advocates who have extensive experience dealing with these issues.

Initiatives such as these will still raise awareness of safe sex education, but will it lead to more responsible sexual decisions made by the student body? That remains to be seen, but at least the responsibility of safe sex education will be more in the hands of peers in a closer, more private setting than in wide-ranging public forums. And, just like sex, this is ultimately where it should be.

Rockets are a waste of money

Michael Shulman

In 1958, this country looked toward the heavens and aspired for greatness; this was the year that NASA was launched. Created under the pressure for national defense during the Cold War, the NASA program, now reaching its 50th anniversary, has been a colossal waste of money for this country. Reaching its peak of success in 1969 with the lunar landing, the modern history of NASA has been riddled with shuttles that cannot be launched and space stations that cannot be repaired. Despite early successes in the administration's history, the current faults have made NASA a wasteful spending project in need of serious revision.

According to the Office of Management and Budget, NASA's budget for 2006 was $16.5 billion, up 2 percent from last year. This is in contrast to the less than $15 million the government spends on Federal Direct Student Loans (FDSL), and an overall decrease in spending in education across the board. This country is wasting money through NASA by sending million-dollar rockets into space to have them crash into rocks. I think we can redistribute some of the money that is allocated to NASA and use it to make education more affordable.

According to the Office of Management and Budget, NASA's budget for 2006 was $16.5 billion, up two percent from last year. This is in contrast to the less than $15 million the government spends on Federal Direct Student Loans (FDSL), and an overall decrease in spending in education across the board.

Mismanaged finances are just the tip of the iceberg when it comes to problems facing NASA. The second is the public perception of the organization. The country and the modern world were captivated by images of Neil Armstrong and Buzz Aldrin walking on the moon. This was the first, and only, time that humankind has set foot on ground that is not part of our planet. Since that time, NASA has been busy exploring planets, stars and other space objects. However, none of these explorations or discoveries have come close to matching the significance and majesty of the events in 1969. Not even the creation of the International Space Station yielded the support and excitement NASA was hoping to receive by the public.

Despite lackluster support for NASA's undertakings, the space agency continues to make headlines. Unfortunately, these headlines usually are results of tragedy or miscalculations. As I approach my 20th birthday, I can only think of NASA in terms of the explosions of two different space shuttles, as well as the engineering mistakes that led to several faulty space explorations.

The first of these unfortunate moments in history was when the space shuttle Challenger exploded as it took off on Jan. 28, 1986. This was followed by the Hubble telescope being launched, but produces with its engineering rendered it to taking fuzzy images of space. More recently, in 2001, the space shuttle Colombia exploded over Texas as it was reentering the Earth's atmosphere. I am unable to experience the fascination my parents had when space was first being discovered. During my lifetime, NASA has been unable to put together successful missions without the risk of endangering those who are traveling in spacecrafts.

To this day, problems with fuel tanks and pieces of foam continue to plague NASA, keeping the rest of the shuttle fleet grounded. After all these years our technology is failing us, and we have yet to come up with new ideas on how to return to space and spark the interest that once captivated earlier generations. It is time to make an important decision regarding the future of NASA and space exploration. Crashing million dollar machines into asteroids does not seem to be a priority for this country at this time. We cannot even fix the problems we are having with the shuttle, therefore halting all human space travel. The time has come to reexamine the costs and benefits of having such an expensive program to explore space.

The 2006 NASA Strategic Plan lists several goals the organization has for the next upcoming years. The main focus of NASA is to create more programs for human space flight, which will lead to new explorations, especially toward Mars and a second visit to the moon. These ambitious plans, however, cannot be carried out because we have lost the ability to successfully launch astronauts into space and bring them back alive. Therefore, until we can fix the space shuttle, unmanned satellites have taken over as the mode of exploration. This is going to limit the amount of exciting exploration NASA has planned for the next decade.

NASA was born from the race into space and this country's competition with the Soviet Union for militaristic and exploration superiority. Now, Russian space exploration has been limited since the fall of communism, and very few nations can compete with the amount of money the government spends on NASA. This money has not paid off, and there is a lack of public support in the exploration of space and the continuing maintenance of the International Space Station. NASA's budget should be cut, at least until it can make space travel safe and refocus missions, which will captivate the public just as they did in 1969.

Peeking at foes

Teresa Franco

You log onto your MySpace, Facebook, whatever Internet info consuming device you prefer, and the bully from 5th grade is staring you in the face from your friend request box. The grin the bully is expressing in the user picture reminds you of only embarrassment and rage, yet you confirm the request anyway. After one click, you will have a full update on the whereabouts of your former enemy daily. With every login, you will have to stare into the digital eyes of someone you wished you would never see again.

It's a wonder how easily we subject ourselves to submitting requests of friendship via the Internet to people we could care less about and/or don't like in general. What drives us to this level? Why is everyone's life an exciting read even if they are despised?

We look up fickle friends, and I'm sure a good amount of people can admit to Googling their ex-significant other at some point in their lives, though we would prefer to have them erased from our minds completely. I will shamefully admit to submerging myself to this level and accepting requests from former friends I've had falling-outs with.

I have studied their profiles with the concentration I give my notes before an exam. I sift through their photos, read their interests and sometimes skim through their written bios. Looking into their current lives does not lighten my bitterness or bring me closure. Yet I continue to take occasional peeks into their lives as if staring at the two-dimensional picture on the screen will give me the apology I have been looking for all these years.

Could we be fulfilling some strange desire to romanticize our dull lives by staring at pictures that only stir jealousy within us? Flipping through photos of the mean girls from high school in sunny California is certainly not comforting, and does it really make us feel any better to see former love interests with their new beaus, wrapped into each other with wide smiles? After so much personal info is gathered it could open up a detective agency, we start to feel like creeps and become ashamed of the precious time we wasted. Un-enjoyable precious time wasted.

All the reasons for this nonsense can be summed up in two simple words: it's there. We are not scary stalkers due to the fact that all we have to do is type in a few words and find what we are looking for. Stalkers would take on highly more complicated and detailed ways to obtain the information they want. Unlike most people's Internet splurges, stalkers usually physically do their stalking. As long as you are not writing long hateful notes to these former foes or sending violent threats in message boxes, you are as normal as any other young adult.

It's tempting to know there's all this information we can easily grab floating about in the virtual world, why not take advantage of it? It's human to be interested in what happened to people from our past, especially when the information presents itself so clearly in front of us. Today you can gain as much information in minutes as Meg Ryan's character in "Sleepless in Seattle" found after phone calls upon phone calls. All it takes is a few swift finger movements, and you will be directed to what you were looking for instantly.

Surfing through community networks, such as MySpace and Facebook, is a good way to kill time in between classes and have yourself a quick laugh or two. There are the occasional benefits every once in awhile. You may come across a former foe and find out all their wrong doings have caught up with them, and they are in jail somewhere across the country.

Another upside is being informed of where those we fear encountering are and knowing when to be on the lookout for them. We are completely anonymous behind a screen, so we can bounce from site to site, profile to profile without anyone having the slightest clue we were there.

As tormenting as it is coming across details of someone's life we do not wish to know, there is the fun side. We can laugh all we want at the mean pretty girl from junior high's appalling new hairdo, and there would not be a soul to witness it. It's a way to communicate and reconnect with those we have lost, and who knows? Maybe the bully from 5th grade's friend request is a pixel-covered form of saying "I'm sorry."

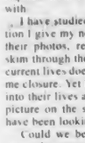
Freshmen rules: dorm etiquette



Brad Leibowitz

So it's back to school for another year. For the majority of us, we will simply begin where we left off last year amidst drunken wild nights, late night Wings/Domino's, and yes, the occasional hookup. However, for the freshman out there, the college experience is just beginning to run its course, and you may be wondering what the common etiquette around school is. Well don't worry.

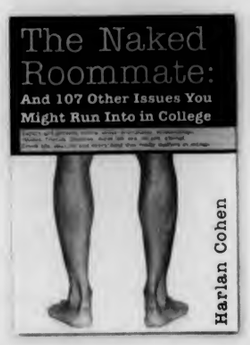
I've got you covered.

You may have a good roommate, you may not. You might have gone to a few good parties, whether they were in the dorms, a frat house or somewhere off campus, and you might have made some friends in class. However, there is still more to learn.

Your parents sent you to college to get an education and somehow become more mature (but we all know that for the majority of us, the former and the latter aren't going to happen), not to regress and get the cute girl down the hall to fold your boxer-briefs.

From the town houses to the frat houses, to the on-going campus argument about how to properly pronounce "Goessman," and to the confident (or not so confident) nod and smile on the way to the showers, here are your rules for surviving freshman year in the dorms:

1) Treat your dorm room like your home. This means clean up after yourself, do not destroy any of the furniture in the room and, above all, take out the trash. Think about it this way, on Friday night when you are having friends over to pregame before the night, you wouldn't want to show your friends into your room only to find your roommates Wendy's wrappers, his wet towel, a three-day-old half-eaten orange and your chair smashed in half all in the middle of the room while your new roommate dances around in his underwear to "Macarena." Just be respectful of your room and your roommate. This brings me to rule number two.



2) Whatever you do this year, the first thing you need to do is establish the nudity rule in your room. Now, depending on how comfortable you are with your body, you can be assured your roommate does not share your sentiment, so don't assume it's all right to walk around the way you were born. Simply, if you're going to be naked, alert your roommate to the fact, and then see where the chips fall. If he or she doesn't mind, then by all means swing free, but for goodness sake, don't squat or bend over.

3) If you're a guy, do your own laundry. Your parents sent you to college to get an education and somehow become more mature (but we all know that for the majority of us, the former and the latter aren't going to happen), not to regress and get the cute girl down the hall to fold your boxer-briefs. If you're a girl, never date a guy who has his mom or the girl from down the hall whom he calls "my underwear handler" do his laundry, believe me, if you do, you're just asking for trouble and a dirty boy.

4) This is the most important rule to follow. Along with the uncomfortable wave to the cute girl/boy down the hall when you are both going to the shower, whatever you do, never hook up with that person or anyone in your building. There is a reason as to why that wave is awkward, and the reason is now that you're both in such close proximity, the possibility to see each other's cash and prizes have become more than a possibility; it has become one drunken night away from fully happening. Now, if you do choose to indulge in the down the hall hook-up, whether due to convenience or because of the booze, there are three things you need to know will happen.

One, the morning after you're not going to want to talk to one another, but you must, because otherwise, all there is between you two is an empty wrapper and the half empty bottle of tequila, which is now threatening to make a reappearance. If you two choose not to talk, it is a certainty that your short-lived relationship is exactly that, short-lived.

Two, after a few days go by and another weekend comes, your problems begin. Either one party says something that goes awry, which pisses the other off, or more likely, one party could see the other hook up with someone else in or outside of the building. This, again, pisses the first party off, which sets the path to number three.

When all is said and done, either one of two things are going to take place: One, you patch things up, which leads to a successful friendship or relationship. The second option (which is also more likely) is that you relive that night a few times and end up not talking to one another. Not only is this inconvenient for you and him/her, it is also inconvenient for your roommate, who has most likely become friends with the culprit down the hall. My advice: keep it to the tongue-tied wave while going to the shower.

Finally, #5: Go to the gym, you'll thank me next year.

America lacking individuality

M.J. Toomey

My dearest contemplator, accolades to you, as meaningless as we both likely find them to be, for your thoughts on the single most valid institution of all living things through all time. This validity, in and of itself, makes the lemming of symbolic importance to us, but as far as I know, the lemming's endeavor may well be completed. I haven't heard mention of the fuzzy little guy in over 10 years, so without any zoological report documenting their perfection of a valuable process, of symbolic importance will the lemming remain.

Like that tiny creature, which may or may not have achieved a self-initiated extinction, perhaps you've had that visceral kick in your gut. Oh, you know ... it's the one that knocks the breath out of you, topples you to the floor and, when the gasping slows, elicits the tear-laden cry of "Why?" The question doesn't limit itself to the why behind getting booted in the belly, but is open to everything and anything.

Why are you here at UMass? Why are you in the state or the country, for that matter? Why are you reading this paper, and really, if we get down to it, why are you alive, breathing, subsisting on dry hamburgers and watered-down Diet Coke? Why are you taking classes to help prepare you to earn a living when you'd really prefer anything but putting in 40 hours a week making someone richer than you a lot richer?

Why bother going to parties when the guys seem weaned on the loudly boorish manner-isms of the 80s wrestling villain the Ultimate Warrior (and watch baseball) and the girls seem to embody Anna Nicole and Paris wrapped up in American Eagle sweatshirts? What's the point of living in an America that would allow the atrocity of a Taylor Hicks American Idol among a million other more valid atrocities, where everyone can be a superstar, but no one stands out because of it. Why?

Fellow misanthrope, that is the question. Why continue in a perplexing race to the arrogant and grossly unjustified self-worship pumped at us through MTV and our president when you see where most of our heads are at, and the view is crappy and the smell must be just awful.

Our fellow disenfranchised Nobel Prize winning writer Albert Camus is the modern pioneer of our cause, stating that the only valid question in life is whether or not to commit suicide. He died before the era of the quick fix took power, before reality television attributed fame and fortune to contemptibly subpar specimens of our horde, before millions of people fell victim to the fashion disaster of Red Sox caps, striped, faded faux vintage or Red Sox shirts, khaki shorts or ill-fitting jeans and white shoes. Wow. If he lived under these conditions he wouldn't have even made it to "A Happy Death," and that was his first unpublished novel.

What's the point of living in an America that would allow the atrocity of a Taylor Hicks American Idol among a million other more valid atrocities, where everyone can be a superstar, but no one stands out because of it. Why?

What have we got to live for anymore? A supersweet 16? Corporate success? Personal achievement? Haven't we tired of that, my morose readers? Through such awful voyeurism offered to us by television and that infinity of the World Wide Web, nothing escapes the clunk-clunk castration (ouch) of life's intrigue and worth.

As everyone seems to know (while we as thinkers may have doubts), our options haven't the need to be varied, because the time-tested remedies are still working strongly for the majority of us. A majority that sits in bleary-eyed boredom in classes, jobs, with significant others ... the very things that should (if anything should that is) be important to us, but yet, we're waiting for a recess, for Friday to practice a spirited (101) euthanizing of whatever has got us so damn bored.

Make no mistake, however, we've got reason to be bored. But that's why it's important to wonder what the point of any of this happens to be, because it seems the only resistance to a very depressing epidemic a la the lemming. We, the haggard thinkers, find conforming at this point is a dubious move, as it amounts to conforming to the disillusionment of a nation, if not the whole of modern society which can't be good.

So, what's left to wonder here and now is, who are these furry lemming masochists akin to? Are they our herd of destitution making well with drunken postponement, or those outside of the pack trying to figure why they're part of such a miserable species? It's of course your thought to ponder, but we might get our answers sooner when we see who first takes the plunge. But by then it might be too late.

The Drive-By Truckers will be appearing at the Pearl Street Night Club tonight in Northampton.

Drive-By expected in No-Ho

BY DAVE MASTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Tonight the Drive-By Truckers will headline Pearl Street Night Club, along with opening act Bobby Bare Jr.

Gaining titles like "the greatest band on earth," "the saviors of rock 'n' roll," and "heirs to Lynyrd Skynyrd," is not an easy thing to do. But The Drive-By Truckers do so, and wear a humble crown along the way. Their focus is honesty and truth through the eyes of the South. They don't just write about the South, they live in it. They write about love, loss, suicide, death, and boozing, all of which stare them in the eyes like a rabid coyote, every day. And if you question them, they won't care. They'll flip you the bird and continue to rock the socks off any stuck-up person who's wearing tight designer jeans and watches the OC.

How did a grimy group of southern "things" get such a title? They certainly don't look the part. They aren't from the city and they aren't fashionable, and their hair probably still has dried-up whiskey in it from the night before. The truth is, these rock 'n' roll saviors aren't in it for the money or the image. They speak the truth, which calls into question every other hip, new musical group out there today.

Indy kids, beware.

The Drive-By Truckers are a five-piece rock band that will kick your butt if the guy whose girlfriend you cheated on didn't. Based in Athens, Georgia with members originating from northern Alabama, "The Southern Thing" is the chief alligator they aim to tackle.

Their music is full of power, driven by tasteful lead guitar riffs and 4-piece Marshal Stacks, where bar chords and power chords speak the loudest. With a "three ax attack" — a three-guitar lineup — and plentiful shots of Jack Daniels, the Drive-By Truckers' hard living and hard rocking mentality is a lifestyle, not just a style of life. With the combined forces of the three front men/songwriters for the band — Patterson Hood, Mike Cooley, and Jason Isbell — an unstoppable power of musicianship persists. The "three ax attack" battle on the frontlines of rock and sacrifice fortunes to stay true to their music and themselves.

Known as back-porch historians, DBT describe "The Southern Thing" in great detail, where personal experience becomes more than just personal. The southern condition is amplified in the album "A Southern Rock Opera." Throughout the two-disc record, the band Lynyrd Skynyrd is used as a metaphor to explore the South. Both Lynyrd Skynyrd and the South are jam-packed with opposition. "It became such a perfect metaphor for exploring the South and its contradictions," Hood says. The album primarily focuses on what it means to be from the South, along with its inescapable social and political realities.

Their latest album, "A Blessing and a Curse," though keeping true to the hard lifestyle themes of the band's previous albums, takes on a different musical standpoint. The 12-track album is full of pop gems, sounding less like Lynyrd Skynyrd and Neil Young, and more like The Rolling Stones and The Black Crows, (even though there were still broken bottles of whiskey and beer on the floor of the recording studio when they were done). Instead of using long, winding metaphors to get a point across, "A Blessing and a Curse" utilizes clarity to convey the heart of their tunes. DBT's diversity only confirms that they are "the greatest band on earth." DBT's diversity also caused some die-hard fans to die hard when this album was released, causing the title of the album to hold truth.

Opening for the Drive-By Truckers is Bobby Bare Jr. and his band. Bobby has the uncanny ability to expand the size of any room with his large personality and sense of humor. His rock songs only mirror his persona.

His musical style of rock greatly compliments the rock of their closer. With Bobby Bare Jr. and the Drive-By Truckers, an almost symbiotic relationship exists with their music, roughly like the balance that the confederates and the union during the Civil War never had. Truth and truth come together like peanut butter and jelly, or better yet, Jack Daniels and Coca Cola.

This show is must see for any rock 'n' roll lover. Tonight, rock will be played the right way, on a stage littered with empty bottles in room crowed with excited fans. Expect to see Patterson Hood and his comrades decked out in ripped denim and frazzled hair, with their axes ready to swing.

A re-vamped Who rocks the Garden

BY ALLY WELCH
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Forty-one years ago, a fresh British band called The Who grasped the nation with their youthful energy and debuting album, "My Generation." Since then the lads of The Who have stuck around, making their mark on the music scene with memorable hits like "Baba O'Riley" and their colorful rock opera "Tommy." Despite their retirement from music in 1982, the band recently produced new material, keeping those sounds of fast-paced rock beats mixed with a unique synthetic sound. Last Saturday night at the Bank North Garden in Boston, The Who proved to an eager audience their continuing enthusiasm to bring an audience almost as old as they are to their feet.

The Who's remaining original members, Roger Daltrey and Pete Townshend, took the stage for two hours, with a little help from Townshend's brother Simon on guitar, bassist Pino Palladino, drummer Zak Starkey and John "Rabbit" Bundrick on the keys.

Their new album, "Endless Wire" became The Who's proud material for nearly half the show's numbers, and although the songs were mostly unfamiliar, Daltrey's strong vocals and Townshends fierce guitar playing were still pleasing to the audience.

The new pieces featured opening titles "I Can't Explain" and "The Seeker," both rock songs leaving die-hard Who fans in anticipation for the hits. The first hit of the night, "Who are you?" came casually after Townshend spent about two minutes reminiscing with one of the audience members. He ended the uncanny conversation by hesitantly asking the attendee, "Who are you?"

We were also introduced to a six-song mini rock opera titled "Wire and Glass," which the band explained was released in Europe but rarely played in the United States. The Who played all six songs in a row to complete the opera found on their latest album.

Daltrey and Townshend appeared comfortable and content, cracking jokes at Mick Jagger and swearing sporadically to the audience with comments both complimenting and comically insulting. With Daltrey's screams and Townshends complicated guitar chords, it's easy to forget that these guys are in their 60s, performing music they played in the '60s. The use of the harmonica made "Baba O'Riley" even more riveting, and the colorful montage of band images as a stage backdrop made it ok to take your eyes off the rock icons.

What made The Who's performance exciting was the flow of music. The band would play a mellower track like "Black Widow's Eye" and transition it into the lively "You Better You Bet." Before you knew it, the band was plunging into your favorite Who tune.

The new material transitioned into the old and tied together all the sounds The Who has captured over the past four decades. A newer song would segue into "Won't Get Fooled Again," which might have been the best live song performed by any band in years. Bundrick's synthetic keyboard sounded perfect while Starkey's drum built up the song's climax at Daltrey's sexy rock star scream. It lasted six seconds, took about seven minutes to get to, but it was none the less what the crowd was waiting to hear.

What may have been missing during the show was crowd interaction and the regard of the band member's talent. Townshend stayed in the same spot all night while Daltrey seemed to wander around the stage as if there was nothing better to do during the instrumentals. There were no significant instrumental solos other than the ones already in the songs. Members other than Townshend and Daltrey were rarely acknowledged until the show's end, making it seem as if the two originals just ran the entire thing.

Still, many of the characteristics of The Who were apparent.

Daltrey's microphone swinging and Townshend's crazy circular guitar strumming seemed to compensate for any lack of youthful liveliness.

The Who encored with two numbers from "Tommy," starting with "Pinball Wizard" and then slowing down to the inspiring "See Me, Feel Me." Rather than end the show on a loud note, The Who played the intimate tune "Tea and Theatre" acoustic-style, ending the show in a completely different way from its opening.

Although The Who doesn't have quite the stamina they did in their earlier years, their eccentric style and tone made many sufficiently satisfied. The filled arena in Boston was singing along to favorite tunes and cheering during parts of the show where applause was due.

And after all, in our present pop-cultured, emo-inspired music scene, we are lucky to have these guys still kicking.

Scissor Sisters cut in

BY JEB FARBER
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

More than an ocean divides the U.S. and the U.K.

A sensibility gap looms between the two as well, wider and deeper in some places than the water.

You'll find proof in the recent career of the Scissor Sisters. In England, they're scream-worthy pop stars, embraced by everyone from grandmothers to schoolgirls to music's savvy set.

Here, in their own country, they're favored mainly by various cults — gay listeners, dance music fans and arty types.

In 2004, the group's self-titled debut became the best selling album of the year in the U.K., moving in the millions. On these shores, it moved just 282,929 copies, according to SoundScan.

Band co-leader Scott Hoffman (aka Babydaddy) isn't short on theories as to why. "American pop culture is really boring right now," he says. "And we're a Puritan country that's afraid to offend anybody. Also, the Scissor Sisters write real songs with melodies and in America right now the [rhythm] track has become the new pop. We don't make sound bites for people with short attention spans."

Instead they make something that sounds like the '70s Bee Gees being waylaid by classic Elton John. With front-man Jake Shears' campy falsetto quipping over Hoffman's bouncy piano riffs, Sisters songs have an unusually animated flair. But it often masks more complicated messages below. Shears' lyrics contrast the music's froth with darker characters and gnarlier emotions.

Never is this clearer than on "I Don't Feel Like Dancin'," the first single from the Sisters' new album, whimsically titled "Ta-Dah," out Sept. 26. It may be the first club anthem ever written about shunning the disco in favor of a brooding night at home.

That's typical of the group's intriguing bait-and-switch approach. "We'll have a song about a transvestite selling her body while on acid, then put it to a melody that little girls can sing," Hoffman says.

The result takes full advantage of pop culture's capacity for creative subversion. "Subversion is different from shock value or simple sex or violence," Hoffman explains. "It has more layers."

The group began exploring them the moment they chose their name, which stands for a lesbian sex act.

Crank is fun, poorly stylized

BY JAKE MONTE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Crank is a very stylized film. This means expect split and quadruple screens, thirty cuts or more a minute, extreme close-ups, strange transitions, odd camera angles, and subtitles over perfect English. It could be called an MTV film — a label that might cause some to dismiss it. However, it is important to note that Oliver Stone can make a film with all these stylized traits look artistic. It's not the stylized filmmaking that's the problem with Crank. It's the way the directors attempt to pull the stylized filmmaking off.

'Crank'

Directed by Brian Taylor Mark Neveldine

Starring Jason Statham Amy Smart

Lakeshore Entertainment

Rated R

87 mins.

Grade B-

However, the film has a great premise. Chev Chelios, (Jason Statham, The Italian Job), wakes up one day to find that he's been given the Beijing Cocktail, as it's called. He's been poisoned. If his adrenaline drops to low, he dies. If he keeps it up, he stays alive. A great idea, one so ludicrous one immediately imagines Chelios engaged in a slew of audience-pleasing stunts to keep his adrenaline up.

The man who has poisoned Chelios is Ricky Verona, who announces his presence on a DVD Chelios watches upon waking up. "I just killed you," Verona says. Chelios sets out to get revenge before he dies, promising Verona his whole crew is history. Verona goes after Chelios' girlfriend, Eve (Amy Smart, Just Friends), and she shows up later in the film. In the meantime, Chelios is on the run from the cops for speeding, calling his doctor, searching for epinephrine to keep his heart rate up, and going after Ricky Verona's brother. The film cuts frantically, and directors Mark Neveldine and Brian Taylor take stylization to new heights.

At the least, it's an original idea for a film, which immediately puts it above even some of the more well-made films that come out these days. Oliver Stone tried to raise U-Turn to a new level — to take a B script and raise it to an A movie. A technique that could aptly be titled: misdirection. It seems the directors might be trying to do the same thing here. But not only is it their own screenplay, the screenplay isn't bad enough to need this much overcompensation. When Chelios calls his Doctor and asks the receptionist where he is, it's not necessary for the film to cut to a quadruple screen of the doctor being given a back massage by several naked girls. Nor is it necessary to have subtitles when the actors are speaking perfect English. The stylization feels silly here, not artistic — it's choppy; inept. It could be that the directors wanted the film itself to be on a constant adrenaline high as Chelios is. A fine idea, but they didn't pull it off properly.

This isn't to say don't see the film. The great thing about Crank is the hopes that the premise elicits — the ones where we imagine Chelios snorting cocaine to keep his adrenaline up, and acting as ridiculously as we might under such circumstances — those hopes are cashed in upon. The film keeps surprising us with its absurdity. It's funny when Chelios drives around on a motorcycle in hospital scrubs with his buns hanging out; when he has sex with Eve in front of 50 people to keep his adrenaline up.

You will have to deal with some poor lines of dialogue. At one point, Chelios throws a severed hand to someone and says, "Want to hold hands?" Moreover, there are a lot of jokes that fall flat. But this film has a lot that's new, and that in itself is refreshing. That in itself stands out and raises a film with poor direction up a few notches. Seeing this film is a risk, but it will most likely be enjoyable.

Jason Statham needs to keep his adrenaline pumping, any way possible, in his new blockbuster, "Crank."

Rachael Ray embraces her image

BY RICHARD HUFF
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

NEW YORK — Rachael Ray wants to be one of the regular people.

She can't, though, because to legions of fans, she's a daytime goddess of food, fun and domestic facts, albeit one who says things are "delish" and talks a lot about extra-virgin olive oil.

"Rachael Ray is terrific," says Sheila Clark, while waiting for a recent taping of Ray's new daytime show to start. "She's so natural. Besides, I like her effervescence and her spunk."

So much so, Clark told her colleagues at work she was at a meeting when she was really one of 120 people jammed into a studio on East 44th Street to see the "Rachael Ray" show.

And Clark is among people who think like just her and feed off Ray's enthusiasm. This day the crowd in Ray's multicolored set is overwhelmingly female, slightly older. They dance when prompted by comic RC Smith, they cheer wildly when Ray walks on stage, and they nod in approval when she drops a trademark phrase like "E-V-O-O."

They're the lucky ones. More than 25,000 people have requested tickets, and most of them will end up never getting into the studio.

"We're having a ball," Ray says of the syndicated show, which has been in production since late August. "I'm most proud of how it's working, the live audience and the home participation."

The show is an extension of Ray's already vast multimedia enterprise, which includes three programs on the Food Network, a magazine and 12 cookbooks.

The goal with Ray's daytime show — which began airing Monday — is to work in as many real people as possible. Producers have solicited ideas from viewers and will have them as guests, or appearing in segments asking questions. Artwork from young viewers is also displayed in galleries that change daily.

This day, Betsy Giamo from Huntington, Long Island, is in the studio seeking recipe ideas suitable for her son Matthew, 6, who has severe food allergies. (Later, Ray will whip up a pizza burger for the family.)

"We're making accessible television, that involves travel and everyday tips and what to have for dinner all in one show," Ray says. "When we have experts on, they're your next-

Spring fashion blooms

BY JACKIE WHITE
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

NEW YORK — Brush up on your geography if you want to be fashion savvy in the coming months. Designers are finding inspiration around the globe for spring.

As Fashion Week wound down on a soggy, rain-soaked Friday, Donna Karan's loose-wrapped dresses and coats, earthy colors and even the scent in the air invoked the Middle East.

Ralph Lauren, showing in a downtown warehouse, paid subtle homage to Africa and India with jaunty black-and-white striped overshirts, crisp white linen raja jackets and a stream of beautiful platinum gowns. After his show, Lauren, dressed in faded denim, said he was influenced by "everything going on in the world."

Earlier in the week celebrity favorite Zac Posen credited the diverse cultures of Japan and old-style Hollywood for his eclectic show. Anna Sui invoked a Marie Antoinette theme for lively, girlish print dresses set off with whimsical French revolutionary hats, leggings and high boots. The Badgley Mischka team, familiar to red carpet watchers, said it found a muted color palette on a trip to American Amish country.

Fashion Week involved eight days of shows centered in a sprawling tent in midtown Manhattan and scattered around the city. About 3,000 people from all parts of the globe were registered to attend.

It ended Friday night with the high end Chado Ralph Rucci. Rucci is the quintessential luxury designer with python wraps, a porcupine quill jacket and alligator skirts.

Overall, the week's fashion was romantic, girlish and light in spirit. It was meant to appear effortless and unpretentious.

Fabrics were light, often sheer and appeared airborne. At Donna Karan, the fabric for a blue and black striped wrap sleeveless dress was created by Kansas City textile artist Joscelyn Himes.

While you may not be seeing these clothes in the magazines and stores for several months, you can start now to make smart decisions about what to keep, what to buy and how to plan your wardrobe. If you're cleaning out your closet or making a holiday shopping list, here is what you can do:

For starters, add soft colors to your brown, black or black-and-white for winter. Try a touch of poppy red, a deep blue or a gray. The mood is more optimistic for the warm-weather season.

The focus on ease has brought wrapped sweaters and dresses, cowl necklines in front and back and sheer floating layers. Pack away tight T-shirts and short cropped jackets that hug your body.

Volume has been a key word this fall as silhouettes started to move away from the body. Make way for trapeze, tent and shift dresses that give the body plenty of space. Karan's dresses, sometimes caught with a narrow or double wrapped belt, reflected ease and comfort. Yeohlee, who offered the most architectural shapes, had lovely white shifts and a dress with full back. The skimmer dress associated with the '60s and '70s is a favorite.

Peter Som showed trapeze jackets that flared briefly from a high-waist seam with round bubble skirts.

We're not suggesting you have an extra helping of pie, but the silhouette

Their music also adopted an outsider's view. Shortly after transplanted New Yorkers Shears and Hoffman formed the group in 2001, they hit on the mad idea to recast Pink Floyd's hazy salute to apathy, "Comfortably Numb" as an ecstatic neo-disco song. At first, the result didn't impress many outside the reaches of Tompkins Square Park. But eventually "Numb" nabbed the attention of U.K. DJs and that got the band signed to Polydor Records overseas. After much touring and hard work over there, the song wound up going top 20. The album went all the way to No. 1.

In the U.S. they couldn't even get the album into Wal-Mart. The chain banned it for lyrical content.

One potential issue for the band is that three of its five members are openly gay, including its two leaders. But Hoffman thinks the problem is "bigger than that. Some people will dismiss us before they listen, just because they see a picture and see that we dress up or act flamboyant and they say, 'That isn't me.'"

Obviously, this hasn't been a problem overseas. "The gay thing and the flamboyant thing have never been issues in England," Hoffman says. "They embraced Queen and David Bowie way before America did. Over there people find a song they like and it just goes from there. It's a song-loving country."

Now, however, the group worries about giving its audience songs they can love as much as those on their debut. Hoffman admits the band went through major fears of a sophomore slump when first recording the new CD. "We had two years of touring and promoting on the first album and now you've got to make a whole other album," he says. "We pictured our fans being disappointed. We pictured complete failure."

Things hardly turned out that way. "Ta-Dah" is a robust chaser to their debut, filled with catchy hooks and affecting beats. The group did have a bit of marquee help this time. Elton John, who has become one of the band's major fans, co-wrote two songs on "Ta-Dah," including the single. He also performed on both, extending the band's debt to a sound Elton first forged on songs like "Bennie and the Jets." The Sisters also expanded their range by bringing in more influences from the classic British music-hall sound, especially on a song called "Paul McCartney." Sir Paul, of course, has made great use of the style throughout his career.

"It's a love song to inspiration," Hoffman explains. "Jake has been so blasphemous as to say that he thinks the Wings catalog is better than the Beatles catalogue. I don't agree. But he's an extreme person."

The question is, will the Sisters' extreme sensibility continue to thwart a U.S. breakthrough? Hoffman wouldn't be surprised. "We're not mainstream people," he says. "So why should we be mainstream pop stars?"

is less confining. If you don't have these styles in your own closet, they are often abundant in vintage stores. Many designers showed skimmers that barely touched the body. They were often sleeveless and short. (Bubble hair not required, but hair was shorter or pulled back into tolls.)

One garment you'll want to wear now is the white blouse with a touch of fancy details. In light fabrics such as organdy, organza and silk, it was a stunner on the runways and in the audience. Some were blouson. Some were ruffled or drenched in lace. At Y & Kei's Water the Earth show, an ivory silk blouse was tucked into a full dirndl skirt with wide belt. Peter Som's white organdy blouse with angel sleeves looked as if it could fly. Rebecca Taylor's embroidered organza was shown with a beaded, tulip-shaped skirt.

White, ivory and ecru are high priorities. The cropped narrow white pant is a staple. Ellen Tracy's new designer George Sharp, exhibiting a lighter hand than traditional Tracy, used it repeatedly with, for instance, a navy knit tunic.

Navy is a given for spring, so save everything you have in that color. Anna Sui fielded an entire segment of navy with cream or red including a bandanna print.

Flats were all over the runways. Models at Carolina Herrera and Oscar de la Renta wore them. If and when you buy shoes this fall, keep in mind you don't have to tower over the world.

Prints boosting the drama of spring clothes and floral patterns are likely to go head-to-head with your garden. Rebecca Taylor sent out flowered tunics, a shift and a tea dress. But choose carefully. Some flowered dresses come dangerously close to ordinary house-dress territory.

Crystals and jewels are gone from daytime and most evening clothing. Monochromatic embroidery, lace, sheer light fabrics and airy crochet are replacements. Start crocheting now for spring.

Hemlines are up. If you are a passionate fashion devotee, start bringing up your shirt lengths a tad.

And finally, don't lose your sense of humor. Don't wear necklines too low, skirts too short or anything that looks ridiculous, but this season's crop of clothes is meant to be comfortable, easy and optimistic. Enjoy.

Featured above and below are spring's new fashions, which were highlighted during Fashion Week in midtown Manhattan.

Simpson DVD

By Michael Passman
Michigan Daily (U. Michigan)

ANN ARBOR, Mich.—Matt Groening sure has this DVD thing down. "The Simpsons" creator continues to pump out season after season of DVD sets and his obsessive Uter-action-figure-collecting fan base continues to eat them up.

So with the release of "The Simpsons: The Complete Eighth Season," Groening didn't change a thing. The 25-episode set is in the same format as the past few DVD releases, but with Itchy, Scratchy and the late Poochie involved, the fanboys have no reason to complain.

Along with Homer's foray into after-school comedy shorts, season eight is loaded with other memorable episodes and characters in what's probably the last great "Simpsons" season. Homer starts bootlegging alcohol in the face of death-by-catapult in "Homer vs. the Eighteenth Amendment." John Waters guest stars as Bart's flamboyant role model in "Homer's Phobia." And Albert Brooks voices Homer's 007 villain of a new boss, Hank Scorpio, in "You Only Move Twice."

As always, every episode has audio commentary from Groening and assorted writers, directors, cast and even the occasional guest star. The show's commentaries have become the gold standard for TV DVDs, and that doesn't change here. Loyal fans will appreciate the insight that makes these overlooked commentaries so worthwhile, although people with lives may not be so enthusiastic about the innards of a cartoon. A few illustrated commentaries, deleted scenes, promotional spots and a featurette on a real-life "Simpsons" house round out the extra features.

Maybe the features and layouts haven't really changed over the past few DVD sets but there's no reason to tamper with perfection. With the 17th season premiering just weeks ago, it's nice to be able to relive the days when the show had some heart. Homer wasn't completely retarded and Bart was more than a collection of snarky one-liners, but that's what it's come to.

The show has certainly changed over the years — thankfully, Poochie has not.

door neighbors."

At a recent taping, segments included a schoolteacher who reads bedtime stories to students, an item started by Ray outing her husband's extended grooming habits, and the audience offering their own loved ones' goofy antics (one audience member grosses Ray out by describing how her husband hikes up his shorts to show his butt cheeks in an imitation of a sumo wrestler), and a cooking segment.

The set is designed to make Ray accessible, too. There are four distinct areas — a kitchen, a patio, a couch area and a garage area. The audience sits on a large "lazy Susan" that turns as she moves around the set.

"This is exactly what we wanted it to be," she says. "A friendly place to hang out for an hour where people learn a lot about themselves."

During breaks, when she's not surrounded by hairstylists, makeup artists and producers — she jokes that they're "fondlers" — Ray often chats with the crowd.

"This is riveting," she jokes between shooting promos for a station in Hawaii, followed by a joke about sex that gets a roar out of the crowd.

"Oh, what a potty mouth she has," Ray says, mimicking what the audience might say.

Not likely.

Audience members shift seats to be near the aisle when she walks through the crowd, all wanting to get close to this domestic dynamo.

"She has to be by the people," says executive producer Janet Annino. "That's who she is. You've got to let her be her. If I take that away, I've failed her."

Based on this crowd, Annino has held up her part of the deal.

Midway through the show, there's a snack break — staffers walk around doling out treats, and suddenly the audience is eating. And every show ends with Ray cooking, of course.

"This is great," Clark says as the show is winding down. "It's a lot of fun. You need a lot of energy to be in one of these shows."

And that, Ray has by the bushelful.

shot, she'll hit that nine out of 10 times. That was huge for her confidence and ours. She had an awesome game."

The lead given to the Maroon and White by Roehrig was in jeopardy at the end of the second half. Walker came up with a terrific diving save to her left with about eight minutes remaining.

"We dodged a bullet there at the end," Rudy said. "That was a big-time save [Walker] made. It was the best save I've seen her make in a long time."

"I actually don't even remember that particular save," Walker said. "I've been working a lot before practice with my coaches and that work has certainly helped and paid off."

The Huskies had numerous golden opportunities to score in the final six or seven minutes but a combination of good defense and clutch goalkeeping saved the day for the Minutewomen. Roehrig was quick to compliment Walker's performance late in the game.

"Walker did an amazing job in goal today as she always does," she said. "Kristin dominated on the air, dominated on the ground, and led our team with her play."

Connecticut's goal to tie the game at one came in the 32nd minute on a header from Schnur following a corner kick Alexendra Zedros was credited with the assist.

Rudy praised the mental toughness of his team following the victory.

"This team is resilient," he said. "Four years ago, the team would have died after allowing the goal to tie the game. This team, however, knows what winning's like and they picked their heads up and got the winning goal."

UMass got things started in the 15th minute when junior forward Britt Canfield received a perfect pass from junior defender Christina Nunes. The goal developed quickly following a throw-in from junior midfielder Kaelyn Caldwell.

Nunes received it at midfield and fired a pass over the defense hitting a streaking Canfield who put it past UConn goalie Stephanie Labbe. It was the second straight game that Nunes set up a Canfield goal.

"Slightly familiar, isn't it?" Rudy quipped. "What a great goal. For Britt to take it on the run over the shoulder, chest down, to beat a great goal keeper was remarkable."

"It was almost the exact same goal as last week," added Roehrig. "Christina gave Britt a great pass again and with Britt's speed she knows how to plant it in the back of the net. They did their job and got it done to give us the 1-0 lead. They [UConn] came back and we retaliated."

"That was one of the best goals I've seen," Walker said. "It was a perfect pass, the goalie had no chance.

Senior defender Stephanie Barrett had two assists in the Minutewomen's win over Iona on Sept. 3. She has started all six games.

Britt did such a great job getting the ball down and scoring."

UMass will take its six-game win streak on the road to Vermont on Friday afternoon in a matchup against the 1-4-1 Catamounts.

Upset victory spells sweet redemption

kid. You miss some, you get some."

A short 70 seconds later, however, opportunity came knocking at Roehrig's door once again, and this time she answered.

With just under 28 1/2 minutes left in regulation, she received a pass from sophomore defender Melissa Toulouse about 20 yards from the goal and deposited it into the net, beating a sprawled-out UConn goalkeeper in the bottom left-hand side.

For Roehrig, she couldn't have picked a better time to score her first goal of the season. "It felt really good, especially against UConn," Roehrig commented. "My team is right behind me. Without them I wouldn't have gotten it."

As a result of her game-winner, Roehrig has now accumulated three total points on the season (she recorded an assist in a home game versus Boston University on Aug. 30).

Since becoming a member of the Maroon and White, Roehrig has consistently contributed to UMass victories.

In 2004, her freshman year, she scored five goals and registered three assists for a sum of 13 points.

In 2005, she added three goals and two more assists for an additional eight points.

Thus far this year she has one goal and an assist, bringing her current point total to 24.

As Roehrig was ambushed with hugs from her elated teammates, her coach stood at the bench, trying to hold back his shouts of joy.

Rudy mentioned that his team had been working on free kicks for a month and a half and that he was disappointed to watch the shot fly over the bar. He added, however, that seeing Roehrig redeem herself made him feel a lot better.

"All is forgiven, Rudy joked.

All kidding aside, Rudy said he was overwhelmed at the thought of his team finally defeating one of its archrivals.

UMass had been scoreless against Connecticut for more than half a decade. 1999 marked the last the Minutewomen scored a goal against the Huskies.

They ultimately lost a nail-biter by a score of 4–3 in double-overtime.

That scoreless drought finally ended on this rainy day, and Rudy couldn't be happier about it. "Healing. Oh, am I singing that," Rudy said. "It's been a while. But it's nice the realization. I'm sort of like, 'Whoa. Where are we now?'"

He added that it is bittersweet to defeat UConn coach Tonya Bozzuto, whom he considers a personal friend, but that's how it is with sports.

"It's a win. And that is the most important thing."

Dodgers hit four consecutive homers and walk-off against SD

(AP) — When things looked bleak for the Los Angeles Dodgers, they found their power stroke.

The Dodgers hit four consecutive homers in the bottom of the ninth inning to tie the game, and Nomar Garciaparra's two-run drive in the 10th lifted Los Angeles to an 11-10 victory over the San Diego Padres on Monday night.

On a night when the New York Mets clinched the NL East title, the Dodgers moved back into first place in the NL West, a half-game ahead of the Padres. "That was the greatest game I've ever seen. I've never seen anything like that," Dodgers reliever Brett Tomko said.

After Los Angeles tied it in the ninth with four straight homers — just the fourth time that's happened in major league history — the Padres went ahead on Brian Giles' double and Josh Hard's two-out single off Aaron Sele (8-6).

But Rudy Seanez (1-2) walked Kenny Lofton to begin the bottom half, and Garciaparra followed by hitting his 18th homer deep into the left-field pavilion.

In other NL games, it was: New York 4, Florida 0; Chicago 11, Philadelphia 6; Milwaukee 4, St. Louis 3; Houston 5, Cincinnati 3; Colorado 20, San Francisco 8; and Atlanta 6, Washington 1.

At Los Angeles, Jeff Kent and J.D. Drew opened the ninth with homers off San Diego's Jon Adkins. Russell Martin and Marlon Anderson then connected on the first two pitches thrown by Trevor Hoffman, who entered with 475 career saves — three shy of Lee Smith's major league record.

The last time a team hit four consecutive homers was on May 2, 1964, when the Minnesota Twins accomplished the feat against Kansas City in the 11th inning.

"It was a great baseball game two good teams going at it. They got the last big hit," Giles said.

Anderson had a career-high five hits, and Kent had four for Los Angeles.

"I can't explain it. It's absolutely the most wonderful night of my career, for sure," Anderson said. "And to be able to do it on this stage — in a pennant race — it was awesome. The guys pulled together and stuck together. That was absolutely the most wonderful game I've ever seen in my life at any level."

METS 4, MARLINS 0

The Mets ended nearly two decades of disappointment in their division and days of delay, clinching the NL East for the first time since 1988.

Jose Valentin homered twice and Steve Trachsel (15-7) combined with three relievers on a four-hitter.

Fireworks shot off from behind the center-field wall at Shea Stadium when Cliff Floyd caught Josh Willingham's fly ball to left for the final out. The Mets rushed to the center of the diamond to celebrate.

Brian Moehler (7-9) got the loss.

CUBS 11, PHILLIES 6

Aramis Ramirez homered twice and drove in a career-best seven runs for the visiting Cubs.

Pinch-hitter Jose Hernandez hit a grand slam in the fourth inning to bring Philadelphia within two runs after trailing 8-0, but five Cubs relievers held the Phillies scoreless over the last five innings.

Ramirez went 4-for-5 and Juan Pierre and Scott Moore hit solo homers for Chicago.

The Phillies are 1 1/2 games behind the wild card-leading Padres.

Michael Wuertz (3-1) tossed two perfect innings to get the win.

Ramirez hit three-run homers in the first inning off Jon Lieber (8-10) and in the fourth off Luke Hohn.

BREWERS 4, CARDINALS 3

Tony Graffanino singled in the winning run in the ninth inning for the Brewers.

Albert Pujols hit a three-run drive for his 46th homer for the visiting Cardinals, whose magic number in the NL Central was lowered to seven when Cincinnati lost 5-3 to the Houston Astros.

Damian Miller singled off Braden Looper (9-2) to start the ninth for Milwaukee. Dess Anderson pinch ran for him and advanced on Jeff Cirillo's sacrifice Graffanino singled to left and Anderson beat the throw home.

Francisco Cordero (2-0) pitched one perfect inning to get the win.

ASTROS 5, REDS 3

Roy Oswalt pitched 6 2-3 innings to continue his mastery of Cincinnati.

Oswalt (14-8) allowed two runs and eight hits to improve his career record to 17-1 against Cincinnati. He struck out eight and didn't walk a batter before departing with muscle spasms in his neck.

Oswalt is 5-0 with a no-decision in his last six starts. He said after the game that the neck problems were "no big deal."

Ray Olmedo and Todd Hollandsworth had pinch-hit homers for visiting Cincinnati.

Dan Wheeler pitched the ninth for his sixth save in eight chances.

Reds starter Kyle Lohse (2-4) gave up four runs and six hits in six innings.

ROCKIES 20, GIANTS 8

Jeff Baker hit two three-run homers, Garrett Atkins also drove in six runs and Justin Hampson won in his first major league start.

The Rockies, who had a season-high 19 hits, tied the club record for runs, reaching 20 for the third time, the last on Sept. 20, 2005, against San Diego.

Hampson (1-0) allowed six runs and 10 hits in five innings.

The Giants fell 4 1/2 games behind Los Angeles in the NL West and four games behind San Diego in the wild-card race.

Baker's first homer highlighted a six-run first inning against Giants starter Noah Lowry (7-10).

BRAVES 6, NATIONALS 1

At Washington, Andruw Jones hit a tiebreaking, two-run homer in the sixth inning and Kyle Davies won for the first time since April 30.

Atlanta won for the fourth time in [illegible]. Darvle Ross also had a pinch-hit three-run homer in the eighth inning in his first appearance against the Nationals since they traded him to the Braves on Aug. 31.

Associated Press

After four consecutive solo home runs tied last night's game with the Padres at 9, Exiled Son Nomar Garciaparra after San Diego took a one-run lead in the top of the 10th, ended the game with a two-run walk-off blast.

URI wins UMass Invitational

By Steve Gams
Collegian Correspondent

The Rhode Island Rams men's soccer team won the UMass Invitational Tournament last week, led by the Atlantic 10 Player of the Week, senior forward Jeffery Gonsalves, who scored three goals and notched an assist.

Gonsalves nearly knocked the Massachusetts men's soccer team out of playoff contention last season when the Minutemen already had lost to URI once in 2005 (URI scored four goals in the last two minutes to go on to defeat the Minutemen 5-4 in overtime).

The Rams (2-2-1) defeated Vermont in the first round of the UMass Invitational, 3-2, with two goals from Gonsalves. The next day, they beat Hartford, 1-0, in double overtime to win the tournament. Four Rams, in total, were named to the All-Tournament Team: Gonsalves, senior forward Lukasz Tomicz, redshirt junior defender Kevin Meyer, sophomore defender Adam Hancock. The Rams will play next at 7 p.m. Wednesday at Boston University (4-1-3).

A-10 Notebook

Fordham remains unbeaten

The No.14 Fordham Rams are the only A-10 team to stay unbeaten with a five wins and one tie. The Rams defeated Notre Colllege on Saturday. Junior forward Dean Stanic scored the lone goal in double overtime for the 1-0 win. Junior goalkeeper Doug Devereaux recorded four saves for his second shutout of the year. The Rams are led by the scoring duo of junior midfielder Kevin Meyer and senior forward Omero Rivera, each scoring eight points (three goals, two assists) for the year. Fordham will host long College tomorrow night.

UMass drops its first game

Entering the week ranked No. 22, the Massachusetts men's soccer team dropped its first game of the season. Vermont took down the undefeated Minutemen at home, 1-0. The Minutemen won the first game of the Invitational, 1-0, over Hartford. The Minutemen have struggled to score this season. Despite the great defense and goaltending with five shutouts the Minutemen have yet to score three goals in a game. UMass has four 1-0 victories and a 1-1 tie. They are ranked No. 1 in goals allowed — .25 goals per game — but ranked 9th in goals scored with 1.12 per game. Freshman forward Bryan Hogan leads the team in goals with three and goalkeeper Zack Simmons has 31 saves and an impressive six shutouts. The Minutemen will travel to Durham, N.H., tomorrow afternoon to face off against the University of New Hampshire.

Rookie goaltender helps St. Louis beat No. 9 Indiana

The Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week is freshman goal keeper Ross Kaufman. Kaufman had two saves to shutout No. 9 Indiana, 1-0. Senior forward Alex Matteson scored the winning goal in the 35th minute. This was the first win over Indiana in their last four meetings. The 3-2-1 Billikens will host No. 1 Southern Methodist University on Friday.

Dayton almost upsets No. 1 SMU

Dayton held No. 1 SMU without a shot on goal for the entire first half. Dayton posted the most shots of any SMU opponent this year, but fell, 1-0, Sunday in a tournament at the University of New Mexico. SMU's first shot on goal went past junior backup goalkeeper Zack Gibbens. The starting goalkeeper, senior Nick Tarkany, was injured during Friday's game against Tulsa. Dayton will play home against Wright State.

Hawks and Owls on the prowl

By Keith Doody

UMass' 10-field hockey conference past games closer, and the Saint Joseph's Hawks and the Temple Owls are looking to make an early statement in the defending A-10 champion Richmond Spiders.

The Hawks are 3-1 this year and are coming off a win over Penn State. The Owls have come six games.

The Hawks are led by junior forward Mandi Ruth, who leads the Owls in goals and one assist in her first year with the team.

For all the success the Hawks and Owls have had, until they defeat defending A-10 champions Richmond, the Spiders are still the team to beat in the A-10.

The Spiders aren't off to a strong start with a 3-3 record, but keep in mind they're the only team in the A-10 to have beaten a nationally-ranked opponent. Richmond ran their home unbeaten streak to eight games when it defeated No. 13 James Madison last Wednesday.

There's no place like home

Playing on the road is almost always a huge obstacle for any team in any sport to overcome. The A-10 field hockey conference will be the first to vouch for this golden rule of sports. A-10 teams are 3-21 on the road this year, and none of the top teams in the conference have been able to steal one on the road. Only the Rhode Island Rams and St. Louis Billikens have come out on top on the road this year.

Billikens' anemic offense

The Billikens have tried to do their best St. Joseph's impression when it comes to shutouts; unfortunately for St. Louis fans, they have been on the wrong end of the shutouts this year on their way to a 2-4 record. St. Louis has been shut out in three of its four losses and has found the back of the net only five times this year in six games, averaging less than a goal per game.

Say who?

Try to name as many A-10 field hockey teams off the top of your head. Chances are the West Chester Golden Rams aren't the first team that comes to mind. And they aren't doing anything this year to change that situation. The Golden Rams are bringing up the back of the A-10 with a 1-7 record to start the '06 campaign. It doesn't take too much head-scratching to find out why either. West Chester has allowed almost four goals a game, while averaging a meager 1.38 goals per contest. The Rams have mustered only 45 shots on goal this year in eight games.

Saint Louis picked to win A-10

By Michael King
Collegian Correspondent

The Saint Louis women's soccer team has been trying to justify its No. 26 national ranking this season. The Billikens took a step in that direction when they defeated No.18 Illinois on Sept. 14 at Robert R. Hermann Stadium in Saint Louis.

Saint Louis won the game in double overtime, by a score of 2-1. The Billikens battled from a 0-1 deficit at the end of the first half.

Freshman forward Julia Bradenberg tallied both Saint Louis goals in the game, continuing her impressive stretch of play during the past two weeks.

She scored her first goal in the 51st minute, blasting her shot past the Illini goalkeeper from the right side. Senior midfielder Maureen Hughes inadvertently set up Bradenburg after her shot from the middle of the field deflected off an Illinois defender.

In the second overtime, the Bradenburg headed home another goal, this time a pass from junior forward Cassi Winchell.

Bradenburg, a native of Saint Louis, ranks third in the conference with four goals. Adding to her growing collection of accolades, the freshman phenom was named A-10 Rookie of the Week for the second week in a row.

Saint Louis won their next game against Southeastern Missouri State (SEMO) on Sept. 18. Senior midfielder Maureen Hughes had another strong performance. She scored both Billiken goals in the team's 2-1 victory.

The victory over SEMO marked the end of an undefeated four-game home stand. Saint Louis is currently enjoying a six-game unbeaten streak, going 4-0-2 over the period.

National Rankings

Notre Dame (8-0) maintained its hold on the top spot of the Soccer Buzz Magazine National Top 30 Rankings. The Irish are one of only a handful of teams in the country without a loss. One of the other undefeated teams, Florida State (6-0) is right behind Notre Dame in the rankings.

Still the lone Atlantic 10 representative, Saint Louis moved up two spots to No. 26, a new record for the program.

Regionally, Boston College (5-2) fell out of the Top 30, after going 1-1 last week. UConn (4-3-1) is the top team from the Northeast right now. The Huskies are ranked No. 11 in the nation Boston University (5-2-1) squeaked into the rankings at No. 30.

Player of the Week

Senior midfielder Kerry O'Malley of St. Bonaventure and sophomore forward Katie Sanchez of Fordham were named A-10 Co-Players of the Week.

O'Malley, a local product from Longmeadow, MA, helped the Bonnies win their first game of the season, scoring both goals of a 2-1 victory over Canisius on Sept. 13. Two days later, she scored her third goal of the season against Kent State in a 4-3 double-overtime loss.

Sanchez posted comparable performances for the Rams last week. She netted the game winner against Stony Brook in a double-overtime 3-2 thriller. She leads the team with four goals and eight points on the season.

Stat Attack

UMass has been the most efficient team on both sides of the ball this season in the A-10. The Minutewomen are first in goals per game, tallying 12 through their first six matches. They also lead the goals-allowed per game category, allowing only six goals in as many games ... George Washington has shutout opponents 50 percent of the time ... UMass sophomore forward Vanessa Patry leads the league in goals per game, scoring five times in six games. She is also first in points per game with 2.17 ... UMass remains atop the A-10 standings with five wins and one loss. Saint Louis is closing in on the Maroon and White with a record of 6-1-2 ... The Minutewomen draw about 132 fans per game, about four times less than A-10 leaders Charlotte and Saint Louis ... Conference play begins this Friday, Sept. 22, when Xavier travels to Dayton.

The Saint Louis women's soccer team has received its highest national ranking in the program's history, reaching as high as No. 26 this season.

Violence shocks Duquesne

By Alan Robinson
Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — Stephen Wood left his New York City neighborhood last month to play college basketball at Duquesne University partly because the campus is considered so safe.

"That was the whole point, getting away from New York," the freshman guard said Monday, a day after five of his basketball teammates were shot. "You're trying to get away from it, and then to have it happen ..."

What happened was perhaps the worst crime-related tragedy sustained by an NCAA major college sports program, the shooting of nearly half of a basketball team's primary roster in a few mere seconds of violence.

Three players remained hospitalized Monday night — including junior forward Sam Ashaolu, 23, a recent junior college transfer who, like Wood, had been on campus only a few weeks.

Ashaolu was in critical condition at Mercy Hospital, fighting for his life with bullet fragments in his head. Family members and several friends who drove in from Canada kept a constant vigil at his bedside.

Also hospitalized was Stuard Baldonado, a 6-foot-7 forward and another junior college transfer, who was upgraded to fair condition with left arm and back injuries. He began walking Monday night and is expected to be released from Mercy later in the week.

Baldonado, 21, was told by surgeons that a bullet missed his spinal column and almost certain paralysis by one-quarter of an inch before lodging in a lower back muscle.

The bullet is expected to be removed Tuesday.

"I'm lucky," Baldonado told the Associated Press in his first interview since the shooting. "I feel much better today."

Junior guard Kojo Mensah, shot in an arm and shoulder, was kept an extra night in UPMC Presbyterian to receive additional injections of antibiotics. Mensah, 21, transferred from Siena to Duquesne three weeks ago.

Wood, 18, and guard Aaron Jackson, 20, related to The Associated Press how the shootings began moments after they left an on-campus party staged Saturday night by the Black Student Union.

"It seemed like the bullets never stopped coming," Jackson said. "They kept coming, constantly," Wood said.

The basketball team had attended en masse a football game earlier in the day, then went to the dance. Because students from other schools also attended, a Duquesne identification card was not needed to gain admittance.

Several players agreed the shootings occurred after a mate, who was not a student, became angry when a woman he accompanied to the dance began talking with the players.

"We didn't have any conflict at all," Wood said. "We were just having a good time. There was jealousy because girls were showing us attention."

Evidence collected by police suggested there were two shooters, not one. Duquesne officials were told by police that .38 caliber shell casings were recovered outside an on-campus garage near the crime scene.

Duquesne coach Ron Everhart, who slept only about six hours from Saturday night through late Monday night, called what happened "absolute mayhem." But he was encouraged after NCAA president Myles Brand phoned to offer full support to his staggered program.

Baldonado is considered the most promising of the 10 recruits brought in by Everhart during a massive rebuilding of a team that went 3-24 last year. Baldonado likely won't play this season, as a back injury like his commonly needs two to three months of rehabilitation.

Baldonado also was shot in the left arm, and doctors transplanted a vein from his groin to that arm during reconstructive surgery.

Junior center Shawn James, the nation's leading shot blocker last season while playing for Everhart at Northeastern, was out of the hospital, but may need additional treatment to have a bullet removed from his left foot.

According to the players, Mensah, Ashaolu and Baldonado were the first to be hit; James escaped by running across the nearby football field.

Huskies hammered in upset win

Game-winner seals victory nationally-ranked UConn

By Eli Rosenswake
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team (6-1-0) fought off No. 15 Connecticut, 2-1, on Tuesday afternoon at Rudd Field. The victory extends the Minutewomen's winning streak to six games.

Connecticut (4-4-1) had previously defeated UMass in 11 consecutive meetings dating back to 1994. The last win for the Maroon and White was in 1993 by the same score of 2-1. UConn hadn't allowed a goal against the Minutewomen since 1989, a span of three contests in which they outscored them 10-0.

"Beating UConn is important," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "We owed them for a while. It's the oldest rivalry in Division I women's soccer and we beat a really good team. This was a great win."

The game-winning kick, coming in the 63rd minute, came off the foot of junior midfielder Jenny Roehrig. Just two minutes earlier Roehrig had a good opportunity to put UMass ahead with a free kick. However, her shot went well over the net. She put that missed opportunity behind her quickly.

"I should have put the free kick on goal," Roehrig said. "But I bounced back. You can't let something like that get to your head. I was disappointed but I just blocked it out of my mind."

Just minutes after the free kick, Roehrig had something else on her mind: the lead, and her first goal of the season.

"I felt relieved," she said. "It was great to get my first goal of the year against a team as good as UConn. My team was right behind me and if it weren't for them I wouldn't have got it."

Roehrig wasn't the only one relieved that she scored for the free kick.

"It's all forgiven," Rudy said with a laugh. "I turned to the bench and joked that I had just forgiven her for all transgressions. It was a remarkable goal and she just had a great all-around game. She did a great job on UConn's best player, Meghan Schnur, really minimizing her opportunities."

"That shot was huge," redshirt junior goalie Kristin Walker said. "That's her

Roehrig redeemed after triumphant win

Redemption is sweet.

UMass junior midfielder Jenny Roehrig certainly knows this now.

After sailing a free kick that could have given her team the lead over UConn's crossbar early in the second half of yesterday's game, the frustration was evident on the New York native's face. However, she had to wait only a minute before finally putting one into the back of the net, giving her squad the 2-1 lead (and eventual win).

In the 62nd minute of a game tied at 1-all, both the Minutewomen and the Huskies were itching to seal a rain-soaked victory when UMass sophomore forward Vanessa Patry was knocked hard to the turf just outside the Connecticut penalty area. Whistles blew and the referees called a foul on UConn, setting up a Massachusetts free kick.

However, UMass coach Jim Rudy opted to have Roehrig to take the shot instead of Patry.

The 5-foot-3 sport management major lined up behind the ball and examined her shot. She knew she would have to loft the ball over a wall of UConn defenders that had assembled themselves the regulated 10 yards away. She then took aim and let it fly.

However, her ball soared high over the crossbar.

Roehrig put her hands over her face, frustrated that she had missed her shot.

"I was disappointed, but you just got to bounce back. You can't let it get to you," Roehrig recalled. "I mean, a kick is a

There was no "state of the team address" after the Massachusetts men's soccer team lost its first game of the season to Vermont. There was no need for one.

While there was some disappointment in the eyes of the Minutemen on Sunday, they're moving on, simply put.

"[The players are] disappointed that they didn't get the result on Sunday," Koch said. "But I think they're happy to be able to get back on the field and turn it around. I think they're ready mentally, but we'll find out soon enough."

They'll find out this afternoon when UMass (6-1-1) plays New Hampshire (4-2-2) at 3:30 p.m. in the final game of its five-game homestand.

The Minutemen are coming off of a 1-0 loss on Sunday to the Catamounts. Vermont freshman J.J. Gore scored the lone goal in the game with 2:03 remaining in the second half. Gore's heroics marked the first goal given up by sophomore Zack Simmons in 566 minutes and 55 seconds.

UMass' five-game winning streak ended with some miscommunication in the backfield, something that UMass coach Sam Koch has been pushing his players to patch up.

But like Simmons said after the loss, "One goal is not the end of the world."

"It happens," Koch said about Sunday's loss. "You can't worry about it. We have to get ready for Wednesday against New Hampshire. So we have to fire right back up and get ready to go."

The Wildcats come to Amherst with the second-best record in the America East Conference. Thanks to the performances of freshman forward Chris Banks and senior goalkeeper Brian Levey, New Hampshire trails only Boston University in its conference.

Banks has only started in one game this season, but continues to be the most productive player in the Wildcats' offense. He leads the America East Conference in points with 10 on the year. His five goals have already earned him conference accolades.

Banks was named America East Rookie of the Week on Sept. 5 after scoring three goals in New Hampshire's 3-2 win over Cal Poly earlier this season.

Levey was one of the top goalkeepers in the nation in 2005. He led the conference in shutouts (10) and goals-against average (0.57) last year. Those numbers earned him the America East Goalie of the Year award.

Levey has a 4-2-2 record on five goals against, and a .58 goals-against average. His four shutouts this season are a conference high.

UMass has not had a problem with its defense either. Opposing teams have scored only two goals against the Minutemen this season. Defense is not the issue. It's the offense that hasn't been the most productive.

"We need to score more goals," Koch said. "We need to keep the ball away from them [the Wildcats], as far as crosses in the box. But we also need to attack their flanks with speed. We have to go after them quickly because they are very good at dropping back and taking up space. So we have to get behind them early."

The Minutemen have a young core up front, but there needs to be more production.

"I'll be happy if anybody steps up," Koch said on his team needing more offensive production. "I'll be happy with anybody who can put the ball in the back of the net. All those guys can come through for us," Koch said. "But will they? Only time will tell."

Atlantic 10 play is only two games away. And time waits for nobody.

Junior Greg Cirillo has started all six games for the Minutemen, recording four assists, including two in one game against Boston University.

UM concludes road trip with Dartmouth

By J.M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team (2-5) will close out its season-opening eight-game road trip today against Dartmouth (0-4) at 6 p.m.

Looking to rebound from a 0-2 weekend at Northeastern and Boston University, the Minutewomen will travel to Scully-Lahey field in Hanover, N.H., with hopes of getting back on the winning track.

After the matchup with UNH, UMass returns home for 10 of its final 12 games.

The Dartmouth Big Green is struggling this season, having dropped its first four games. On the season, Dartmouth has been outscored, 13-3, and out-cornered, 41-17.

Last season, the Big Green won a 2-1 double-overtime victory at Garber Field. UMass owns a 19-7-1 all-time record against Wednesday's opponent.

This past Saturday, Dartmouth lost an overtime contest to Princeton by the score of 2-1. After taking an early lead, the Big Green could not hold on, giving up the equalizer with just over four minutes to play. Princeton out shot Dartmouth, 22-5, and held an 18-2 advantage in corners.

Junior forward Lizzie Bildner has scored all three goals Dartmouth has tallied this season.

While the statistics are not flattering for Dartmouth thus far this season, the Minutewomen and UMass coach Patty Shea will not take any game lightly, especially in a season when the Maroon and White have fallen behind every one of its opponents.

"We have to start the game off better," Shea said. "We can't get behind early in the game. Every [goal] that we give up means that we've got to get two.

"[Dartmouth] plays a really, up-tempo game," Shea added. "They like to chase the ball and put a lot of pressure on the ball. They are very dangerous when you give up corners to them, that's their bread and butter."

Stopping defensive breakdowns early in the game are critical to success for the Minutewomen.

"We have to be ready to defend as a unit much better in the beginning of games," Shea said. "It's been breakdowns within our press from the front all the way down to the back that has made us struggle."

One area of strength for the Minutewomen this season has been the play of the offensive unit, producing an average of 12.57 shots per game, good for second place in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

"When we play together as a unit, tactically we're very strong in regard to our passing," Shea said. "This year one of our strengths is we can now build [momentum] down into the attacking end and we're getting some results."

When Dartmouth and UMass meet, two teams that have struggled in the first half of games will look to get the jump on each other.

"We have to be organized right from the onset," Shea said. "We can't play ourselves into that organization. If we can get our defense settled down, that's where we gain most of our attack from."

For the Minutewomen to leave New Hampshire with a victory, they will need to play two halves of solid field hockey.

After a rocky seven-game stretch, the Minutewomen will conclude their grueling eight-game road trip with a matchup against Dartmouth today.

Football coaches: the universal truths

Rob Greenfield

Some of you may be wondering where your beloved football team has been over the last two weeks.

In the last 14 days, two UMass football games were played, neither of them closer than Pennsylvania — a four-and-a-half hour drive from the Pioneer Valley campus, much too far for the average student with a tight budget.

The Minutemen are 2-1, fresh off of a slow start-strong finish win over Villanova on the road, where star sophomore quarterback Liam Coen lit up the mediocre Wildcats for 150 yards in the air and two touchdowns.

One of those strikes, a lob to the left sideline on an out route, landed in the hands of wide receiver Brandon London who returned for his first game back after a team suspension, the result of an undisclosed team rules violation.

UMass coach Don Brown will not reveal the nature of London's suspension or the reason for it, and has been extremely secretive with inquiries about London.

Brown, the defensive coordinator on UMass' 1998 national championship squad, wears his usual black UMass football shirt on game days, with a worn-out UMass hat that has faded into orange over the years.

Nothing changes from week to week. He is stoic and cordial, a professional on the sidelines and with the media.

And he knows how to handle public controversy: avoid it.

At the beginning of the fourth quarter against Villanova, the Minutemen had a slim 17-14 advantage. On the 7-yard line, UMass ran into a fourth-and-1 situation, went for it, and got it. Then Brown went for it again on another fourth-and-1 at the goal-line and scored a touchdown for a 10-point lead.

Fourth-down scenarios are a nightmare for coaches. Brown took two chances on Saturday and they paid off. In the middle of a question regarding the important decisions, Brown interrupted with this.

"It's tough situation because if we go for it and don't make it, you guys [the media] will ask us why we went for it."

A chilly comment. Perfect for gridiron coaches.

From the sidelines, their football minds see a different game. Not just because of their deep understanding of football, but because in their profession, secrecy and privacy are golden.

While everything unfolds on the field for the whole stadium to see, things are quite different over the headsets and behind the curtains.

There are many happenings that football coaches, Brown among them, would not like the common fan or media member to see. There are disciplinary actions, berating tirades, and scathing remarks about opposing coaches that rest on the tip of their tongues, yet are swallowed and hidden with mechanical consistency.

What has happened (or not happened) with Brandon London in the last two weeks is an ideal example.

London was suspended from the team along with linebacker Brad Anderson for the Sept. 9 game against Navy, the only Division I-A opponent on the Minutemen's schedule. The only explanation to the media was that London and Anderson were not present because of an "undisclosed team rules violation."

The Minutemen lost, 21-20, and without London, an impact player on the offensive side, the UMass offense struggled in short-yardage situations, registering a scant 3-for-14 on third down.

Brown was asked if having London would have helped the offense in the narrow one-point loss, to which he responded, "I'm not going to talk about someone who is not here."

Sounds an awful lot like Belichick, doesn't it? The Pats front man would rather be flattened by a Mack truck than reveal the nature of a team suspension or the extent of an injury.

Brown is the same way. We — the nosy sportswriters — have asked all of the sources we can think of about the London situation, but nothing has come up. It's like the witness protection program, UMass football style.

But then again, wouldn't you be the same way? Aside from trying to do my job and find out what's actually going on, I have found sympathy for Brown's situation.

Put yourself in his shoes. If one of your players violated a team rule (i.e. mouthed off to an offensive coordinator when he shouldn't have), would you want thousands of quick-to-judge fans to know what really happened? To take that little shred of information about one of your players and make an assumption about their overall character?

The answer, of course, is no. The truth is that no one except Brown, London, and a select, privileged few will know what really happened, and how he got suspended from arguably the most important game in the regular season.

And that is the way it will remain, unless Brown has a sudden change of heart, which is highly unlikely.

Brown will go about the team's business. This weekend is Stony Brook, a cream-puff opponent that no doubt has Brown deciding how much he wants to win by.

As far as London goes, five receptions for 104 yards and a touchdown against Villanova will make many past faults disappear very quickly.

I found out a lot about Don Brown's coaching style in the last couple of weeks.

Make the opponent fight for every inch. And make us fight for it, too.

Panelists aim to make textbooks more affordable

Washington Rep. David Wu and a group of panelists spoke about the rising cost of college textbooks Sept. 19, 2006.

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

Earlier this year, a group of United States congressmen charged the U.S. Department of Education with the duty of investigating the rising cost of college textbooks. The study officially began yesterday in Washington, D.C., with opening testimony from Washington Rep. David Wu and a group of panelists who have expertise in economics, higher education and the textbook publishing industry.

Wu believes one way a college education can be more accessible for all students is to make textbooks more affordable.

"The cost of higher education is increasing and the buying power of financial aid is decreasing. For our knowledge-based economy, these trends pose a serious problem," said Wu. "The rising cost of college textbooks is part of that problem. I have received more communication in my office on this problem than any other education topic."

The study follows the amendment passed in July to address the rising cost of college textbooks. The amendment listed specific steps textbook publishers, faculty, bookstores and institutions of higher education should take to make college textbooks more affordable for students.

"The college textbook industry is a classic broken market. And every year that the cost of textbooks doubles compared to the overall average of prices, is another year students experience an even greater barrier to a college degree. I intend to find solutions to this problem that is plaguing our students," said Wu.

The study also follows the release of a Government Accountability Office report requested by Wu that confirmed college textbook prices are increasing and are a growing financial burden as students pursue higher education. The GAO report found that textbook prices have risen at an average of 6 percent each year since 1987, compared with overall average price increases of 3 percent.

Since 1986, textbook prices have nearly tripled, increasing by 186 percent, while tuition and fees have increased by 240 percent. Overall inflation since this time has increased by 72 percent.

The cost of textbooks and supplies as a percentage of overall tuition and fees is 72 percent for community college students. For students at four-year public institutions, the cost of textbooks is 26 percent of their college tuition and fees.

Textbook "add-ons" such as CD-ROMs and other supplemental materials often contribute to the rising cost.

Wu is hopeful the study will bring together all stakeholders and will reveal ways to reduce the rising cost of textbooks.

The study is being carried out by the Advisory Committee on Student Financial Assistance of the U.S. Department of Education. Its completion is scheduled for the summer of 2007.

In 2005, the Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts proposed the "Textbook Rental" program as a possible cost-cutting alternative for students.

Working with a committee of students, faculty and administrators, the SGA drafted a proposal for a pilot rental program. However, according to the SGA, Follett, the parent company that bought out the Textbook Annex nearly five years ago, agreed to deliver little savings for students while locking participating faculty into using the same textbook for six years.

"In addition, students would be charged 50 percent of the cover price of the rentals each semester, which would result in a profit of approximately 300 percent for Follett over those six semesters," said SGA leaders in a statement released to the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

"We encourage students to buy their textbooks from the local stores in downtown Amherst. We also encourage students to buy their textbooks directly from other UMass students using online trading sites like zoomassbooks.com," the statement said. "By encouraging students to shop elsewhere, we ultimately would like to build enough leverage to sit back down with Follett representatives and negotiate a textbook rental system that would truly improve textbook affordability. But this won't happen this semester."

Memorial held for woman struck by truck

By Nicole Boonjakuakul

It's been nearly a year since this town lost Meg Sanders — a friend, a social activist, an artist. As the anniversary of her passing approaches, Hampshire College celebrates her spirit with a special exhibition featuring creative work of her lifetime.

Margaret "Meg" Sanders was a bright 23-year-old who was struck by a truck in Northampton last September. The Hampshire College alumnus was devoted to raising AIDS awareness within the community and volunteered at four different nonprofit organizations, including AIDS CARE Hampshire County and Safe Passage in Northampton, a shelter for battered women.

The avid bicyclist also participated in the Red Ribbon Ride, a 175-mile bicycle ride across Massachusetts that raises money and awareness for HIV and AIDS. When Sanders wasn't fighting for various social causes, she dedicated her time and energy to producing art.

When visitors walk through the doors of Hampshire College's Film/Photo/Video Building, where the exhibit is being held, the first thing to catch their eyes is a curtain of 1,000 paper-made cranes splashing the white wall with a unique effervescence.

To the right of the colorful display is the Red Ribbon Ride 2006 jersey, which was designed with bright prints of Sanders' bicycle wheel, paper-cut design in her memory. The two pieces represent Sanders' strong spirit towards helping her community.

"Meg had a crane-making party, where members of the community made 1,000 cranes to raise money to donate to people living with AIDS," said Sura Levine, Professor of Art History at Hampshire College. According to Levine, who was Sanders' former art professor, cranes were one of the artist's signatures on her work, as miniature cranes speckled books covers and note cards hand-made by Sanders. "Even after Meg's death, there have been paper crane-making events to gain donations towards Red Ribbon Ride or any other organizations Meg was involved with," Levine added.

While pointing to a picture of Sanders wearing fairy wings, Levine described Sanders as being "pixie-like," with fiery red hair to match her intense energy.

"She was marvelously impish, very funny," said Levine, "and her voice ... Her speaking voice was very quiet, but when she started laughing, it was like this other kind of ... thing," she exclaimed.

Sanders' vibrant personality and enthusiasm for creativity shined through her work. Her multifaceted talent created several different books — each with its own Sanders-made book cover and binding, along with paper-cut collages and illustrations within the pages.

"One book Meg made is called 'Swallow,' a book about animals that eat books, and each illustration is a paper-cut collage," explained Levine, as she pointed to the book in one of the two display cases. Right next to it was another small book about books damaged by floods, cleverly titled "Singe." Each page of the book was gradually soaked as the book progressed, and included texts from books that suffered in famous floods. Across from these books in the display case was a pop-up book in which Sanders used black and red construction paper to create pop-up figures of birds.

Other works on display were a book with a metal binding, a book with water-colored and pastel illustrations, books shaped like an accordion, handmade note cards and envelopes filled with poems written in calligraphy, and a book that measured three-quarters of an inch — all hand-made by Sanders.

"She wanted to see how small she can get with making a book," said Levine. "She always went beyond what most students do. She was someone who never sat still and was always making something. Even while she was reading, she might be sitting with a book in front of her while making something with her hands," she added.

In the middle of explaining each piece of artwork, Levine reminisced about a kind gesture Sanders once made.

"I went out of town during a break and asked Meg to cat-sit for me. While I was gone, I allowed her to have a few friends over to celebrate the holidays with. When I came back from my trip, I came back to a paper-cut portrait of my cat with a thank-you note on the back of it," Levine recalls.

The exhibition of her artwork, which will continue through the end of September, has brought members of different communities together. But this isn't the first time Sanders has had this impact before.

"Meg died around 9 a.m. Later that evening, at around 6:15 p.m.,

UMass Transit adds five new buses

The Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA) plans to add another five buses by the end of the academic year.

By Anna Doliantis
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Transit system added five new buses to its fleet in the middle of August, and plans to add another five by the end of the academic year.

The new buses were designed to be more accommodating to disabled passengers and are equipped with wheelchair-accessible ramps.

"On the older buses, passengers had to roll their wheelchairs onto the lifts in the back, and the bus driver would operate the lift. With the new buses, they can just roll on by themselves," said Transit Services manager, Al Byam.

The buses, which were manufactured by Gillig Corp of Hayward, California, are run by the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA). They are blue and orange, seat 40 passengers, and are marked with the new PVTA logo.

"The new buses also have the most fuel efficient diesel engine," said Byam.

The buses "are being alternated on Route 30 (North Amherst/Belchertown Road), Route 31 (Sunderland/South Amherst), and Route 38 (UMass/Mount Holyoke)," according to Byam.

The cost of the new vehicles was just under $300,000 each, said Byam. "Eighty percent of the funding came from the federal government and 20 percent came from the state's Federal Transportation Program."

"Overall, PVTA received $8.4 million for 30 new buses and 13 new converted vans, including $6.4 million secured by U.S. Congressman John Olver and $2 million from the state Executive Office of Transportation," according to this week's press release.

"We retired five of the 1992 buses this year," said Byam, "and we are scheduled to get five more in the spring."

Buses are replaced after twelve years of operation, so plans are underway to retire the 1993 and 1994 buses, which are eligible for replacement in 2008, and to replace all of the current buses over the next 10 years.

The same procedures and regulations for riding the older buses will apply to the new vehicles as well.

Eating and drinking is not permitted, and passengers are still required to remain behind the white line, according to the PVTA website.

The regular fare for riding the buses remains at $1, but is free to Five College students who present a student ID.

For more information on the new buses or to download bus schedules, passengers are urged to consult the PVTA website at www.pvta.com.

U.S. warns of violence in Iraq during holy month

Violence in Iraq killed 65 people and wounded more than 100 on Sept. 19. The day's deadliest attack took place in Samarra, where a suicide car bombing killed 10 and wounded 38.

By Patrick Quinn
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Top U.S. generals warned Wednesday that violence will increase in Baghdad during the Islamic holy month of Ramadan and said al-Qaida in Iraq already has intensified its assaults against American troops.

The warnings came as violence killed some 65 people and wounded more than 100 in two days. At least 23 people died in bombings and shootings around the country Wednesday, and 10 bodies were found. The day's deadliest attack took place in Samarra, where a suicide car bombing outside a Sunni tribal leader's house killed 10 and wounded 38.

The military said a U.S. soldier was killed Wednesday by small-arms fire in northeastern Baghdad, and reported the death of another American in a roadside blast in the same area the day before. A third U.S. soldier died in the capital in "a non-combat incident," the military said, without giving details.

there was a memorial at First Churches. A hundred fifty people from so many different communities were there. Everybody realized that they knew somebody from each of those communities, but didn't realize that Meg connected us all," explained Levine.

Sanders' biggest inspiration was the community. She created art that reflected her passion for the people in her community. As a tribute to her, a memorial book was created by various community members, with each individual page designed by a different person.

"She was a really, really interesting person. She made it a point of not foregrounding herself. She put her art forward; she put her organizations forward, but never herself," Levine said. "When I think of Meg, I think about her joy with living. I think about her boundless energy. I never had a sense of her getting tired. She was always on the move, always doing something," she added.

In a book Sanders made while visiting India, titled "Yatra, an Indian Journey," Sanders wrote, "We have come for many reasons — I come for travel, for the experience, for the exploration of book culture. I want to learn about the meaning of text, of paper, printing, and binding — about speaking and writing and reading. I want to learn colors, the senses, and drown in the unfamiliar." Though her time was cut short, Meg Sanders achieved that within the amount of time she had.

E.coli infects 146

WASHINGTON—The E. coli outbreak spread to two more states Wednesday, and investigators reported finding contaminated spinach in the refrigerator of one victim.

The outbreak has sickened at least 146 people in 23 states, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. One person has died and 76 others have been hospitalized, some with kidney failure.

In a break that could help isolate the source of the outbreak, New Mexico's public health laboratory isolated E. coli from an opened package of spinach, the CDC said. Spinach had only been the suspected source of the bacteria, based on

House votes on immigration plan

House approves voter ID bill, Senate moves on border fence as Congress gets tough on illegal immigrants.

By Jim Abrams
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—The House voted Wednesday to require Americans to show proof of citizenship in order to vote, and the Senate moved to build a 700-mile fence along the Mexican border as Republicans sharpened attacks on illegal immigration before the midterm elections.

The 228-196 House vote on a new photo ID plan and the Senate's consideration of the fence were both part of a get-tough policy on illegal immigrants that Republicans have embraced after Congress' failure to agree on broader legislation that would set a path for undocumented workers to attain citizenship.

House GOP leaders have insisted that tighter borders and tougher laws must precede more comprehensive immigration changes. The House passed the fence bill last week and plans votes Thursday on other enforcement measures to increase penalties for people building tunnels under the border, make it easier to detain and deport immigrant gang members and criminals and clarify the ability of state and local authorities to detain illegal immigrants.

Republican sponsors of the voter identification bill said it was a commonsense way to stop fraud at the polls. People need photo IDs to board planes, buy alcohol or cash checks, said Rep. Vernon Ehlers, R-Mich., chairman of the House Administration Committee. "This is not a new concept."

"This is what Americans want," said Rep. John Mica, R-Fla. "They want safe borders and they want safe ballots."

But Democrats assailed the legislation, saying it could hurt minorities, the poor and the elderly — groups that tend to vote Democratic — who might have trouble producing a photo identification.

"This bill is tantamount to a 21st century poll tax," said Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer, D-Md. "It will disenfranchise large number of legal voters."

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., said he was initially denied a voter ID required under a Missouri state law because he doesn't have a driver's license and couldn't immediately produce a passport or birth certificate. His congressional ID card was not accepted.

A Missouri court earlier this month struck down the state law, and on Tuesday a state superior court judge in Georgia ruled that that state's law requiring a photo ID was an unconstitutional condition for voting.

Iraqi and U.S. soldiers launch security sweep

Ramadan, there has unfortunately been an increase in violence. That, in fact, is occurring within the city," said U.S. Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the senior military spokesman in Iraq.

He said Iraqi and U.S. forces were carrying out operations against insurgents and terrorists to "disrupt their ability to coordinate violence prior to Ramadan."

Thousands of Iraqi and U.S. soldiers launched a security sweep around Baghdad on Aug. 7. The operation managed to lower violence in targeted areas of Baghdad, but attacks spiked in the rest of the city.

"Al-Qaida in Iraq, insurgents and death squads have recently increased their attacks" in the Baghdad area, Caldwell said.

"This past week, there was a spike in execution-style murders in Baghdad. Many bodies found had clear signs of being bound, tortured and executed. We believe death squads and other illegal armed groups are responsible."

Caldwell said it was believed that the increase in al-Qaida attacks against American forces came after a threat issued Sept. 7 by Abu Ayyoub al-Masri, also known as Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq. The U.S. military, which killed the group's previous leader, has put a $5 million bounty on al-Masri's head.

The commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad told The Associated Press that he has been ordered to try to control the violence ahead of Ramadan, which is expected to begin around Sept. 24.

"The thing that I was told to do, prior to the month of Ramadan, is dramatically reduce the number of mortars, kidnappings, assassinations and [car bombs] inside of Baghdad and predominantly try to reduce the sectarian violence," Maj. Gen. James Thurman said.

He said he was pushing Iraqi leaders to do more about sectarian militias responsible for killing thousands of people — most of them in the capital — and would also need more Iraqi troops.

"Militias are holding the rule of law in contempt. We're pushing this government to get a policy as to how they're going to deal with it so their own people know how to deal with the militias," Thurman said. "I would like to see more Iraqi forces. We are pushing that very hard."

Bombings kill 34 Taliban fighters

By Jason Straziuso
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan — Clashes and bombings killed 34 Taliban fighters and one policeman in Afghanistan, while President Hamid Karzai told the U.N. Wednesday that terrorist sanctuaries elsewhere must be destroyed to eliminate the violence engulfing his country.

In a clear reference to neighboring Pakistan, Karzai told the United Nation's General Assembly in New York that "terrorism does not emanate from within Afghanistan" but that his country "is its worst victim."

"We must destroy terrorist sanctuaries beyond Afghanistan, dismantle the elaborate networks in the region," he told world leaders. "We must ensure that political currents and entities in the region are not allowed to use extremism as an instrument of policy."

Afghan President Hamid Karzi calls for destroying militant sanctuaries outside Afghanistan.

Karzai's call for military action against terror cells outside Afghanistan comes about two weeks after Pakistan signed a truce with Taliban-linked militants in the tribal North West Frontier Province

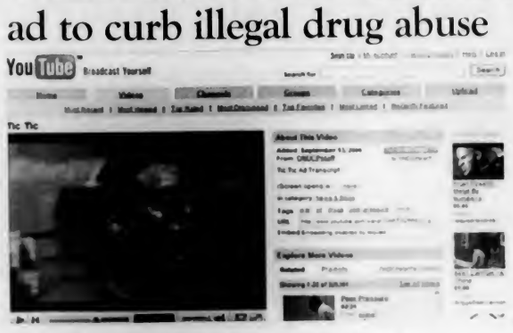
White House releases YouTube ad to curb illegal drug abuse



The White House released an anti-drug public service announcement Sept. 18, 2006.

By Jake Coyle
Associated Press

NEW YORK — If a PSA drops in cyberspace, does anyone hear it?

As various interests have increasingly converged on YouTube in hopes of some free, viral marketing, it came as little surprise when the White House announced earlier this week that it, too, wanted a piece of lonely girl's spotlight.

The Office of National Drug Control Policy posted a dozen videos at http://www.YouTube.com/ONDCP, mostly of public-service commercials on the dangers of drug use from the "above the influence" campaign, as seen on TV.

As of Wednesday, the ONDCP channel had received a scant 53 subscribers and a total of 14,463 views, a relatively low total. How the youthful, rebellious Web is responding to the ONDCP's efforts is perhaps hinted at by the mirror site, http://www.ondep.com, which recasts the acronym as "oppressive network drug content propaganda."

It's true, though, that any YouTube viewings are basically gravy to the ONDCP; it costs nothing to post the clips. Still, the campaign's numbers pale in comparison to, for example, the hundreds of thousands that have watched various videos on how to grow marijuana.

A spokesman for YouTube, which generally doesn't regulate its user-posted videos, declined on Wednesday to discuss the site's policy regarding videos that show illegal activity, such as drug use or drug production.

YouTube and the Web clearly present a problem for public-service announcements. On TV and on radio, PSAs typically rely on federally required play or corporations looking to bolster their image. They are inserted between entertainment — they aren't the entertainment, itself.

On YouTube, there are no regulations and videos make a dent with the public only if they create their own audience, thus making their way up the "most viewed" list. To help grab viewers, the government links its videos with the terms "war on drugs," "peer-pressure," "marijuana," "weed," "ONDCP" and "420" (a reference to marijuana), so anyone searching for those words on YouTube can find them.

The Ad Council, a leading producer of PSAs since 1942, has seen its methods change over the years and has worked to adapt to the Internet — like asking for donated ad time to play before videos.

"I don't think YouTube has changed the way we approach PSAs, but I think it's just added another dimension and another media niche for a no-cost solution," says Barbara Shimatis, the senior vice president of interactive services at the Ad Council.

Shimatis thinks YouTube and other video-sharing sites could propel PSAs to become still more entertaining, and points to the popularity of a dramatic global warming ad of theirs featuring a train (a metaphor for global warming) bearing down on a young girl (a stand-in for future generations).

Some of the most viewed drug-related videos on YouTube are far more persuasively anti-drug than anything produced by the government or the Ad Council. In one video, you can see a real heroin user discuss his fight with addiction.

Over 1,850,000 people have watched a sadly hysterical 1980 interview with Richard Pryor in which he brags about cocaine he recently purchased. It would be hard to watch the clip of Pryor, who died of a heart attack at the age of 65 in 2005, and not contemplate whether drugs shortened his life.

Still, people generally don't watch YouTube hoping to change their lives. After all, one of the most watched PSAs on YouTube is a clip from the '80s about the dangers of crack cocaine. It's not watched for its message, but for its star, Pee Wee Herman.

where the government has little control.

Under the terms of that deal, Pakistani troops agreed to end their military campaign against fighters in North Waziristan, while the militants said they would halt their attacks on Pakistani forces and stop crossing into Afghanistan to launch ambushes.

Afghan officials repeatedly accuse Pakistan of not doing enough to stem the flow of insurgents and weapons across the border. Pakistan, which has deployed 80,000 troops along the porous border, rejects the accusation and says it does all it can.

In Washington, NATO's top commander, U.S. Gen. James L. Jones, said after weeks of prodding, European nations have agreed to provide more troops for the alliance in Afghanistan. Romania has agreed to send a battalion in October, and the United Kingdom and Canada are adding to their forces, Jones said.

Police, meanwhile, recovered the bodies of seven suspected Taliban fighters after a two-hour clash with police early Wednesday in a mountainous southern region of Helmand province, district police chief Ghulam Rasool said.

NATO-led soldiers killed up to 10 suspected insurgents in Helmand's Garmser district Tuesday, a NATO statement said. There were no NATO casualties.

Afghanistan has been suffering its heaviest insurgent attacks since the Taliban regime was toppled in late 2001. On Monday, three bombings killed at least 19 people, including four Canadian soldiers.

Suspected Taliban fighters ambushed police in Ghazni province on Tuesday, and provincial police chief Tafseer Khan said 13 fighters were killed, though no bodies were recovered. Khan also said two police and about 17 fighters were wounded in the fight in Giro district.

Four insurgents were killed in a clash with Afghan soldiers in eastern Paktika province Tuesday, a Defense Ministry statement said, while in the central province of Wardak, one policeman was killed and two wounded after dozens of fighters attacked police, said Mohammed Hassan, the deputy provincial police chief.

Karzai told the U.N. assembly that millions of Afghans have voted in elections and the country's per capita income has doubled since 2002. But he said an increase in terrorist attacks has resulted in schools and medical clinics being razed, and the country's schools now have 200,000 fewer students than two years ago.

He said a lack of security has allowed a record-breaking narcotics trade to flourish.

Elsewhere, a wedding celebration north of the Afghan capital turned into a scene of sorrow after assailants threw a grenade at the outdoor gathering, killing five women and wounding 18, an official said.

Four suspects were detained after the blast Monday in the village of Sayadan, about 40 miles north of Kabul, said Abdul Jabar Takwa, the governor of Parwan province.

FDA inspectors look for potential source of bacteria interviews with victims.

The package came from the refrigerator of a patient who ate some of the spinach before becoming ill. The New Mexico laboratory completed "DNA fingerprinting" tests late Tuesday, and state and federal officials then matched it to the strain of the bacteria — E. coli O157:H7 — implicated in the outbreak.

That find could help investigators narrow their hunt for the source of the contamination to a specific producer or processor.

Information on the source and brand of the tainted spinach found in New Mexico was not immediately available.

Meanwhile, FDA inspectors began visiting California farms this week, seeking signs of past flooding or cases in which contaminated surface areas had come into contact with crops. They also were looking for potential sources of bacteria inside packing plants.

California produces 74 percent of the nation's fresh spinach crop. The Salinas Valley accounts for roughly three-quarters of the state's share, and it has been the focus of the investigation. The area has links to two of the companies that have recalled fresh spinach products: Natural Selection Foods and River Ranch Fresh Foods.

Mass. receives prison grant

BOSTON — The Massachusetts Department of Corrections will receive part of a $12 million federal award to help inmates transition back to life outside of prison, the U.S. Department of Justice said Wednesday.

The state department was awarded $421,875 to evaluate inmates before they are released and to develop transition plans with community-based agencies to help inmates find work and access critical services.

"Fewer than half of all released offenders stay out of trouble for at least three years after their release from prison," said Regina Schofield, assistant attorney general in the justice department's Office of Justice Programs. "The Prisoner Re-entry Institutive involves an unprecedented collaborative approach at the federal, state and local levels by addressing this problem through supervision and providing a wide range of services offenders need to help them successfully transition to law-abiding behavior."

Between a rock and a hard place

Adam McGillen

There is a new species fast approaching extinction, and that species is a vital part of how our society functions and thrives. Many of the students on this campus don't realize it, but it is a species very close to them and for many, it is themselves who face extinction. The animal that is so quickly dying out is the Average Joe (Josephus averagum).

It's no mystery that there is a widening gap between the rich and the poor in the United States, and Average Joe is right in the middle of it. Tax-cuts paying out to the wealthy, increases in tuition, unemployment on the rise; all of these things serve to drive a wedge between the upper and lower classes, while crushing the middle-class that was once the heart of our society.

I, for one, have witnessed this first hand. As a member of a middle-class family that is struggling to push two children through college at the same time, it has been made very clear that doing so is no easy task in this day and age. Watching my parents struggle to make ends meet as they try to balance their retirement future with the educational future of my sister and I has certainly not been a great deal of fun.

Sometimes it just feels like there is no way to come out on top when you're in the middle. Students coming from lower income brackets get the majority of financial aid, easing some of the stress of paying for college now. Students whose families belong to the highest income brackets worry little about paying for college anyways, as their spending is focused mainly on the newest iPod and a pair of Nike running shoes that can synchronize with said iPod. It's the students in the middle that struggle the most, blindly seeking a mid-point between financial aid and going broke with money out of their own pockets.

One of the peculiar things about being in the middle-class is that frequently when things take a turn for the best financially, they make an immediate and disproportionate turn for the worse. When an unemployed parent finds a job, the common belief would be that paying for school would be easier, but this is not true. In actuality, the expected family contribution leaps upward because the family's yearly income has taken a small jump, and so goes the financial aid right out the window. This leaves students in the middle gasping for air as they battle against a relentless current of monetary burdens.

> When an unemployed parent finds a job, the common belief would be that paying for school would be easier, but this is not true.

An easy solution would be to find a job on campus, right? This presents an entirely new set of challenges, though. Finding a place to work on campus would be ideal because there is no issue of commuting and usually the hours are much more flexible. Nothing puts a stake in the heart of my hopes for employment at UMass quite like seeing the question "Do you have work-study?" on an application.

No, I don't have work-study because obtaining work-study would require sacrificing a sizable portion of the loans that I need in order to put myself through college. My middle-class family does not have the extra income to cover such a sacrifice, and we are not poor enough (yet) to receive additional aid that can be turned into work-study.

During class this past week, a classmate of mine pointed out that the new North Apartments contribute to this trend of class division in a very unique way. With central air, about a million card-swiping devices, fire-retardant furniture and a much larger figure on residents' housing bills, the new apartments are now home to the economic elite on campus, and those few who receive enough financial aid to place them in the lap of cool luxury that is North.

The new buildings reek of wealth, and that is exactly the type of pheromones UMass wants to put out there. I can't say the improvements on this campus are bad, because I love visiting friends in the North Apartments, and the promise of the new Integrated Science Building is astounding, but the subtle message UMass is putting out is very clear.

This school is turning away from efforts to enhance and uplift the common student, and it is instead striving to grab the rich by the nose and bring their money into our educational hub. When state schools lose sight of helping the common student achieve higher education, and instead focus on being a financial, for-profit institution, that wedge between Richy Rich and No Cash Nash gets hammered down a little further, and Average Joe's back inches closer to snapping.

Generational language crisis

Brad Leibowitz

Like, this Ed/Op is like, about what I am doing right now, you know? When I look around these days I see a few different things, none of which look good for our future.

I see the politicians we elect, which more often than not turn into a three-ringed Barnum and Bailey circus full of lies, corruption and scandal.

I see the technological field inventing amazing new instruments, which help everyone to organize their daily lives around their favorite new pod-cast or reality show. However, our favorite pod-cast only helps to pull the proverbial wool over our eyes while we listen to Cory Hart's "I Wear my Sunglasses at Night" and politicians devastate our education systems.

Above all, when I look around our generation, I see a massive and national progress in the dumbing-down of our language.

Increasingly, our generation is speaking in a less articulate manner than ever before. Now I know what you're saying. "Yeah, I do know someone who speaks with too many 'likes' or an un-needed 'you know' too often, but at least this is only confined to outside of the educational system." I'm here to tell you that it's not. This chronic syndrome of unnecessary, frivolous language has corrupted every aspect of our generations' culture.

I, as many of you out there who are reading this publication, also read this paper at a dry spot in the middle of a lecture, so I am going to prove it to you right now; especially if you're in a discussion class. Take the time today during your classes to simply make a list next to this column of how many times you hear the words "like," "whatever" and "you know" used too often or in an improper context; it will simply amaze you.

> Take the time today during your classes to simply make a list next to this column of how many times you hear the words "like," "whatever" and "you know" used too often or in an improper context; it will simply amaze you.

On this note of frustration, it's not that I don't occasionally get a good laugh off hearing one of my peers try to convey an intelligent message, only to have the statement come out sounding as if someone hit that person in the head with a metal bat earlier that morning. Trust me, I chuckle at that sometimes.

However, those laughs are not out of amusement anymore, as they once were. They are out of sheer disbelief, if not absolute horror. It's an ironic sense of life when our parents, who fight so hard to educate us, to pick up a book and to further ourselves through the pursuit of knowledge, have to sit at the dinner table listening to how their 19-year-old daughter or son "like learned about some old guy named Einstein or a war that happened like 50 years ago, which has no, like, bearing on today, you know."

Here's the thing: that war that happened 50 years ago, which gave all of us a better life, was fought by our parents and by their parents in the simple stance that if it were not fought, the college experience we all so richly indulge in would be nothing more than a dream.

Yet, as much as I would love to state that this is a crisis that is restricted to our generation, sadly, it is not. Perhaps you have sat in a classroom listening to a teacher who is tiring his heart out to convey intelligent information, yet fails to do so because he can't find the words to describe the information being put forth. Rather than taking a breath and relaxing, the message that is being offered comes out to the effect of, "Well yeah, it's like that, I guess."

Now don't get me wrong, I am not saying that this happens often, because 99 percent of my teachers are highly educated intellectuals who have a verbal command of the language so to convey a message that requires precise diction. Nevertheless, I have sat in class being witness to this horrifying debauchery of our language by people who are supposed to be well-educated, and, even more so, well-versed in communicating their ideas.

So I beg you, the next time you speak in a classroom, a board-room or a restaurant when you're out to dinner with your friends, take a second to think about what you're saying before you throw in an extra "like." As the Chicago-based poet, Taylor Mali, once stated, "I entreat you, I implore you, I exhort you, I challenge you: To speak with conviction. To say what you believe in a manner that bespeaks the determination with which you believe it. Because contrary to the wisdom of the bumper sticker, it is not enough these days to simply question authority, you have to speak with it, too."

Nowadays, it seems to be the popular thing to disparage the Bush administration. In the wake of the war in Iraq and the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, it's getting almost too easy (not to mention the Dubai Port controversy). Pundits raise questions about the president's integrity; comedians make attacks on his intelligence, even the Lefties at "Rold Gold" pretzels made an attempt on his life, but does President Bush really deserve all this criticism?

As much as I have sung foul of nearly all of his policies since he took office, I've found myself recently defending the man. Let's face it; this job is a lot harder than he thought it would be. It's a lot harder than anyone thought it would be. And, OK, perhaps President Bush isn't the type to rise to the occasion with Rooseveltian grace, but he is a C student, after all, and has been since his Yale days, perhaps longer.

Is there anything wrong with being a C student? No, of course not. I've often found myself with a C average and haven't lost any sleep over it. It's traditionally considered satisfactory, anyways. This grade represents the middle rung of American academia, and who better to represent American interests than someone who's spent his entire life basking in mediocrity?

The presidency may have looked like a pretty sweet job (nice house, body guards and an all-access tour of Graceland with the Prime Minister of Japan) during Clinton's term. When Bush was eyeing up the Whitehouse he couldn't possibly have foreseen all the various crises that would arise after he took the inaugural oath, which made the oval office a considerably more stressful work environment.

If one could equate the Clinton era presidency, with its economic prosperity and minimal national security issues (this was back before terror threats were even color-coded), to a standard college course — then post-9/11 America can only be described as an advanced-placement presidency, and poor George never fared too well in A.P. classes.

So I don't particularly blame the Bush administration for dropping the proverbial ball on certain issues. I also took some A.P. courses in high school and didn't exactly rise to the occasion because they often obligated me to read really long, arduous texts as thick and esoteric as, let's say, the 9/11 Commission Report. (I didn't read it; why should he? Did you?) If George Bush wanted a job where he was forced to think, he would've become a scientist for NASA or something to that effect.

Now, I could be accused of being facetious, and of casting our commander-in-Chief in some sort of disingenuous light, but I'm not saying anything that the man hasn't admitted to and bragged about himself.

"If you're like me, you won't remember everything you did here. That can be a good thing. But there will be some people and some moments you will never forget," he said to a group of Yale graduates back in May 2001. He's been known to make light of his shortcomings, he they, intellectual ineptitude or an inability to find weapons of mass destruction.

> Dick Cheney, Donald Rumsfeld, Condoleeza Rice — he's got enough straight-men (and women) around. He might as well play the comic relief.

This humorous fashion used to bother me until I thought about the people George Bush is surrounded by. Dick Cheney, Donald Rumsfeld, Condoleezza Rice — he's got enough straight-men (and women) around. He might as well play the comic relief.

When Bush made those comments to the nascent Yale graduates, however, little did he know that an attack on our nation, an impending economic slump and various other buzz-kills were about to make him pay a lot more attention than he was used to. This was seriously going to cut into his vacation time.

When Hurricane Katrina hit back in 2005, our noble leader was minding his own business, enjoying his vacation back home on his ranch in Crawford, Texas. Bush worried not; Michael Brown, the bright and talented former president of the International Arabian Horse Association had it under complete control. Of course, his vacation time was cut short when the levees broke and President Bush found himself stuck with one more extra-credit assignment.

I say give the guy a break. The presidency isn't the cakewalk it once was. Long gone are the days where the spoiradic wiretap or soft money exchange went unnoticed, where a president could give one of his friends a cushy job without a major city flooding and where the wars were waged against countries and people whose name you could pronounce.

This is the A.P. presidency, after all, amid a world where the United States is falling farther and farther behind in academic achievement. Perhaps for the rest of his term we should let George play hooky and hand the position over to someone who can handle the heavier course load. What's President Hu Jintao of China doing 'til 2008?

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

DAYS OF AWE-SOME COINCIDENCE

Although usually rendered as "the Jewish New Year," the Hebrew words Rosh Hashanah literally mean "head of the year." At first glance this seems odd, since the holiday falls in the lunar month of Tishri, which is the seventh month, not the first month, according to the Hebrew Bible.

This is merely one of the mysteries of this most sacred of the Jewish Holy Days. According to Jewish tradition, Rosh Hashanah is the day on which God created "adam" — the Hebrew word for "human." In other words, Rosh Hashanah is the birthday of humanity. It is a celebration of life itself.

The occasion is at once so solemn and so joyous that it has generated a multitude of rituals, from the many prayers and melodies heard in the synagogue only on the High Holy Days, to the beautiful Tashlich service in which we ritually cast away our wrong-doings from the previous year by throwing breadcrumbs into a stream, and of course the joyous family gatherings, especially the festive dinners before Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

While it is a distinct holiday, Rosh Hashanah does not stand alone. Rather, it is like a sentinel standing watch over a month of Jewish celebration and reflection, which begins with the ten-day period between Rosh Hashanah (the New Year) and Yom Kippur (the Day of Atonement). We call these ten days the "Days of Awe" because of the awesome burden we feel, both individually and collectively, to atone for our misdeeds and then to face God's judgment. Jewish tradition holds that the gates of Heaven close as the sun goes down on Yom Kippur, and that our fate is sealed at that awesome moment. That is why we fast on Yom Kippur: for on that day we are concerned about the fate of our soul.

For me personally, the High Holy Days are an extraordinary gift, a time to leave behind the worldly concerns which otherwise occupy so much of my life. The ancient prayers and soulful melodies (chanted in minor keys that would sound familiar to anyone from the Middle East or northern Africa) help me find my way to the sustained introspection and the profound humility which I need in order to hear "the still, small voice within."

Muslims will also be fasting for daytime hours during the month of Ramadan, which begins on September 24th. This synchronicity of Rosh Hashanah and Ramadan is extremely unusual. In fact, It will not happen again for at least 36 years, and probably never again in any of our lifetimes, because although the Jewish and Muslim calendars are both lunar calendars, only the Jewish calendar is coordinated with the solar calendar (by inserting an extra month every few years). By contrast, Ramadan will move through the year, advancing ten days each year relative to the Gregorian calendar, and will not again fall at the end of September for 36 years.

So as I sit in synagogue during these High Holy Days, doing the hard work of teshuvah (repentance or "turning"), I will hold my Muslim sisters and brothers in my prayers, while remembering the common father (Abraham) from whom both our peoples are descended. I will pray we can put aside our differences and find a way to embrace each other as brethren who share a God and a long, glorious family tradition.

To my Muslim friends, I wish you Ramadan mubarak!

To my fellow Jews, shanah tovah! Happy new year!

Numb3rs season opens

By Alex Hanson
Collegian Correspondent

Numb3rs had its season three return to the CBS lineup last night, and although it may have been a quiet one, it deserves a second look. With such shows as Survivor, CSI, and The Amazing Race taking up all the promotional time, it is tough for a smaller show to get the advertising it needs for a proper jump. Don't let that steer you away though — you may be surprised when you sit down and watch.

Also, if you're one of those people who think they won't be able to follow the story, you're wrong. Numb3rs does a good job of letting everyone follow right away. A person can range from hardcore fan right down to a rookie and follow along with no problem at all.

The show centers on two brothers Don Eppes (Rob Morrow) and Charlie Eppes (David Krumholtz). Don is a cop and Charlie a mathematical genius, and they collaborate on criminal cases. Generally Charlie's knowledge of math cracks the case — it may be a ridiculous premise but the writers pull it off. It might provide you with the need for something different with a television schedule chock-full of the same crime-drama-style show.

The premiere episode, named "Spree," starts off following a happily married couple on the road. They stop off at a small diner and rob and murder the people inside — they're not so normal after all. This introduces us to the couple, 30-year-old teacher Crystal Hoyle (Kim Dickens) and her boyfriend and her former student, 17-year-old Buck Winters (David Gallagher). If you take Mickey and Mallory Knox from Natural Born killers and combine them with Debra Lafave and her student, that's Crystal and Buck.

The episode flashes forward to the investigation team arriving at the scene of the crime. Most the shows regulars, Don, Colby Granger (Dylan Bruno), Megan Reeves (Diane Farr) and Agent Ian Edgerton (Lou Diamond Phillips) all return in this one scene. They give a rundown of the crime and study over a map with all the areas the couple has hit on their spree. Don decides to go to Charlie to see if he can shed some light on the map.

From there, the episode goes into the standard formula for most crime shows. The investigation team gets close, but just misses the couple. They find some friends and bring them in for questioning, as well as some random leads throughout the show. All this is leading up to the capture of Buck and the kidnapping of Reeves by Crystal. Nothing extraordinary, and nothing that falls short or is out of place. This is not why you should watch the show — if that's what you wanted, you could go watch CSI. The real reason that people should give this show a chance is that it's the things that happen in between that make the show enjoyable.

The relationships between some of the characters are really well done. Interactions between the father, his son Alan (Judd Hirsch) and Charlie show that they care for each other and provide some comic relief. Even the moments when Charlie goes into his mathematical rants are interesting. The formula Charlie uses, which in this episode is a pursuit curve, is explained in a very easy-to-follow way using fighter planes in one example and a dog, a cat and a mouse in another. Though the concept of the formula by itself would be difficult to understand for those of us who aren't mathematically inclined, the show puts it in a very easy perspective.

That being said, there wasn't even too much math involved with the show, so if you hate statistics so much that you would pass by Numb3rs, don't worry too much. Yes, it was involved in some points of the show, but overall it wasn't a big part of the story.

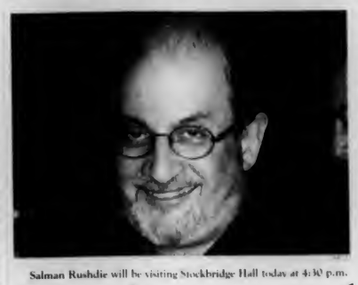
The acting in Numb3rs is very real, better at times than bigger, more elaborate shows. The interactions between the characters are what you would expect in real life, nothing is too over-the-top or over-acted in the episode.

If you have some free time on your hands and you're just scanning through the channels a lot, give Numb3rs a chance. CBS does bury the show in their fall lineup — it's currently on Friday nights at 10:00 pm est. — but that doesn't mean you should just forget about it altogether. People might not be around to watch it but there are ways around that. TiVo is an optional, as well as the old-fashioned VCR (yes, they do still exist), and worst comes to worst, you will be able to find it online somewhere.

Overall, this is a decent show — it might not be for everyone, but that doesn't mean you can't watch it and find out for yourself

Rob Morrow and David Krumholtz star in CBS's newest show "Numb3rs," airing Friday nights at 10:00 p.m.

Rushdie tonight



Salman Rushdie will be visiting Stockbridge Hall today at 4:30 p.m.

School has officially begun, and the University of Massachusetts is back to being packed with poor, sleep-deprived students with too much work. That said, anyone looking for an interesting, unique lecture should head over to Bowker Auditorium in Stockbridge Hall today at 4:30 p.m. to see acclaimed author Salman Rushdie.

Rushdie is most well-known for his novel "Midnight's Children," but his other works include "The Satanic Verses," and, most recently, Shalimar the Clown."

The title of Rushdie's talk is "Heraclitus," or "Character and Destiny," so come down to rub shoulders with a world renowned author. If that's not exciting enough, — it's absolutely free.

People, not politicians

Radio remains the most important medium in reclaiming democracy for the people, says Amy Goodman, host of the nationally syndicated progressive news show "Democracy Now!"

"Democracy Now!" is also carried on the Internet and some TV stations.

But the program that began 10 years ago on five community stations run by Pacifica has experienced its most dramatic growth on regular over-the-air radio, which accounts for almost all of its 500-plus outlets.

"Radio is inexpensive," says Goodman. "It reaches everyone."

That's important because Goodman starts with the premise that everyone matters. On the radio, in person and in the new book she co-authored with her brother David, "Static" (Hyperion, $23.95), she repeatedly declares only a chorus of individual voices can turn America around.

She distrusts both Republicans and Democrats, and she's especially disappointed with the media that cover them.

"The media is supposed to be the fourth estate, not for the state," she says. "But it has let itself be controlled. When it's 'embedded' in government, it stops being an independent voice."

Using an example from "Static," she contrasts the powerful images and reports in early Hurricane Katrina coverage from New Orleans with the lack of anything similarly compelling from Iraq.

"What we get from mainstream media is lies and distortion," she says. "When George W. Bush lied about Iraq having weapons of mass destruction, he had the press corps right behind him selling it."

While shows like "Democracy Now!" present another perspective, she says change will come only when people want it and speak out for it.

"Bush is uniting people across the political spectrum against him and his policies," she says. "But there's no way to predict what will happen in the fall election because fewer than half the eligible voters go to the polls."

Since progressive policies have made little progress in Washington lately, Goodman is swimming upstream. She says she's not discouraged.

"There's always cause for optimism," she says. "There are so many people out there doing things in small ways."

She points to Cindy Sheehan's vigil near the presidential compound in Texas, and to anti-war activists who pushed Ned Lamont past Sen. Joe Lieberman in the Connecticut Democratic primary.

"That shakes the establishment," Goodman says. "It says there's another voice."

The Internet is also a prime carrier of that voice, she says. "It's the great equalizer, unless it's privatized."

But the strongest megaphone now, she says, remains radio.

"'Democracy Now!' started with five outlets and now has 500. That says people are hungry for what mainstream media isn't giving them.

"Republican or Democrat, people are just sick and tired of being lied to."

Political activist Amy Goodman uses her new book, "Static," as well as radio to spread her voice.

New research tries to catagorize God

By Helen T. Gray
McClatchy Newspapers

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — How a person thinks of God is influenced less by Scripture and more by race, gender, education, income, politics and even where a person lives.

Moreover, researchers say the type of God people believe in can predict their political and moral attitudes better than just looking at their religious tradition.

This finding is part of the Baylor Religion Survey released last week, reportedly the most extensive survey of religion ever in the United States.

"American Piety in the 21st Century: New Insights to the Depth and Complexity of Religion in the U.S." was conducted by the Baylor Institute for Studies of Religion and Baylor University's Department of Sociology, involving 1,721 respondents across the country.

The survey included 29 questions about God's character and behavior, which researchers said reveal two clear and distinct dimensions of belief in God.

They can be summed up in two questions: What is your belief about how directly God is involved in the world and your personal life? And do you believe God is angry about sin and tends toward punishment and wrath?

From this, researchers concluded that Americans see God in four ways:

Type A: Authoritarian God (31.4 percent): These are believers who tend to think God is highly involved in their daily lives and world affairs. They tend to believe that God helps them in their decision-making, is responsible for global events, and is quite angry and capable of meting out punishment on the unfaithful and ungodly.

Type B: Benevolent God (23 percent): These believers tend to think that God is active in their daily lives but are less likely to believe that God is angry. Instead God is mainly a positive influence in the world and less willing to condemn and punish.

Type C: Critical God (16 percent): Believers in this grouping tend to think that God does not interact with the world but that God's displeasure will be felt in another life and that divine justice may not be of this world.

Type D: Distant God (24.4 percent): People who believe this way tend to think that God is not active in the world and not especially angry, that God is more a cosmic force who sets the laws of nature in motion and does not do things in the world nor hold clear opinions about individuals' activities or world events.

David Treuer flashes his literary wares

By Sarah T. Williams
Minneapolis Star Tribune

After his daughter, Elsina, was born in November, David Treuer quickly crafted a cradleboard for her. For the backing, he bought a cedar plank at Home Depot. Then, in his Minneapolis back yard, he steamed and molded ash strips for the footrest and crash-bar, using PVC pipes, an empty gas can and a turkey fryer. The wraps, which had been beaded by an Ojibwe woman in Wisconsin, were ready to go. All was blessed at a drum ceremony.

A new morning routine was established. When Elsina woke, Treuer would bundle her in the cradleboard, prop her on the sofa and blast Mozart operas and Brahms clarinet trios on the stereo, holding her "captive to the music, just as I had been," said Treuer, who as a child was "not allowed to listen to anything [composed] past Mahler" within earshot of his father.

For these acts of parental love, Treuer, a novelist, essayist and University of Minnesota literature professor, drew from the treasury of his complex and mixed heritage: His father, Robert Treuer, grew up in a Jewish family in Vienna and fled the Nazi occupation of Austria at age 12 — landing first in a "Dickensian snake pit of an orphanage" in England, then in a Quaker boarding school in Scotland and eventually in the United States, where he became a writer, teacher and tree farmer. His mother, Margaret Seelye Treuer, grew up in an extended Ojibwe family on Leech Lake Reservation, graduated from Catholic University Columbus School of Law in Washington and is a tribal judge for the Bois Forte Band of Chippewa. The two, now divorced, raised their four children on a tree farm at the edge of Leech Lake Reservation near Bemidji, Minn.

"My parents raised all of us with a strong sense of who we are," David Treuer said recently during a wide-ranging interview on the family farm, where he decamps each year for the summer months. "So I never really find myself writing books about identity — about recovering it or finding it."

Treuer's treasures — those he inherited and those he acquired — nevertheless are on display in two books released recently by Graywolf Press in St. Paul, Minn: "The Translation of Dr Apelles: A Love Story" and "Native American Fiction: A User's Manual." In book-jacket blurbs, Charles Baxter calls the novel "formally daring," and Edmund White praises its "linguistic fireworks."

Fireworks are also being set off by the essays, which analyze the works of Louise Erdrich, Leslie Marmon Silko, James Welch and Sherman Alexie, among others, and challenge readers, critics and writers to move away from trying to gauge the books' "Indianness" and instead treat them as literature.

There's nothing new about this New Criticism argument (which flourished in the 1940s-'60s), says Treuer; it's just not equally applied to works by Indians and other cultural minorities. As an analogy, Treuer tells of an Indian art exhibit he attended at the Weisman Museum, whose gift shop offered bundles of sage, sweetgrass and turkey feathers for sale. "I have never seen during a Kandinsky exhibition, single-serving vials of vodka, babushkas and minipots of caviar in the gift shop," he writes in the essays.

Point taken.

But "arguing about the negative effects of identity politics is still just playing identity politics," said Sherman Alexie, whose fiction comes in for Treuer's sharpest jabs (for being "bent to the task of illuminating the Indian condition") and whose novel, "Reservation Blues," Treuer brands as "almost regressively paranoid about racial mixing."

Said Alexie, by phone from Seattle: "We're still shouting from the rooftops about who we are because we've been silenced for so long. He [Treuer] is judging unfairly. He's asking us to ignore political history and view literary works only in literary terms, which, frankly, is a white-guy, academic thing to say. That sounds like [Yale critic] Harold Bloom."

To judge Indian works strictly on literary terms, he argued, would be to put authors such as Erdrich and himself on equal footing with Indian poseurs Forrest Carter and Nasdij.

"All work is autobiographical," Alexie said. "All of that history he tells us to ignore is exactly what makes his work so powerful. I can't help but think that a lot of this has to do with the way David looks [fair-skinned] — and I am in no way questioning his Indianness or his Ojibweness."

Treuer, 35, said he's accustomed to remarks about his appearance, and mostly offended, given the history of genocide on both sides of the family. But he also has a quick, accepting sense of humor. "They call us Night and Dave," he said, throwing an arm around his brother, Anton, whose dark-brown skin and black braid contrast with his brother's lighter bronze hues and close-cropped hair.

Said patriarch Robert Treuer: "If [David] is a Harold Bloom, he's a Harold Bloom with a trapline, hunting rifle and canoe."

Judging "The Translation of Dr Apelles" on its merits alone, readers will find all the fine tools of literature — satire, irony, metaphor, suspense — at work in the increasingly competent hands of a lover of great Western literature. In it there are echoes of Greek classics, of Hemingway, Flaubert and Austen. The novel tells two parallel love stories. One is modern and set in New York and its environs; the other takes place in two Indian villages at the end of the 19th century.

The former concerns Dr Apelles, a lonely translator of ancient Indian texts, whose life is so routine that the problem of an extra-thick slice of bread stuck in the toaster provides welcome relief. All is upended when he stumbles across an ancient text

Turning stomachs

BY KATE SANTICH
THE ORLANDO SENTINEL

Surely every American old enough to place his own Happy Meal order knows there's an obesity epidemic in this country. Despite this — and despite piles of research on the evils of diets high in saturated fat and sodium and low in fiber — American fast-food chains continue to roll out bigger, fatter, more decadent fare.

Consider this summer's debut of Burger King's BK Stackers, which include a Quad Stacker option of four slabs of beef, four slices of cheese and up to eight slices of bacon — "smothered," as the company puts it, in a creamy sauce.

"This burger might better be called the quadruple-by-pass special," says Jeff Novick, director of nutrition for the Pritikin Longevity Center. "Fast food like this is great if you're in a hurry — to die."

The behemoth sandwich — defibrillator sold separately — contains 1,000 calories and a whopping 68 grams of fat, including 30 grams of saturated fat. According to nutritionists, that's about half the calories and 1.5 times the saturated fat the average adult should consume in an entire day.

For its part, Burger King says it is simply giving the public what it wants.

"We're satisfying the serious meat lovers by leaving off the produce and letting them decide exactly how much meat and cheese they can handle," says Denny Marie Post, the corporation's senior vice president.

And in case the kids fail to notice the sandwich, Burger King also sells collectible figurines of the cartoonish characters featured in the BK Stackers' TV ads.

But Burger King isn't alone in fattening up its fare. In fact, there are worse burgers out there — notably Hardee's 1,420-calorie Monster Thickburger, which has 107 grams of fat.

Nor is the nutritional affront limited to burgers. Subway's 12-inch Double-Meat Classic Tuna Sub packs 1,580 calories and 110 grams of fat, Denny's Extreme Grand Slam Breakfast has 1,270 calories and 77 grams of fat, and Blimpie's BLT has 1,180 calories and 64 grams of fat.

The Center for Science in the Public Interest — known for exposing the unhealthy content of everything from Mexican food to alfredo sauce — labels such excessive fare "food porn" and argues that a lot of diners may not realize just how fattening the food is.

"To those who say we don't need calorie counts on menu boards, I say, 'Have you met the Thickburger?'" says executive director Michael F. Jacobson. "A good rule of thumb is that if a burger needs a comma in its calorie count, it's virtually impossible to fit into a healthy diet."

But some marketing experts say calorie counts won't matter. A lot of customers just may not care.

Novick, for one, thinks it's part of a public backlash against the near-constant admonishment to eat more healthfully. He traces the roots to the 2003 death of controversial diet guru Dr. Robert Atkins, who blamed carbohydrates — not fat — for the obesity epidemic. Though officials said Atkins died of injuries he suffered in a fall on an icy New York sidewalk, there were conspiratorial whispers of cardiovascular disease.

Dieters didn't know what to believe anymore.

"It was like people just threw up their hands, frustrated," Novick says. "Pretty soon there was some restaurant bragging about serving deep-fried Twinkies."

He doesn't necessarily blame the restaurants — after all, sales figures show that the more egregious the nutrition, the better the food sells. When Hardee's added its 715-calorie Hand-Scooped Ice Cream Shake, for instance, its shake sales doubled. On the other hand, Wendy's fresh fruit bowl proved to be a flop.

"Let's face it, we come from environments where food was very scarce, and there are certain things we're instinctually attracted to for survival," Novick says. "Well, now they've figured out how to make food packed with those things that were rare in the environment and that we used to have to struggle to get — and we can get them without even getting out of our cars."

It may just be part of our way of life, but with the new release of Stacker sandwiches from Burger King, people are trying to cut back on their fast food intake.

Trading Places: making a move

Jasmine Monteiro

Have you ever exchanged glances with someone and wished they had made a move? Or have you anxiously waited for the good-looking guy in your Psych 100 class to spark conversation with you? Well, what are you waiting for? In case you didn't notice, the line dividing roles between men and women is slowly fading. There is no longer a socially correct way to approach someone. Whether you're a male or female, this is a chance to break out of your shell. However, there is a reason why we still think this way.

Quite obviously, men and women need different things in a relationship. Women need to be pursued. When someone shows interest in us we want them to put in work. We want them to call us everyday and take us out and send us messages online so we can feel special. We use these signals to decide how interested in us you really are.

This is why we are so reluctant to switch roles. Very rarely will a woman approach a man to talk casually or even ask for a phone number. Not because we don't want to, but we assume that if a guy really wanted to talk to us, he would. But we no longer have a legitimate reason to believe this. Approaching somebody isn't easy for everyone. So when a guy does approach you, don't immediately roll your eyes and turn the other way. Listen to what he has to say. And if he undresses you with his eyes and talks about your nice "assets" then feel free to roll your eyes and walk away. Some guys need to be reminded that they have to give respect to get it. So if we don't feel comfortable with the way you approach us, don't expect us to be friendly.

Ultimately you win some and you lose some, that's how this game is played. But it's better than wondering, "What if?"

However, I know that it can be hard to approach someone and know what to say. You don't want to appear aggressive, but you don't want to sound corny either. That's why the very popular (yet often ignored), "be yourself" really comes in handy. If someone catches your eye, just tell them. When you are physically attracted to someone, they instantly stand out in a crowd. It's important for women to take risks and put themselves on the line. Then maybe we'd have a better understanding of how difficult it can be for guys to be the first to approach. They may even be one of the few decent guys who does think you are beautiful and doesn't want to just get into your pants.

Both men and women have to realize their part, no matter what the role is. Girls, when you see someone you'd like to get to know, go for it. What do you have to lose? Nothing but your current social ignorance. It also shows that you are confident in yourself and secure enough to face rejection, if it happens. And guys, if you want to tell a girl she's beautiful, that's all you need to say. No pick-up lines necessary. If she is the type of girl you are hoping she is, she will smile and sincerely thank you. But don't keep your focus solely on her body image, even if that's your initial attraction. A women's body is beautiful of course, but beauty isn't just skin deep.

Ultimately you win some and you lose some, that's how this game is played. But it's better than wondering, "What if?" Women should learn that it's okay to go for something they want and it's also okay not to get it. There will always be something left to learn from it.

Is God authoritarian or critical?

The remaining 5.2 percent of those surveyed say they are atheists.

"Believers just don't see themselves the way the media and politicians, even their pastors, do," said a USA Today article. "These four Gods tell more about people's social, moral and political views and personal piety than the familiar categories of Protestant/Catholic/Jew or even red state/blue state."

Stephen J. Andrews, Old Testament, Hebrew and archaeology professor at Midwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, said surveys often simplify conclusions, and categories often represent extremes.

"This appears to be true of this survey," he said. "The trouble is that religious faith, which includes the human perception of deity, is far more complex and sophisticated."

The Bible presents a picture of a God who is somewhat of a paradox, one who is just, meting out punishment, but also benevolent, caring for people, he said.

"I wonder if there had been another mediating option between 'A' and 'B' if the survey results would be different. I think they would."

Warren Carter, New Testament professor at St. Paul School of Theology, wondered what role Scripture plays in forming people's views.

"It's interesting that 'B' is the closest to the emphasis of the New Testament writers, though aspects of 'A' are also present," he said. "Generally, views 'C' and 'D' are not prominent in the New Testament.

"This suggests that for some people the New Testament texts, along with other factors, are important in shaping their perceptions of God, while for others the experiences of their own lives and of what is happening in the world play a greater role in their images of God."

The survey says it's possible to look at demographic and religious factors of an individual and conclude which view of God that person is likely to hold.

For example, women tend to believe in a God who is more engaged in their lives (Types A and B) and men tend toward less engaged images (Type D). The majority of African-Americans (53.4 percent) believe in an Authoritarian God.

People with less education and lower incomes tend toward the more engaged images of God (Types A and B), while those with college degrees and incomes of more than $100,000 tend to believe in a Distant God or are atheists.

Geography also appeared to shape views: Easterners tend toward belief in a Critical God; Southerners, an Authoritarian God; Midwesterners, a Benevolent God; and West Coasters, a Distant God.

People with more engaged images of God (Types A and B) are more likely to attend church weekly and pray several times a day. God's anger (Type C) does little to inspire religious practice and participation.

Catholics, mainline Protestants and Jews tend to believe in a more Distant God, while evangelical Protestants and black Protestants tend to believe in a more Authoritarian God.

People who feel strongly that God is a "he" tend to believe in an Authoritarian God.

The Baylor survey is helpful because "you learn more about people's moral and political behavior if you know their image of God than almost any other measure," Baylor researcher Christopher Ilader told USA Today. "It turns out to be more powerful a predictor of social and political views than the usual markers of church attendance or belief in the Bible."

Dangermouse's Paris remix decidely not hot for audiences

BY CALVIN SON
OKLAHOMA DAILY (U. OKLAHOMA)

NORMAN, Okla.—It's cool to be a producer nowadays. No talent? No charm? No musical ability? Hook up with the right producer, and you can hear your own voice exploding from everywhere like confetti at a Flaming Lips concert.

Justin Timberlake, blond boy-band bum? Just mix in some Pharrell beats, and you've got a masterpiece. Nelly Furtado, pop princess? Add some Timbaland, and suddenly she's got enough street credibility to be knocking back 40s with Dre and Snoop.

Nobody demonstrates this better than Brian Burton, known to his fans as the eccentric beat-blender Danger Mouse. He's the man behind the newest Gorillaz, Gnarls Barkley, DANGERDOOM and even a track from the new Rapture album.

But DM's claim to fame was the "Grey Album," a remix album of Jay-Z's "Black Album" featuring chopped samples from the Beatles' "White Album." Love it, hate it or be unfamiliar with it — the "Grey Album" took the public's perception of the concept remix album to a whole new level.

So it wasn't any big surprise when the Internet squeaked in excitement with news about DM's collaboration with British prankster and artist Banksy in a project to remix the new Paris Hilton album "Paris."

A video on YouTube shows the duo doctoring photos from the CD insert to make Hilton appear nude and changing the titles to feature songs such as "Why Am I Famous," "What Have I Done," and "What Am I For." Text inside the booklet is printed like a ransom note to say things such as "Life wasn't meant to be fair," "Every CD you buy puts me even further out of your league," and "Race to the bottom of the pile!"

What's the best part? The duo reverse-shoplifted 500 copies of their project into various stores in the UK, leaving them for unsuspecting fans to buy and take home. Some listeners even said they preferred the remix album to the original. The "Buy It Now" price for one copy on eBay is currently $1,408.73. He could make Jay-Z's lyrics sound awesome, so even with Hilton's vocals, it has to be an awesome CD, right?

Wrong.

It's not even really a remix. It's one 40-minute track with a guitar loop that's about four seconds long. DM uses various Hilton clips from "The Simple Life," leaving listeners listening to the phrase "That's hot" almost as many times as Ol' Paris uttered curses during the game with Oregon.

After 16 minutes, DM finally introduces a breakdown that sounds like the Decemberists having a jam session. However, the mix soon returns to the same beat, the same guitar loop, the same "That's hot."

Obviously, the track was not intended to be taken as a cohesive album that stands on its own merit. The Hilton audio clips are cleverly juxtaposed, ranging from "My boobs look huge in this" to "The Laundromat is for people who can't afford to buy their own laundry machine and wash their own clothes … like in '40 Days and 40 Nights'?"

That's what it is," One critic even claims the mix is a criticism of Hilton in itself, displaying the brainless and repetitive qualities of modern pop music.

Genius or not, the track is a big letdown for fans who are expecting another clever song from DM. Even hardcore fans will have a hard time stomaching this album, which deserves more credit for its liner notes and novelty than its music. One sample repeated for 40 minutes? Come on, Danger Mouse. That's no good. That's not even hot.

Fresh read for pop

BY RYAN MURRAY
THE PITT NEWS (U. PITTSBURGH)

PITTSBURGH—Ironically, Chuck Klosterman IV has become part of the very pop culture that is the basis for his work. By analyzing all that is popular culture, he has become woven into the culture itself. His past few works have achieved critical acclaim, and one of them ("Sex, Drugs, and Cocoa Puffs") was featured on an episode of "The O.C." You can't get much more pop culture than that.

Unsurprisingly, Klosterman's new book is based entirely on his favorite subject. Yes indeed, "A Decade of Curious People and Dangerous Ideas" has almost as many pop-culture references as a VIH countdown show. What is surprising, however, is that "Decade" manages to stay fresh and viciously humorous, using material that Klosterman has used many times before.

"Decade" is broken down into three different sections: "Things that are True," "Things that Might be True" and "Something that Isn't True at All." The entire novel is read by Klosterman himself, which is both good and bad. He is able to put in the emotion he undoubtedly envisioned while writing, but listeners may quickly tire of the sound of his voice.

"Things that are True" is the section made up of Klosterman's profiles and trend stories that are undoubtedly true. The section includes profiles of Val Kilmer and Steve Nash and stories about McDonald's, '70s rock band nostalgia cruises and gothic kids at Disneyland, but it is the profile of Britney Spears that makes the listener both blackout from constant laughter and actually think about what makes Britney Spears who she is.

Perhaps the most memorable aspect of Klosterman's interview with Spears takes place during a photo shoot in which she is being photographed sans pants. He explains that the scene unfolding before him is the secret dream of most boys old enough to understand what pants cover, and he feels like a member of an elite fraternity to be able to witness it.

However, he soon realizes, the photo shoot commences behind a partition — only a select few will be able to join the selective fraternity of "the secret garden," and he is not one of them.

Klosterman's profile of Spears soon moves from an image of her without pants to a questioning of what makes her who she is. He says that she has become so involved with projecting herself as one person that she can no longer remember who she once was. In short, she can not distinguish between the real her and the famous person she projects to the public. It is an interesting point, one of the many Klosterman raises during this section of the novel.

The second part of "Decade," "Things that Might be True," is entirely devoted to Klosterman's opinions, theories and questions relating to life in general. Extremely ironic and humorous, the topics covered in this section almost always leave the listener perplexed in some way or another.

If you had the power to stop a bear from attacking your friend but as a result, it would always rain wherever you went for the rest of your life, would you? This is the first question Klosterman poses to the listener. Klosterman then goes on to list reasons why people would give their various answers to the question, which leaves the listener wondering which he would choose, bear or rain?

The last story of the section doesn't seem to fit into the theme of the rest, but it is just too ridiculous to leave out. Klosterman describes going shopping for bulletproof vests with 50 Cent, and how he couldn't find a vest that looked good on him. So instead of a bulletproof vest, 50 Cent buys 10 pairs of leather pants.

At the end of the story, they get into a car and Klosterman shoots 50 Cent. Nothing makes sense about this story; it certainly isn't real and it doesn't pose a question or theory. So what is the point of including it? Because it's hilarious, that's why.

"Something that Isn't True at All," the last section of "Decade," is Klosterman's first piece composed entirely of fiction. There is a small introduction to the piece, which provides a bit of preparation before the listener is thrown into the story. The storyline is hard to follow unless one pays close attention, and there are no asides or footnotes. However, like the rest of the novel, it is a humorous take on pop culture.

In "A Decade of Curious People and Dangerous Ideas," Chuck Klosterman attempts to shed some light on what it's like to live in modern America. Klosterman is able to accurately portray the dazed and confused society in which we live and simultaneously inject just the right amount of humor and cynicism.

'Linguistic fireworks' for Treuer

(the contents of which we are left to guess) that startles him into an awareness: He has never been in love. He begins to notice the lovely young Campaspe, who toils alongside him at a huge bunker that houses library overstock. But now he must learn how to read her and be read. "She needs the story of his life," Treuer writes, "but as an Indian, he is reluctant to give up that sovereign part of himself."

The story of Himaadiz and Eta, by contrast, is a rip-roaring valentine of a thing, jampacked with enemy evil-doings, narrow escapes, woodsy trysts and sigh-inducing embraces. The young lovers, foundlings who have found each other, are woozy with expectation: "Eta could not stop gazing into Bimaadiz's eyes. They were much darker than she thought — the pupil and iris were almost the same color — and they were alive with life as they jumped first from one of her own eyes and then to the other and back."

Said Treuer about the novel: "There's a kind of sentimentality, which Apelles head-butts and confronts head on, toward culture in literature — ironically, nostalgia for a past that nobody has. It sort of takes a vice and tries to turn it into a virtue. It's sentimental about emotion, but not about culture or history or place or reservation."

Wandering into the tricks territory of authorial identity and experience, it probably wouldn't surprise anyone to know that the author himself was crazy in love when he began to write the novel.

He and his wife, Gretchen Potter, of the Tonawanda Band of Seneca, locked eyes at a reading at State University of New York in Brockport. After several hundred dollars' worth of phone calls, many-page proclamations of love, a medal-testing canoe trip and a dinner of grilled venison loin, fennel potatoes and wild rice, the two were married.

"I began 'Apelles' as we began," said Treuer, "on our honeymoon in 2001."

"We were married in 2000," she said.

"2001, you freak," he said laughing and grabbing her for a nibble on the cheek.

Treuer isn't backing down from his New Criticism arguments, but he worries, as do his parents, about hurt feelings, and says he hopes the novel doesn't get eclipsed by controversy over the essays.

Erdrich, for one, "is not happy," he said, declining to elaborate. "I feel about her as a friend, and I know she's very private."

Of her work, he said: "I don't think 'Love Medicine' stands up as a book about Ojibwe life. I think it stands up as one of the best novels of the 20th century. That's why we should read it."

White, a writer and friend who met Treuer at Princeton University, said: "I think, David is a double threat — an original critic gifted with vast erudition, keen analysis and a spirit of the polemical and a novelist who is resourceful, elegant and passionate. In 'Dr. Apelles,' he has written a postmodernist book that nonetheless manages to be a real, engrossing love story.

"As for his criticism, I think it's very brave on his part to reject the mystical notion that Native Americans are following some 'native' formula of narration."

UMass comes home to face Seawolves

dent — have been Brown's primary weapons on the ground.

The three have combined to give the Minutemen 428 rushing yards this season.

Last week in its 62-7 blowout loss to New Hampshire, Stony Brook surrendered 417 yards on the ground to the Wildcats. But Brown doesn't put much in that performance, saying the Seawolves will come ready to play Saturday.

"Last week is last week. I'm sure they're back there trying to clean all those things up," he said. "I can't worry about that. You'd better wake up and smell the roses, pay attention and take care of your own business, because if you don't, usually bad things are going to happen."

Baylark is of course the featured back who broke the 100-yard plateau for the first time last weekend on the road. He's a perennial 1,000-yard rusher and he can be depended on to give the Minutemen quality carries.

Lawrence and Washington have each been used in certain situations. Lawrence — the shifter of the two — is a good receiver out of the backfield and has been used on screens this season. He's caught seven passes this season to go along with 56 rushing yards.

Washington's role has come in short-yardage and power situations. He has 72 yards and two short touchdown runs.

"I think when you have depth, it gives you that opportunity [to keep players fresh]," Brown said. "In the long run it makes you a better football team. You want to give the guy his touches and his carries, but at the same time there are other guys who can play too."

With running the ball comes ball control. When a team runs the ball well, they are able to control the clock and ultimately the game. That has become increasingly more important with the faster games college football is playing this season.

UMass came out on top of the time-of-possession battle in two of its first three games. It controlled the ball for 33:07 against Navy and 38:07 against Villanova.

"That's part of the deal [of the running game] When you can beat Navy 33-27 and beat Villanova 38-24, you like your chances," Brown said. "Any time you're on the field with the ball and the defense is on the bench chilling out that usually means good things. Most of the time that's a good sign for your football team."

Listorti learns system quickly before suiting up for practice on Tuesday.

"It got to a point [at Rutgers] where the future wasn't going to be too bright. So I definitely needed to change things up. And I thought [UMass] would be a great place to start."

So far, the UMass jersey has agreed with him. Listorti corralled three balls in UMass' 21-20 loss to Navy on Sept. 9, including a 10-yard reception for his first career catch.

Junior tight end Brad Listorti caught his first touchdown pass for the Minutemen on Saturday.

At Villanova last Saturday, Listorti caught four passes — one in a key situation — for 49 yards. At the start of the fourth quarter, the Minutemen led by just a field goal, 24-21. Coen was in the midst of a scoring drive and had taken the offense to Villanova's 7-yard line before UMass ran into a fourth-and-1 situation.

Brown took a chance and got the first down, before encountering another fourth-down scenario at the goal-line. The run was stopped by the Wildcat defense on the previous down, so a play-action was called from the sideline.

Coen faked the handoff to Baylark and pulled up to find Listorti wide open in the end zone. The throw was down and slightly away from the body, but Listorti delicately wrapped it up for his first touchdown, one that essentially sealed the game for UMass.

"That felt good to help my team and it felt good for myself, too," Listorti said. "Once you get a couple of catches under your belt you get that confidence going."

Both Coen and Brown believe Listorti — once defenses start paying more attention to him — can not only burn teams down the middle of the field, but can open things up for the athletic receiving corps of Brandon London, Rasheed Rancher, and J.J. Moore.

"I always tell our corners that if a tight end gets behind you, you're fired," joked Brown. "But [Brad] can literally get behind [the cornerbacks] because he can flat out run. He's really an atypical tight end in this league."

"I definitely saw this fast start coming," Listorti said. "Because I really thought that I could help this team out and make plays at the tight end position."

Like a point guard with his/her teammates, a quarterback needs to develop a comfort level with his receivers to be truly effective. But, despite having just three games under their belts together, Coen and Listorti seem to be connecting regularly.

The big tight end had nothing but praise for the UMass gunner.

"Liam is a really accurate quarterback with a lot of potential," Listorti said. "He's got a big arm and he's pretty accurate, too."

"We just have to keep working," Coen said. "I just have to keep my eye out for him because he gets open. He's learning the system very quickly."

It looks like he's got the drift.

Irish tabloid angers Woods

Still, running links to what purports to be nude photos of a guy's wife crosses the line, even in a culture obsessed with the famous and beautiful.

"I don't think it shows too much about your profession," Phil Mickelson told a journalist.

Actually, that profession has helped make Woods much of what he is today, treating him for the most part with respect and even awe for what he has done on the golf course over the last 10 years. For the most part, the press has left Woods' private life alone, even when things became juicy when he took up with Nordegren, then a Swedish nanny.

But the people at the Dubliner apparently felt the biggest sports event in Ireland's history was too big to let go without making a splash of their own. The magazine didn't stop with Woods' wife, but went on to make comments about the physical attributes of the wives of Chad Campbell, Jim Furyk and David Toms in what it later said was an attempted parody of the saucy tabloids.

"Most American golfers are married to women who cannot keep their clothes on in public," the magazine wrote. "Is it too much to ask that they leave them at home for the Ryder Cup?"

On a day when the weather was so bad players on both teams made only perfunctory appearances on the course, it didn't take long for the great wife expose to become the talk of this Ryder Cup.

Woods himself brought it into play, in an odd statement meant to express his dismay with the Irish magazine and express his delight with the Irish people. He rambled a bit, but the message seemed to be this: Magazine bad, people good.

Of course, every other player had to be asked about it, leading to some interesting exchanges, despite the best efforts of European Tour officials to steer the discussion elsewhere.

The whole thing had to horrify the Irish, whose prodigious efforts to host the Ryder Cup have so far been swamped by bad weather and bad taste. Not only is their golf course under water, but fans logging onto the Internet are searching for photos that have nothing to do with guys in hats swinging golf clubs.

Could it get any worse? Yes, and it didn't take long.

Turns out Woods loves the Irish but not their national drink, which is so prevalent here it seems even babies are weaned on it.

"I don't drink Guinness," Woods said.

At least he was honest about it. Which, come to think of it, is more than can be said about the Dubliner.

Duquesne attempts to return to normalcy

By Alan Robinson
Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — With two teammates still lying in hospital beds, Duquesne University's basketball team tried to return to normalcy Wednesday, three days after five players were shot during a terrifying outburst of gunfire that followed a school dance.

The players went to class, lifted weights and were scheduled to work out later in the day.

On Tuesday, police arrested Brandon Haynes, 18, of Penn Hills, on five counts of criminal attempted homicide. William Holmes, 18, also of Penn Hills, turned himself in Wednesday, police said. He was to be arraigned on charges of attempted homicide, aggravated assault, criminal conspiracy and weapons-related offenses.

Even as team members tried to return to their routines, their thoughts were with their hospitalized teammates.

The Dukes were encouraged that junior forward Sam Ashuilu, the player most badly injured during the early Sunday morning shootings, was taking what coach Ron Everhart called the first "baby steps" of his hoped-for recovery.

"He's fighting like hell," Everhart said.

Ashuilu, who has one bullet and fragments of another in his head, has squeezed teammates' hands during their frequent visits at Mercy Hospital, and he seemed to respond by their words of encouragement. The 23-year-old Ashuilu remained in critical condition but had a restful night following two difficult nights.

He was shot barely three weeks after arriving on campus following a circuitous journey to an NCAA Division I basketball program that took the Toronto, Ontario, resident through two high schools, a prep school and two junior colleges.

Stuard Baldonado, a junior forward shot in the back and left arm, had a bullet removed from a patch of muscle just below the skin in his back and already has begun his rehabilitation. He could be released from Mercy Hospital within a couple of days.

Baldonado, 21, was able to speak by phone to his parents, who live on a small island off the coast of Colombia, and an aunt flew in from Germany to sit bedside. Teammates said he was walking, laughing and in much better spirits.

Kojo Mensah, a junior guard who went through an unfriendly departure from Siena before transferring to Duquesne, was released from UPMC Presbyterian on Tuesday night. Mensah, 21, was shot in an arm and shoulder.

Some players were receiving counseling. Several players have had trouble sleeping since the shootings.

Duquesne announced Wednesday that Brittany Jones, the 19-year-old Penn Hills resident accused of helping a group of young men get into the Black Student Union party Saturday night, had been suspended from school. She was arrested Monday on charges of reckless endangerment, carrying a firearm without a license and criminal conspiracy.

Jones, who transferred to Duquesne from hurricane-ravaged Xavier University of Louisiana last year, was suspended for multiple violations of the student code.

"The university community is stunned and deeply disappointed to learn that a student may have been involved in this incident that has brought such injury and heartache to our campus," Duquesne president Charles J. Dougherty said in a statement issued by the school.

According to a criminal complaint, Jones helped six men — several of whom she knew were carrying guns — to gain admission to the dance on Duquesne's campus. Students from several nearby schools, including the University of Pittsburgh, also attended, but those in Jones' group were not college students.

Shea furious with UM's overtime loss

held the lead three different times during the course of the day only to have Dartmouth come storming back to take a 4-3 lead late in the second half.

UMass tied the game with under nine minutes left to play off a goal from sophomore forward Lauren Gillespie. It was Gillespie's second goal of the night and her team-leading eighth on the season.

The Minutwomen were able to fend off a tenacious attack from the Big Green in the first half, forcing five penalty corners. Two of those penalty corners came in the first six minutes of action.

Despite the early pressure, the Maroon and White stood its ground and headed into halftime clinging onto a 2-1 victory. Junior midfielder Kara Murphy and Gillespie collected the goals while the two assists came off the stick of freshman forward Amy Novak. For Novak, it was her first points of the season.

The Minutewomen's lead entering the second half quickly evaporated. Bildner fired a shot past Letourneau to tie the game at 2-2. But the Maroon and White came charging back when King blasted a shot that found the left side of the cage, making it 3-2 in favor of the Minutwomen.

Dartmouth would hammer home the next two goals past Letourneau to take its first lead of the game at 4-3. Gillespie's late goal to tie the game would be the last time the Minutwomen celebrated on Wednesday, as Dartmouth would close the door on the Maroon and White in overtime.

"We were passing well and we were doing what was easy," Shea said. "In the second half we stopped doing the easy things and began to try to go through their defense instead of making the simple passes. We beat ourselves today. Dartmouth did not beat us. I'm the most angry at this loss because it should have never got to this point."

Bailey interception remains with Brady

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. — As hard as he might try, Tom Brady can't escape reminders of one of his most damaging plays and disappointing games.

Eight months ago, the two-time Super Bowl MVP's pass was picked off by Denver's Champ Bailey, who returned it 100 yards, a play that became an enduring image of New England's rare playoff failure.

"I've talked about that a bunch the last six months," Brady said Wednesday, brushing aside a question about how often he's replayed the game in his mind. "So I'm looking forward to this week and see what we can accomplish."

The venue has changed — the Patriots are home Sunday night against the Broncos — but the challenge is the same. If New England doesn't reduce the five turnovers it committed in the 27-13 loss last Jan. 14 that ended its 10-game playoff winning streak, Brady may have to deal with reminders of another loss to Denver.

There already have been plenty. The teams have played five games against each other in the past five seasons and the Broncos have won four of them. Brady has completed more than 57 percent of his passes in just one of those games, while throwing eight touchdown passes with seven interceptions and seven sacks.

"They have some playmakers [defensively] and I think they're fast and aggressive and they play physical," Brady said. "We've gotten behind them a bunch in these last bunch of games that we've lost to them."

But the Patriots can be successful even when Brady's far from his best. They're 2-0 this season even though he's completed just 50 percent of his passes for an average of 191.5 yards per game with three touchdowns and two interceptions. The offense is led by a strong running game with Corey Dillon and rookie Laurence Maroney behind a solid line.

The Patriots lost starting wide receivers Deion Branch and David Givens to other teams. Four of the five players now at that position are in their first season with the team.

The passing attack improved in last Sunday's 24-17 win at the New York Jets, but Brady knows it takes time to develop the chemistry he enjoyed with Branch, a Patriot for four seasons before holding out and being traded to Seattle.

Now he has to get used to his new receivers.

"I'm only as good as they are and they're only as good as I am so we're in this together," he said. "Is it frustrating? Sure, it's frustrating for everybody, coaches, players, fans."

On Sunday, Brady will face a defense that hasn't allowed a touchdown in splitting its two games and a cornerback, Bailey, who leads the Broncos with 19 tackles.

At least the Patriots should be motivated by trying to avenge the loss that ended their hopes for a record third straight Super Bowl championship, right?

"Not at all," defensive end Richard Seymour said. "We're looking to go 3-0 this week. That's our focus."

Bailey even caused trouble for Brady before joining the Broncos. In 2003, he intercepted the Patriots quarterback in a 20-17 win by the Washington Redskins.

But Brady must concentrate on the entire defense, especially when all 11 members move up to the line of scrimmage on a blitz.

"There's a bunch of teams that are doing it now," he said. "We really didn't think the Jets would be doing it, but they did and we handled it well in a few situations.

"I know that's part of Denver's package," Brady added. "Whatever they throw at you, you've got to make sure you handle it because if they bring it and they get you, they're going to keep bringing it."

The Broncos already have hurt the Patriots with that formation. It's the one they lined up in when the Patriots had the ball at the Denver 5-yard line, trailing just 10-6 in the third quarter of last season's playoff game.

Bailey then broke off to cover Troy Brown, intercepted the pass, and sped down the left sideline until tight end Benjamin Watson, coming at a sharp angle from Bailey's right, smacked him and knocked the ball out of bounds at the 1-yard line.

"I knew what they were doing" before he threw, Brady said, facing another question about that play. "I rolled to the right and I was trying to throw it over his head. I just didn't get enough on it and he made me pay."

2006 Ryder Cup set to begin

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

STRATFAN, Ireland — There are times when the Americans just can't win, such as the Ryder Cup.

And sometimes, they don't even have to wait for the matches to get under way.

The weather turned so nasty Wednesday morning, with 40 mph gusts that toppled a few trees and brought the rain sideways, that The K Club was closed to the public for nearly three hours. U.S. captain Tom Lehman sent his players back to bed, and only later did both teams believe it best to play for thousands of spectators who eventually got onto the course.

But it was no time to take golf seriously, not with the wind blowing the ball all over the place.

Lehman fulfilled a prediction he made in February by creating what was believed to be the first "twelve-some" game in Ryder Cup history, his entire team playing nine holes on a gray, miserable afternoon.

But there was a twist.

They worked on their short game, starting each hole from about 120 yards away. The gallery wasn't aware of this, so when Tiger Woods, Phil Mickelson and the rest of the Americans walked from the fourth green, past the fifth tee and kept marching down the middle of the fairway, the Ryder Cup got its first dose of booing.

"You don't give a damn about Ireland's public," shouted one man behind the tee, and hundreds of others nodded.

Another man asked Jim Furyk to stop for a picture. He walked over to man's wife, put his arm on her shoulder and posed with a smile.

Walking back toward the fairway, Furyk said, "I guess we're just the ugly Americans."

Lehman later asked for a mulligan.

He realized his squad should have performed at least on the first tee, where the grandstands were packed with people. And when he caught up with his team on the seventh hole, he told them to tee off on No. 9, the only drives they hit all day.

"We walk down the first hole to about 120 yards short of the green and started from there, and kind of left everybody sitting in the stands by the first tee waiting," Lehman said. "That was a mistake. We should have hit a tee shot at least on the first hole. To all of those fans left waiting, I apologize. That was my mistake."

There's always something at the Ryder Cup.

Woods riled the English fans at The Belfry four years ago when captain Curtis Strange allowed him to practice at 6 a.m., as he normally does, finishing about the time fans were just showing up.

Last time outside Detroit, the Americans were criticized by their own gallery for not signing autographs during the practice rounds. There was a policy against autographs, which the Europeans gladly violated with hopes of winning favor on foreign soil, and it worked.

Lehman's apology was sincere, but he had no regrets about what unfolded on The K Club.

Furyk recently described the Americans as looking "constipated" when they get to the Ryder Cup, but not on this day. Asked to describe what kind of game it was, Scott Verplank replied, "Fun."

It was quite a scene, the 12 Americans and their caddies on the same green, all dressed in black rain suits (an appropriate color).

Each player put $100 into the pot on each hole, and formed teams for an alternate-shot match that started within about pitching wedge range except on the par 3s. In case of a tie, there was a chip-off on each hole to determine the winner.

Verplank and David Toms were formidable, although don't read too much into that pairing.

Verplank won a chip-off on the third by pitching from a knoll beyond the green, over a bunker to within a foot. On the next hole, the par-5 fourth, the players started from 240 yards away, and Woods, Furyk and Brett Wetterich were the only players to reach in two. No matter. Toms chipped in for eagle and the other guys missed their putts.

The drama came at the par-4 seventh, a peninsula green.

Not only did Lehman have them stop short of the pond, they had to skip the ball off the water and over the rocks rimming the green, similar to a tradition during practice at the Masters.

Verplank hit a masterful shot that skipped off the water, over the rocks and hanged hard enough into the slight slope that it rolled about 20 feet away from the pin. J.J. Henry and Zach Johnson hit shots that plopped and sank. Chad Campbell was last to hit, and he skipped it over and up to within 3 feet. Wetterich, his partner, knocked in the putt with the entire team watching.

Chris DiMarco gets into the Ryder Cup, even in practice.

He won a chip-off from the bunker on No. 8 by blasting out to 15 feet, while Wetterich left his in the sand. It must have been the first skin for DiMarco, because he instinctively raised and shook his fist, looking at the fans for some cheers, not realizing they didn't care.

But there was banter along the way, even with the caddies.

Mike "Fluff" Cowan was walking to the eighth tee when he spotted an Irish teenager wearing a New York Yankees cap. Cowan has roots in New England, and he couldn't resist.

"Name me one player on the New York Yankees. Just one," he challenged him.

The kid shrugged his shoulder and Cowan walked away in mock disgust until the kid returned the challenge.

"Name me a Kerry footballer," he said.

"Ian Coughlin," Cowan replied, choosing two common names from this part of the world.

Then they headed off to the practice range, where the Europeans worked quietly. There wasn't much time left, for the black-tie gala dinner was to start at 7:30 p.m.

"We took a day that could have been not a whole lot of fun out there — grinding it out, putting for pars and bogeys and not making very many birdies — to having a good time," Toms said. "That's what we've been stressing to each other. Enjoy the competition, and I thought we did some things where the fans seemed to be enjoying what we were doing.

"Plus, I won some money," Toms said. "So it was good."

Tom Lehman is the captain for Team USA in the 2006 Ryder Cup. The U.S. last won the tournament in 1999 when it was held in Brookline, Mass.

Minutemen return home

UMass back at McGuirk to face Stony Brook

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Through the early stages of the season, the Massachusetts football team has faced its share of tight situations.

Last Saturday, the Minutemen (2-1, 1-0 Atlantic 10) found themselves down seven points with only 41 seconds off the clock. Then, when it seemed it was in control late, Villanova came back and narrowed the margin to three points.

Two weeks ago at Navy, the entire game was a tight situation. The Minutemen and Midshipmen were close the entire game with the outcome amounting to the visitors losing by a single point.

Entering this weekend's game against Stony Brook (0-3) at McGuirk Alumni Stadium, UMass coach Don Brown said he's been impressed by his team's performance under pressure.

"We will not panic with adversity," he said. "We're just going to grind it out and keep playing football. There's been some adversity [and] it just seemed very calm on the sidelines.

"I think our senior leadership has been extremely solid to this point. I don't think we've cracked in any scenario that I can see."

Although he says his team has played well with their backs against the wall, Brown says his team still has a lot to work on.

"I don't think we're totally clean with our execution in the run game yet," Brown said. "The run game is so technical that it takes time to clean that up."

This weekend against the Seawolves might be the perfect opportunity for UMass' three-headed monster to emerge. All season, senior Steve Baylark, junior Matt Lawrence, and Tim Washington — who is a graduate stu-

Listorti finds right fit in Maroon and White

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

It happens a lot in college sports.

A backup isn't getting enough playing time on a certain team and feels that he/she can contribute elsewhere.

Fortunately for UMass coach Don Brown, his team was on the receiving end of this particular transfer.

Tight end Brad Listorti is one of four Rutgers University transfers on the Massachusetts football team. The 6-foot-5, 245-pound end has made an immediate and expected impact on UMass' offense this season.

He caught seven passes for 79 yards in the first three games — one for a touchdown — and quarterback Liam Coen has added a big target in the middle to his already potent receiving corps.

"We have bigger tight ends than [Brad], but he's versatile," Coen said. "It not only helps to have him in short-yardage situations because [the defense] forgets about him, he helps us spread the field because he's a tight end that can run a 4.5 [in the 40-yard dash]."

When Listorti came to preseason camp in August, Brown knew him through recruiting and had an idea about his talent. But he saw some things that he didn't expect on that day.

"The thing that eye-popped," Brown started, "was on testing day when we showed up in camp and [Brad] had an outstanding bench press in excess of 350 [pounds]. And he ran a 4.5."

Listorti is broad and tall. Strapping the pads on his bulky frame just adds to his size on the football field — the build of a linebacker with the speed of a receiver.

"When you have a guy that can stretch the middle of the field in play-action and be a solid blocker, those guys are hard to find," Brown said. "They're just difficult to find at any level. He was a no-brainer to take."

With the graduation of a productive tight end in Mike Douglas, the Minutemen were vacant at tight end with no underclassmen to turn to. When Listorti came calling after sitting on the bench behind an NFL prospect at Rutgers, Brown answered.

"I think I really looked at it as an opportunity," Listorti said

Banks hands UM its second loss

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

When Bryan Hogan's shot in the 90th minute was stopped at the goal line just inside the post, the crowd at Rudd Field gasped.

Three days after the Massachusetts men's soccer team (6-2-1) dropped its first contest of the season to Vermont, it lost a second game to another New England rival, New Hampshire (5-2-2).

The Minutemen finished their five-game homestand at 3-2, and will go on the road Saturday to play Charlotte.

"They outplayed us, they worked harder than us," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "Those things are our bread and butter as far as how we're going to be successful. You let a team outwork us, and it's going to be a long afternoon."

UMass fell to the Wildcats 1-0 on a goal by New Hampshire freshman Chris Banks in the 54th minute. The goal was Banks' sixth of the year in just his second start this season.

The play developed suddenly and seemed to catch both the UMass defense and goalkeeper Zack Simmons off guard, as Banks sent a blast into the right side of the net past a diving Simmons.

"I couldn't see exactly what happened," Koch said. "[Banks] got the shot off quickly and [the ball] was by Zack before I knew what happened."

"It was a great shot by him. It was a rifle," Simmons said. "He just placed it hard and low. There were two guys free at the top of the 18. One of them got [the ball], took a touch and it was a good shot."

UMass was on its heels for most of the game as New Hampshire dominated offensively in the first half. The Minutemen were out-shot 5-0 in the first frame.

"I don't think we played well in the first half," Koch said. "In the second half, once we were down a goal, we started to play."

At halftime, Koch gathered the whole team in the corner of the field and spoke to them about picking up their play for the second half.

"We got balls behind them, and we created chances," Koch said. "It was like a different team. In the second half, I thought we played better. But why did we half to go down a goal to play better? That's something we have to sort out before we play on Saturday."

UMass evened out the shot count in the second half, sending six balls toward the net, as opposed to New Hampshire's three, but five of those shots came once the team was behind.

The Minutemen had a number of scoring opportunities late in the game, but were not able to tie the game up for a possible overtime period.

"I give them [New Hampshire] a lot of credit defensively," Koch said. "They made it hard for us to play. They didn't give us a lot of time and space, and they made it hard. In a 90-minute game, if you're only playing 35 minutes of it, it makes it a lot harder to win."

"They're not a better team than us," Simmons said. "Once they scored the goal, they made it very difficult for us to play. I feel like maybe we were the better team, maybe not. I don't know, but it's a tough loss."

After the game, Simmons was seen with a bag of ice wrapped around his left ankle. He said he rolled his ankle slightly during the second half of Wednesday's loss, but that the ice was only precautionary. He also said he will start Saturday's game against Charlotte.

As expected, freshman forward Michael Jejna did not play in the loss after injuring his right knee Sunday against Vermont. Originally, Koch intended to return him to the lineup this Saturday, but he has now delayed Jejna's return.

"I do not expect him [to play] in Charlotte," Koch said. "But we're pretty confident he'll be ready for next weekend."

Sophomore midfielder Mike DeSantis is tied for second on the team in goals with two on the year.

Minutewomen lose heart-breaker in OT

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts field hockey team finished its season-long eight-game road trip on a sour note last night, losing in overtime to Dartmouth (1-4, 0-2 Ivy League) 5-4 at Scully-Fahey Field.

Dartmouth's leading scorer, Lizzie Bildner, wasted no time in picking up her hat trick with a goal just 33 seconds into overtime, propelling the Big Green to their first victory of the season. Bildner was able to blow by UMass (2-6) defenders down the left side of the field and then fired a shot past junior goalkeeper Becky Letourneau, sealing the Minutewomen's fate.

For UMass, the loss continues what is now a three-game losing streak.

"They had an interception and we lost the loose ball to Dartmouth," UMass coach Patty Shea said on the overtime goal. "We played horrible defense in overtime and our goalkeeper came out to stop the ball when she should have stayed in the cage. I was disappointed with her decision. They took advantage of our silly mistake."

Junior goalkeeper Becky Letourneau allowed five goals and made six saves in the loss.

The Minutewomen will try to put the heart-breaking defeat behind them when they host the No. 10 Connecticut Huskies on Saturday afternoon at Garber Field. It will be UMass' first home game of the season.

The Maroon and White was without the services of one of its biggest offense threats for the overtime period — sophomore forward Erin Parker — after an injury early in the second half forced her to sit out the remainder of the contest.

"Erin Parker is one of our best players, maybe one of the best players in the country," Shea said. "She probably would have played in the overtime."

The Minutewomen had a golden opportunity to prevent the game from going into overtime when they received a penalty corner with three seconds remaining in regulation. Junior forward Rachel Mervine took the penalty corner and got the ball to freshman midfielder Cher King. King was able to get the shot off, but Dartmouth's Ashley Heist made a crucial save, forcing the game into overtime.

Last night's contest witnessed multiple momentum swings. UMass

Woods upset over photographs of his wife

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

STRAFFAN, Ireland—It's not always easy being Tiger Woods. We found that out on a miserable day when the wind was howling, rain was blowing sideways, and it seemed like half the Irish Sea had been dumped on the golf course.

Just the kind of day many in Ireland like to spend comfortably positioned in front of a cozy bar with a pint of Guinness in hand.

Not Woods. The best player in the world always has been more of a water and Gatorade kind of guy, anyway, and the idea of him quaffing a few with the boys in a pub is laughable.

So were the pictures the Dubliner magazine claimed to have found of his wife, but Woods apparently didn't get that joke.

Then again, it's hard to find humor in a magazine when you open it and find links to what were purported to be topless pictures of the woman you love inside.

"Ryder Cup filth for Ireland," the headline crowed.

The pictures, of course, were not of Elin Nordegren. The magazine said as much later when it admitted it was all just in fun, a good way to have a laugh.

Some humor. Probably sounded awfully funny when the magazine's editor and his buddies were planning it down at Blarney's corner pub.

It didn't sound all that funny to Woods, who was so upset he made an early trip to the press tent just to defend his wife.

"My wife, we're in it together. We're a team and we do things as a team and I care about her with all my heart," Woods said.

It was a rare public showing of sentiment by Woods, who guards his private life so jealously it was big news when he went out to dinner with the four American Ryder Cup rookies last month.

He's not the kind of guy who is going to invite a camera crew down to his Florida mansion for a peek into the way he lives. The big events of his life, from his marriage to the funeral of his father, are usually held as far from the prying eye of the press and public as possible.

The price of celebrity can sometimes be high. Woods acknowledged it earlier this year when he talked about how it's hard not to be able to go out in public.

See TIGER on page 10

Tiger Woods has won 12 major championships and 63 titles worldwide. He will pair with Jim Furyk in this weekend's Ryder Cup.

Northeast blood supply declines

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

The American Red Cross Blood Services, Northeast Division issued an urgent statement yesterday regarding the status of the blood supply throughout Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Vermont and Connecticut.

"During September, blood inventories have declined by 3,000 pints, leading to cuts in hospital shipments of up to 50 percent," said Donna M. Morrissey, spokesperson for the American Red Cross Blood Services, Northeast Division. "This shortfall comes on the heels of a comparable decline in donations in August. Currently we are unable to meet most hospital standing orders and are asking for everyone's help to turn this critical situation around."

According to Red Cross, blood supplies in the Northeast Division are at less than a day's supply for most blood types. With other parts of the country also experiencing shortages, imports from other Red Cross regions has also declined. The Red Cross has notified the approximately 200 hospitals and medical centers within the Northeast Division, alerting them of the shortage.

Red Cross estimates that 2000 units of blood must be collected each day to meet the basic needs of hospitals throughout New England.

According to Irwin Gross, M.D., Medical Director of Transfusion Services at Eastern Maine Medical Center,

"The state of the region's blood supply has impacted Eastern Maine Medical Center's ability to overstock and respond to neighboring hospitals' emergencies."

The American Red Cross works with selected medical centers throughout New England as overstock hospitals which, in turn, act as local distribution points for surrounding smaller hospitals.

Donated blood is used to help trauma patients, transplant recipients, and those receiving treatment for life-threatening illnesses. In the United States, blood is needed for transfusion every two seconds.

Blood donors must be 17 or older, weigh 110 pounds or more and be in generally good health.

Possible donors are urged to call 1-800-GIVE-LIFE to make an appointment to give "the Gift of Life" or for more information. Walk-in donors are also welcome. Positive ID is required at the time of donation and a complete list of blood drives is available online at www.newenglandblood.org (or www.bloodct.org).

The mission of the American Red Cross, Northeast Division is to partner with the community to provide a safe and adequate blood supply for patients at over 200 transfusing hospitals and acute care facilities. The Red Cross relies entirely on volunteer blood donors to meet the transfusion needs of patients throughout New England.

Students debate on early admission program

By Chris Hynes
Collegian Correspondent

Harvard University announced its groundbreaking decision to scrap its early action program due to the disadvantage it was presenting for the university's low income and middle class applicants during the college application process.

While the policy was spiked at Harvard, causing reaction from students and administrators, the University of Massachusetts took a different route, establishing an early action program.

The policy, which will go into effect starting in 2008, will set a universal deadline of Jan. 1 for all Harvard hopefuls, replacing the current method which allows high school seniors to apply twice, once in the late fall for early action, and then a final time several weeks later at the regular deadline.

Harvard, one of the most prestigious private schools in the country, is making the move in hopes that others will follow the trend and eliminate a portion of the application procedure that many school officials feel is doing more harm than good.

Many feel that early action puts those from less fortunate backgrounds at a disadvantage because some universities require the prospective student to accept their offer without the chance to review financial aid packages from other universities. Harvard's early action program however does not require its students to make a firm commitment immediately.

Conversely, UMass recently began its own early action program this fall. The program requires high school seniors to apply by Nov. 1, receiving their notification in the mail by the middle of December, and calls for a commitment by May 1. During its inaugural year the program made up approximately 15 percent of the class of 2010 said Director of Admissions Kevin Kelly.

Kelly doesn't necessarily agree with the line of thought that early action gives an unfair advantage to the wealthy, although there are certain students he does believe benefit from the process.

"Early action does favor the well prepared student," Kelly said. "Students focused on UMass Amherst or other universities can definitely benefit from early action."

A new policy at UMass allows high school students to apply early admission. Harvard University recently announced that it would do away with its early admission policy.

Harvard's decision to halt its program doesn't seem to affect UMass' own policy, however the rest of the country's universities may have their own opinions.

"Each institution will have to make its own decision for what's best for their own institution," Kelly said.

Some of these institutions have already fallen in line, most notably another elite Ivy League school, Princeton University on Monday.

Stress is another factor that the Ivy League universities feel they are alleviating by eliminating early action, yet Kelly, along with some students at UMass hold the opinion that early action can help lower stress for those who find out their collegiate destinations early.

Senior Jamie White, an early action applicant at Fitchburg State who chose UMass said, "The extra time to think made it easier for me to make a decision."

"Overall, applying early decreased my stress," said sophomore Sam Haller, who was rejected by George Washington University after applying for early action. "The rejection allowed me to make my aim more realistic for my other options."

Along with the positive aspects of early action come the negative sides. One example is a school that has filled most of its incoming class with applicants from its early action pool, giving regular applicants a disadvantage.

Students waiting to weigh out financial offers from a multitude of schools will undoubtedly be two sides to the coin. In the coming years other universities may follow in the footsteps of Harvard, but for now the debate will continue over the pros and cons of early action.

Judge rebukes on nightclub case

By Eric Tucker
Associated Press

WARWICK, R.I.— The judge overseeing the criminal case in a deadly nightclub fire issued a stinging rebuke of Attorney General Patrick Lynch's office Thursday, saying it leaked word of plea agreements for the club's owners before victims' relatives learned of the deals.

Speaking from the bench, Judge Francis Darigan called Wednesday's release of a letter from Lynch to victims' families "despicable," unethical and "devoid of any consideration for the victims of this tragedy." The letter detailed plea agreements for Michael and Jeffrey Derderian, whose attorney confirms they will plead no contest to a count of involuntary manslaughter for each of the 100 people killed in the 2003 fire at the brothers' West Warwick nightclub.

The letter was faxed anonymously to WJAR-TV Wednesday. The Providence Journal also received a copy. "Without question this information emanated from the attorney general's department," Darigan said.

The judge's angry comments follow others from many victims' relatives, upset not only because the plea deals were leaked but because of the expected sentences: Michael Derderian is to get four years in prison and his brother is expected to get no prison time.

The brothers installed flammable soundproofing material that allowed the fire, started by a band's pyrotechnics, to spread rapidly through the wooden nightclub.

Lynch said in a statement issued Thursday that he opposed the plea deal and was disappointed with the terms Darigan approved, but Kathleen Hagerty, a lawyer for the Derderians, said it was Lynch's office that proposed the terms, last month and again this month.

Man charged with faking son's illness

By John Christoffersen
Associated Press

NEW HAVEN, Conn.—A father was arrested on charges of faking cystic fibrosis in his son by keeping the boy thin and fabricating medical bills — a story that authorities say fooled even his estranged wife.

Michael Bradway, 38, who has a history of forgery and larceny, was arrested Wednesday. The boy, now 9, was put in state care last year and immediately began to gain weight and thrive, according to court papers. He now lives with his mother.

Cystic fibrosis, which can be fatal, causes thick, sticky mucus to build up in the lungs and digestive system. It affects about 30,000 people in the United States.

Bradway was on suicide watch Thursday because he apparently attempted to kill himself shortly before he was arrested, authorities said. Prosecutor John Massameno said Bradway was supposed to turn himself into police, but authorities received a 911 call and found him in a bathtub full of water with his clothes still on and a belt tied around his neck. He was treated at an area hospital before he was arrested, Massameno said.

Authorities said Bradway began fabricating medical bills in 2001 when the boy was 5. He also put the child on a severe diet to make him thin. To duck doctors, he told school officials that the boy could not be immunized for religious reasons.

The boy frequently missed school, and authorities said Bradway convinced school officials that his son needed to take medication every two hours.

Bradway told his in-laws that the boy would probably need a lung transplant and that a hospital in Canada specialized in such cases, according to the arrest affidavit. They eventually contributed more than $38,000 for their grandson's medical care.

The affidavit said Bradway also convinced a volunteer group of his son's illness. The group, Landmark Volunteers, asked him to join the board and offered a donation, according to the affidavit.

The boy's mother, Tricka Hollander, who was separated from her husband at the time, began to question the diagnosis more than a year ago and asked for medical records, authorities said.

Her lawyer called the situation "despicable."

Katrina doctor says she's not a murderer

RUKMINI CALLIMACHI
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW ORLEANS—A doctor accused of murdering four critically ill hospital patients with injections in the harrowing days after Hurricane Katrina is defending herself publicly for the first time, saying in a TV interview that she gave them drugs simply to ease their pain.

"I have spent my entire life taking care of patients. I have no history of doing anything other than good for my patients," Dr. Anna Pou said in an interview to be aired Sunday on CBS's "60 Minutes." "Why would I suddenly start murdering people?"

Nurses Cheri Landry and Lori Budo also proclaim their innocence in the interview. They and Pou were arrested on suspicion of murder in July.

"I want everyone to know that I am not a murderer. That we are not murderers," Pou said.

The three have not been formally charged, pending the outcome of a grand jury investigation.

The Louisiana attorney general's office said Pou and the nurses injected a lethal cocktail of drugs into the four bedridden patients after determining they were too ill to be moved from Memorial Medical Center. The 317-bed hospital was flooded in 10 feet of water, the electricity had failed and temperatures had climbed to over 100 degrees.

At least 34 people died at the hospital — many succumbing to dehydration as they waited four days for help to arrive.

According to state investigators, tissue samples from the dead, who ranged in age from 61 to 90, tested positive for both morphine and the sedative Versed, and the amount of Versed was found to be higher than the usual therapeutic dose.

The medical community has aggressively defended Pou, Landry and Budo, pointing out that the two drugs are commonly used in combination to reduce pain.

Pou, an ear, nose and throat specialist, said her goal was to make her patients comfortable, and "that means that we ensure they do not suffer in pain." She also said she does not believe in euthanasia.

Pou acknowledged the drugs could have caused harm, but stressed: "Anytime you provide pain medicine to anybody, there is a risk. But as I said, my role is to help them through the pain."

Minority enrollment may skyrocket in U.S.

By Heather Schwedel
Daily Pennsylvanian (U. Penn)

PHILADELPHIA—Non-white students may still be in the minority at American colleges, but the rate at which they're enrolling far surpasses their white counterparts. Statisticians at the U.S. Department of Education predict that while nationwide college enrollment will continue to grow, among minorities, there's going to be a boom.

By 2015, enrollment in American colleges will grow 42 percent for Latinos, 30 percent for Native Americans, 28 percent for Asian Americans and 27 percent for blacks, according to a report from the National Center for Education Statistics. In the same period, white enrollment is only slated to grow by 6 percent.

According to Thomas Snyder, a statistician at the Department of Education, the projections only echo decades of population and enrollment trends. Rates of minority enrollment are not just now beginning to outpace those of whites, but have been doing so for many years, Snyder said.

Experts are unsure how the upswing in minority enrollment will affect the University of Pennsylvania.

Though Penn has been a "predominantly white institution from the very beginning," its elite status should also mean that it has the resources to "adapt to a more diverse America," said Sean Vereen, associate director of the Center for Africana Studies.

Universities located in areas of greater population growth—especially minority population growth—are predicted to be most affected.

Enrollment among non-resident aliens is also projected to rise 34 percent. This will all add up to a total enrollment increase of 15 percent.

Teens suspected in school plot

By Todd Richmond
Associated Press

GREEN BAY, Wis.—A 17-year-old student said he was only doing the right thing when he told authorities his friends were planning a Columbine-like attack on East High School last week.

Matt Atkinson, introduced at a news conference late Wednesday, said he learned about the alleged plot by two students and a former student to attack the school the day before he told authorities.

"Do the right thing. That's all I can say is do the right thing. There's no harm in telling somebody about it," Atkinson said.

He went home, he said, talked to his mother and decided he had to tell authorities.

"I didn't do it for fame," he said. "I had fear for the life of my fellow students and staff at East High School."

Atkinson told Assistant Principal Matt Mineau of the plan on the morning of Sept. 14.

"It's just remarkable what he has done for our school, that he felt connected enough that he could come and tell me what was going on," Mineau said.

Later that day, police arrested students William Cornell and Shawn Sturtz, both 17, and searched their homes, where they found a cache of guns, makeshift bombs and other gear. authorities said. Former student Bradley Netwal, 18, was arrested Friday. All three were in jail Wednesday.

Atkinson, wearing a red T-shirt emblazoned with his school's name, described the three teens as friends and said he came forward in part because he wanted to get them help.

"It it wasn't true . . . at least they'd get the help that they needed," he said. "If I didn't go and they were serious, I couldn't live with that on my conscience."

Charges were to be filed on Thursday, said Brown County District Attorney John Zakowski, who was also at the news conference and praised Atkinson for helping avert a "very tragic situation."

Mayor Jim Schmitt said there likely will be some type of "high school hero scholarship" created to honor Atkinson for what he did.

Atkinson, a slightly built, sandy-haired senior, is an officer with the school's chapter of the Future Farmers of America. He said he plans to attend Northeastern Wisconsin Technical College and possibly pursue a career with computers. When asked whether he considers himself a hero, Atkinson smiled, nodded and said "Kind of."

Bush, GOP rebels agree on detainee bill

By Anne Plummer Flaherty
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—The White House and rebellious Senate Republicans announced agreement Thursday on rules for the interrogation and trial of suspects in the war on terror. President Bush urged Congress to put it into law before adjourning for the midterm elections.

"I'm pleased to say that this agreement preserves the single most potent tool we have in protecting America and foiling terrorist attacks," the president said, shortly after administration officials and key lawmakers announced agreement following a week of high-profile intraparty disagreement.

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record) of Arizona, one of three GOP lawmakers who told Bush he couldn't have the legislation the way he initially asked for it, said, "The agreement that we've entered into gives the president the tools he needs to continue to fight the war on terror and bring these evil people to justice."

"There's no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved," McCain said, referring to the international treaties covering the treatment of prisoners in wartime.

The central sticking point had been a demand from McCain, Sen. John Warner (news, bio, voting record) of Virginia and Sen. Lindsey Graham (news, bio, voting record) of South Carolina that there be no attempt to redefine U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions.

The agreement contains key concessions by the White House, including dropping a provision that would have interpreted Geneva Convention obligations and another allowing a defendant to be convicted on evidence he never sees if it is classified. The legislation, however, makes clear the president has the authority to enforce the treaty.

CIA Director Michael Hayden has said the agency needed to be confident that its interrogation program for high-value terror suspects is legal.

"Much remains in the legislative process," he said in a written statement to the agency personnel. But "if this language becomes law, the Congress will have given us the clarity and the support that we need to move forward with a detention and interrogation program that allows us to continue to defend the homeland, attack al-Qaida and protect American and allied lives."

Added Stephen Hadley, the president's national security adviser, on CIA interrogations: "The good news is the program will go forward."

Rep. Duncan Hunter (news, bio, voting record), R-Calif., who opposed such a measure, indicated he was not satisfied with the piece on classified information: "We're going to look at it closely. And we have some recommendations with respect to classified information."

Hadley said the bar would be "very high" and that classified information would not be automatically shared with terrorists.

"Our view is we think it's a good approach because the likelihood of that occurring would be very remote," Hadley said.

Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said he wouldn't consider the agreement sealed until Bush signed on.

That happened within an hour, when the president stepped before microphones in Orlando, Fla., where he was campaigning for Republican candidates in the fall.

The agreement "clears the way to do what the American people expect us to do — to capture terrorists, to detain terrorists, to question terrorists and then to try them," he said.

The accord was sealed in a 90-minute session in the office of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who had earlier in the day told Warner, McCain and Graham it was time to close the deal. The four lawmakers were joined by Hadley, as well as other administration officials, for the final session.

If it survives scrutiny, the accord would fulfill a Republican political and legislative imperative — pre-election party unity on an issue related to the war on terror, and possible enactment of one of Bush's top remaining priorities of the year.

The evident compromise came less than a week after Bush emphatically warned lawmakers at a news conference he would shut down the interrogation of terror suspects unless legislation was sent to his desk. "Time's running out," he said.

The White House shifted its tone from combative to compromising within 48 hours, though, and officials began talking of a need for an agreement that all sides would be comfortable with.

Whatever the outcome, the controversy has handed critics of the president's conduct of the war on terror election-year ammunition.

Bush's former secretary of state, Colin Powell, dismayed the administration when he sided with Warner, McCain and Graham. He said Bush's plan, which would have formally changed the U.S. view of the Geneva Conventions on rules of warfare, would cause the world "to doubt the moral basis" of the fight against terror and "put our own troops at risk."

The handling of suspects is one of two administration priorities relating to the war on terror.

The other involves the president's request for legislation to explicitly allow wiretapping without a court warrant on international calls and e-mails between suspected terrorists in the United States and abroad. One official said Republicans had narrowed their differences with the White House over that issue, as well, and hoped for an agreement soon.

Republican leaders have said they intend to adjourn Congress by the end of the month to give lawmakers time to campaign for re-election.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that Bush's plan for trying terrorism suspects before military tribunals violated the Geneva Conventions and U.S. law.

The court, in a 5-3 ruling, found that Congress had not given Bush the authority to create the special type of military trial and that the president did not provide a valid reason for the new system. The justices also said the proposed trials did not provide for minimum legal protections under international law.

About 450 terrorism suspects, most of them captured in Afghanistan and none of them in the U.S., are being held by military authorities at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Ten have been charged with crimes.

Sen. John McCain (center), Sen. John Warner (right), and Sen. Lindsay Graham attend an announcement, in Capitol Hill on Sept. 21, 2006, on an agreement about a bill spelling out rules to try foriegn terrorism suspects.

Mike Healey, a spokesman for Lynch, did not return telephone messages or an e-mail seeking comment on the note or Darigan's comments.

However, Lynch said he would speak with reporters later Thursday.

Hagerty gave The Associated Press a handwritten document dated Sept. 7 that lays out nearly identical terms, including sentences. Hagerty said a prosecutor gave her the note after she asked for the terms in writing.

The judge said Lynch's office was actively engaged in the early negotiations for the deal, but lawyers for both sides were unable to reach an agreement.

"The attorney general was fully aware of the disposition which the court intended to impose in these cases long before his letter was drafted and surreptitiously given to the media," Darigan said.

The Derderians are expected to plead no contest Sept. 29 to 100 counts of involuntary manslaughter; they will not need to change their not guilty pleas to another 100 involuntary manslaughter counts filed under a separate legal theory.

Both brothers are to receive suspended prison sentences and probation, but Michael Derderian is the only one expected to serve prison time. Hagerty said Michael Derderian's sentence is more serious than Jeffrey's because he bought the foam that helped the fire quickly burn out of control.

The prison term to be imposed on Michael Derderian is the same one received in May by band manager Daniel Biechele, who set off the pyrotechnics and pleaded guilty earlier this year to 100 counts of involuntary manslaughter.

Government calls for increased HIV testing

By Thomas H. Maugh II
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES—Every American between the ages of 13 and 64 should be screened for an HIV infection in an effort to identify the quarter-million people who are infected and do not know it, government officials recommended Thursday.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention also called for increased testing for pregnant women to further reduce the already low transmission of the virus from mothers to infants.

The increased testing would be voluntary but would be offered on an "opt-out" basis in which patients would receive the test unless they explicitly refuse it. The guidelines also no longer would require written consent for the test and pre-test counseling— requirements that now provide a major impediment to widespread testing.

"By identifying people earlier through a screening program, we'll allow them to access life-extending therapy and also, through prevention services, learn how to avoid transmitting HIV infection to others," Dr. Timothy Mastro, acting director of the CDC's division of HIV AIDS prevention, said at a new conference.

Most physicians and activist groups were pleased with the recommendations, which CDC has spent three years refining.

"We see far too many patients who were never tested for HIV before they became sick with AIDS," said Dr. Daniel R. Kuritzkes, chair of the HIV Medicine Association.

Early detection, moreover, halves the cost of providing care, added Dr. Michael S. Saag, director of the Center for AIDS Research at the University of Alabama at Birmingham.

The new guidelines, published Thursday in CDC's Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report, were endorsed by the American Medical Association, which urged physicians to adopt them.

But Dr. Larry Fields, president of the American Academy of Family Physicians, predicted that many physicians would not because of the increased time that would be required and the lack of evidence that expanding testing would be beneficial.

The new recommendations carry no legal force. But the government's endorsement means that insurance companies are more likely to cover the tests. The costs range from about $9 for a negative test to about $80 for a positive test, confirmation and post-test counseling.

Current guidelines, which have been in effect since 1993, call for testing only high-risk individuals, such as gay men and intravenous drug users, and those visiting hospitals where the HIV prevalence is at least 1 percent. Physicians have argued, however, that they don't have the time to assess risk for every patient, and most hospitals do not know the HIV prevalence among their clients.

The guidelines also require written consent for the test and pre-test counseling. Eliminating those requirements, officials believe, would make it easier to administer the tests.

"No one signs a form to get a prostate exam," and it should not be any different for HIV testing, Saag said. "We need to make sure patients are informed about the HIV test, but we should not put obstacles in the way of testing."

Current guidelines for pregnant women call for testing upon confirmation of pregnancy and repeat testing in the third trimester for women at high risk, including intravenous drug users and those with an infected partner. The new guidelines also recommend repeat testing for women in areas with high prevalence and those who deliver in facilities where the rate is at least one HIV diagnosis per 1,000 women screened.

For pregnant women whose HIV status is unknown, the guidelines call for a rapid HIV test during labor.

An estimated 1 million Americans are HIV positive, according to the CDC, and 40,000 are newly infected each year.

Caffeine Crazed

As energy drinks rise in popularity among students, experts say health risks could follow

BY MEGHAN MURPHY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Mike Stuppia, a 25-year-old resident of Revere, woke up one morning three years ago with his "heart racing a thousand miles an hour" and his breathing "hard and fast." He drove to Billerica to watch his niece's dance recital, but throughout the car ride and the performance, he says, he was unable to calm down.

"I couldn't concentrate on anything going on around me — I was in a fog," Stuppia wrote in an e-mail. "I couldn't sit still in my seat ... and my legs felt weak."

He can only think of one factor that may have contributed to his reaction — the Red Bull energy drink that he tried for the first time a day earlier.

As energy drinks become increasingly popular throughout the nation, students at the University of Massachusetts are catching on, but experts are warning their consumption can be harmful, especially when mixed with alcoholic beverages.

Stuppia said he felt unusual effects of energy drinks when he first decided to give one a try. He was working for Stop and Shop at the time and says that customers who bought Red Bull told him that although the taste wasn't great, it really boosted energy. One night, he was working until midnight and decided to give it a try.

"I bought one during work and I didn't really notice it do anything for me," he said. "I bought another one the next day for no reason, just to drink, and again [felt] nothing."

It was the morning after he drank the second can that Stuppia woke up feeling restless and unable to concentrate. He attributes the incident to the energy drink he sampled the day before.

Stuppia said that he hasn't touched an energy drink since that day. "It was the scariest feeling I have ever experienced," he added. "I just don't want to feel like that again."

Red Bull is one of the founding members of the energy drink category, which is comprised of beverages that contain large amounts of caffeine and sugar, as well as a long list of herbal ingredients. Common supplements added to the drinks include guarana, ginseng, and taurine.

The demand for energy drinks has exploded in recent years. Red Bull charged the U.S. market in 1997, launching and then boosting the energy drink business, according to a 2001 article in "Brandweek". Since then, brands like "Monster", "Lost", "Rockstar" and "Full Throttle" have joined the lineup of popular choices. According to a May 9 story on BevNet, energy drink category sales are up 70 percent from 2005.

Manufacturers claim that their products increase concentration, physical stamina and metabolism. The "Frequently Asked Questions" section of Red Bull's Web site, for example, states that consumers should drink the product "in times of increased mental and physical strain, for example, on long sleep-inducing motorways, during intensive working days, prior to demanding athletic activities or before tests and exams."

Energy drink manufacturers actively market their products to students, athletes and other young, active individuals, according to the U.S. Department of Education's Higher Education Center. College campuses are therefore ideal spots for advertisements and building brand awareness.

And UMass is no exception to this campaign. The beverages are ubiquitous on campus — from cases full of cans in the Bluewall Café to company backing of events on campus, such as the Red Bull-sponsored !MPROVathon held last March at Earth Foods. New students even received a complimentary can of Vault in the bags handed out by Dining Services during the first week of the semester.

For some people, one can isn't enough to do the trick. Tyler Garsik, a UMass junior, said that he has consumed Red Bull and other energy drinks a few cans at a time and has never experienced any unusual reaction.

"I get the same energy boost [from one drink] as with a caffeinated soda," he said. "It's just when I drink a few of them that I really feel a difference."

Despite the claims made by energy drink manufacturers that their products boost endurance and metabolism, some members of the medical community have concerns about the health benefits. France and Denmark banned the sale of Red Bull based on the recommendation of health experts concerned about the caffeine level in the beverage. The decision followed a few deaths suspected to be linked to consumption of energy drinks, including an 18-year-old from Ireland who shared four Red Bulls before playing in a basketball game and died hours afterward.

Laura Foresta, a clinical dietitian at Boston Medical Center, said that anytime there is a product manufactured in the United States that contains herbal supplements, consumers can't really know what they are getting.

"The difficulty is that they're not regulated by anybody in the United States," she said. "The manufacturers of those herbal supplements don't have to prove that the product does what it says it does, so they don't have to prove that it's safe, and they don't have to prove efficacy."

Researchers have examined the effects of the dietary supplements, but in many cases, "the studies ... have been too small, so even if there are promising results, it isn't enough for the scientific community to accept it," said Foresta.

Despite the largely unknown effects of herbal ingredients on the body, the amount of caffeine in energy drinks remains one of the biggest concerns for health professionals. Dianne Sutherland, a dietitian at UMass Dining Services, wrote an energy drink brochure stating that the beverages can contain about the same amount of caffeine as a cup of coffee (80 mg). However, it pointed out, "One can easily drink one cup of coffee, but when drinking an energy drink, is it just one can?"

Although many energy drink companies focus their marketing strategies at athletes who are looking for a quick way to boost their endurance before a game or a competition, there are questions within the medical community as to whether they help or hinder performance.

Exercise alone can cause a loss of fluids, but "the consumption of an energy drink exacerbates the dehydration and forces the muscles to work even harder," reads the Dining Services brochure. It lists potential consequences of the combination, including increased blood pressure and twitchiness, which can lead to a loss of coordination.

Recently, mixing energy drinks with alcohol has become a growing trend among college-aged populations — and it's even more concerning to health professionals.

"Energy drinks have a lot of caffeine, guarana, taurine and other stimulants, so if a student drinks a lot of alcohol, you end up with a drunk person who is wide awake, which is a bad combination," said April McNally, a community health and patient educator at University Health Services.

Doctors worry that the stimulants will cancel out natural body signals that it's time to stop drinking, such as feeling tired. This raises concerns that partygoers may not realize their own level of intoxication and will drink more than they otherwise would, "which can lead to alcohol poisoning and compromised personal safety," pointed out Sutherland in her brochure. She also outlined a "greater likelihood of hangovers" and "heart and kidney problems" as potential consequences.

McNally said that students should think twice before using any two drugs together.

"Combining an energy drink with another stimulant can lead to increased heart rate and blood pressure," she explained. "Everyone is different, so there is no way to determine how mixing an energy drink and alcohol will affect you."

And in spite of the scientific community's concern, energy drinks are still sometimes marketed specifically as mixers for alcohol. Hype, an energy drink company based in Gibraltar, has a section of its Web site (www.hype.com) that highlights drink recipes with a flashy demo and catchy music. They range from the simple — such as "Va Vooom," a shot of part vodka, part Hype — to the more complicated "Hype Breeze," a concoction of vodka, grapefruit and cranberry juices and Hype. Further ideas for shots are "Mex," made of tequila and Hype, and "Hymeister," which is a blend of — you guessed it — jägermeister and Hype.

Hype did not immediately respond to an e-mail from the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

The Steel Brewing Co. also markets a type of drink that has become popular among partygoers. It's called "Sparks," and is a combination of alcohol and caffeine, already supplied in one can.

Possible weight gain associated with sugary energy drinks is another factor that worries Foresta. "We have a huge problem with obesity in this country, and we know that sugary beverages contribute to this problem," she said. "Energy equals calories, [so] for weight management, energy drinks are a very big concern."

Mixing alcohol with the beverages is especially problematic for health and weight control. "Alcohol is going to have about 100 calories a drink and then you add calories from the Red Bull," explained Foresta. "An extra 500 calories a day times seven days a week is going to cause a pound of weight gain per week.

"If [an energy drink] is replacing healthful foods in your diet, and then contributing excess calories which can lead to weight gain, then you're putting your health at risk," she added.

Even with the potential health risks associated with energy drinks, many college students continue to use them in order to get a boost, for example, when pulling an all-nighter to study for an exam or write a paper.

However, Foresta said that a brisk walk around the block or a 20-minute catnap would be more effective for producing energy in the long run.

"Physical exercise will do so much more for brain function than an energy drink will," she said. "People are often looking for the quick fix, and there just isn't a substitution for a healthy lifestyle."

Contemplating conscription

Tucker Merrick

Whenever someone thinks back to the '60s, they are greeted with images of hippies, Woodstock, the Fab Four and especially war protests. This decade was known for civil unrest; a challenge against the establishment, a peaceful objection and fight for what you believe in.

Flash to now. Another war is becoming cemented into our history, one that people are beginning to parallel to the American war in Vietnam. There are similar events and similar questions. Why are we there? Is this truly necessary for national security? How are we going to get out?

Yet, with all of these familiar questions there is a unique one: why haven't the youth of America stood up in protest for what they believe in?

The year 1965 marked the first mass war protest. This demonstration, organized by the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), attracted over 20,000 supporters. Soon, students across the United States followed suit.

UMass was a haven for this activity. In 1967, a draft-board protest was organized in Northampton, resulting in a violent fistfight. At UMass a sit-in at Whitmore was organized in 1969, which resulted in the arrests of 34 students. In 1970, after Nixon announced the invasion of Cambodia, students in cooperation with others all over the country organized, and those in Amherst occupied Memorial Hall. This same national protest culminated with the shooting of four students at Kent State University on May 4, resulting in a nationwide student strike. UMass closed down after that.

Talk to anyone, and those coming of age at that time will often reflect on the injustice they faced, and nostalgically remember how they banded together to overcome it; how they fought for what they believed in and won. Nixon eventually withdrew troops and began the process of Vietnamization, where the responsibility of defense was given to the South Vietnam government.

When you hear this history and compare it to today, us students look like chumps. Sure we had "Kent State University" last year, but what did that accomplish? Recently I've heard people ask that unique question more and more: Why isn't anyone doing anything? The answer for this lies in the question.

You're not asking "why am I," but rather "why isn't anyone." The same mentality is everywhere, and will stay that way until an important change occurs. This hive of students isn't buzzing because the war in Iraq, though horrific and unfortunate, has not hit us with a stick. We're not directly affected. Here at UMass, we may know somebody who joined the Marines, or our cousin may be attending West Point, several Minutemen are already in the Army; yet, the majority of us have little to no strong emotional connection to that place thousands of miles away. The reason for this being that our roommates are not the ones going, our brothers aren't being called for a physical, we are not next in line – all because there is no draft.

I remember talk of the draft back when I was a senior in high school, and I remember being scared. I didn't know much about the situation in Iraq, nor did I have an opinion. I was more concerned about who I was going to ask to prom. But I knew I didn't want to go to war, I didn't want to fight and I didn't want to die. That I did know.

Now when I hear talk about a draft, I laugh, because I know it's not going to happen. If the government were to do that, my fears would be everyone's fears. My involuntary protection for my life would become yours. Protests would break out. Not just students, but people everywhere would become active. It would be affecting them personally. Their sons or daughters, boyfriends or best friends could be next in line. Our president would shake hands with Osama himself before he reinstituted conscription.

Sometimes when I think about this truth of narcissism, I am ashamed of myself. The only time I'm going to stand up for something is after it is in my face, only after my back is up against the wall, only when it's my life on the line. But this is simply human nature. It's the reason why we buy a new car instead of giving to charity and throw trash out the window instead of recycling. We need something like unemployment or an environmental crisis to shock us out of apathy and into action. We need something personal.

The draft is personal, and the draft was all too present during the Vietnam War.

Iraq is different. People are being asked to complete their fourth tour of duty, and our reserve troops and National Guard were sent over long ago. These things didn't happen during the '60s. The National Guard was a retreat for war-guarded young men, and had a waiting list longer than the line at the Textbook Annex.

If you really want to end the war in Iraq, don't burn George Bush in effigy, and don't condemn our generation for indifference. Just get to a ballot box and vote to reinstate the draft.

Separation of church and faith

Kevin Pascucci

For as long as I can remember, Christianity has been a part of my life. I was raised in a Christian home, attended Christian school for years and attended church regularly. As I got older and began to think more and more for myself, I ultimately reached a crossroad in my life. Would I abandon what I had been raised in, or would I continue what I'd started? What helped me to make that decision was a valuable lesson I learned in time: the difference between faith and religion. Allow me to explain.

In today's America, the religious right has become a force to be reckoned with. Known for their endorsement of the Republican Party and their battles against the immoral, this group has made it a point to let everyone else know they will not give up until their agenda is a reality. These are the people who represent what we know as organized religion in this country. Not well-liked, these people live their lives close-minded, not listening to anyone but those within their camp.

If you were to turn on the news or a religious station, these people would be what you would see. When one hears the word Christian, it immediately brings to mind visions of George Bush, televangelists, Bible-thumpers, etc. You get the picture.

Here's where I come in. I choose to call myself a Christian in this day and age, despite the fact that I am lumped in with the aforementioned group. Outside of the fact that I believe Jesus came to die for mankind, I have little to nothing in common with the religious right. When I tell people I'm a Christian, the immediate response is always, "Oh, you're religious," to which I always reply, "No, I have faith." Again, let me explain.

As a follower of the Bible, I call myself a Christian merely because it is the name given in that book to those who follow the teachings of Jesus Christ. With that title comes a huge responsibility, in that whoever chooses to bear it is automatically a representative of the God they claim to follow.

Sadly, many of God's representatives choose to twist the teachings of the Bible to fit political agendas, distorting the original text. Take the gay marriage debate for example. Yes, the Bible says it's wrong for people of the same sex to be together. The right has made this abundantly clear. What they leave out is the Bible also says no sin is any worse than another, all the way from white lies to murder.

In other words, homosexuals, and those who choose to judge them, are no different in the eyes of God. The Bible also says God gave man free-will, allowing man to choose whether or not to follow Him. That is our God-given right as humans. It's for that reason I believe in the separation of church and state, but that's a whole other discussion.

In my own experience, I find myself repeatedly disappointed with the Church as a whole. My calling as a Christian is to emulate to others the love and selfless acts which Jesus exemplified. My job is not to witch hunt or point judgmental fingers. Yet, time and time again, I have seen more energy being put into banning things like "Harry Potter" and "The Da Vinci Code" than feeding the poor or giving back to the community.

With all this said, I want to say I have not completely lost hope in the Church. I have personally seen the Church help many people. A church I used to attend organized people to hand out jackets to the homeless on the streets of NY. Many of my close Christian friends are like me, in that they see the Church not as what it is but what it could be. If all the churches of the world decided to pool their resources and unite rather than waste time arguing over theology, I believe many global issues, including world hunger, could be resolved. Yes, you read that correctly.

In writing this, I am speaking to two audiences. To the Christians reading this I would encourage you to not accept every last thing you hear in church, but spend your time in prayer and in reading the Bible for yourself. Go to church, but separate Biblical teaching from man's interpretation of it.

As for the non-believers, I would simply ask you to not lump all Christians together. Not all of them are right-wing nut jobs. If you're remotely curious, read the Bible for yourself. It might not be what you expected. I would also recommend reading Christian writers, like Donald Miller or Anne Lamont, whose views are refreshingly Liberal and Progressive but still grounded in the Bible (They actually dare to disagree with George Bush).

In the end, religion is a man-made concept, and man is not perfect. It's for that reason it has become so flawed. Lucky for me, my faith doesn't lie in man, and that is where I find hope for us all.

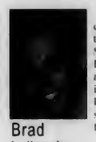
Fruit on the bottom, baby



Brad Leibowitz

Some people tell me that I can't eat yogurt all day long. I ask them, "Have you tried Colombo's Strawberry-Banana Fruit on the Bottom? It's splendiferous." (It's a word, trust me). Upon them saying no, I just smirk and walk away, knowing they are missing an entirely smooth tasting explosion of creamy flavors.

For every time my mom has said to me, "You can't eat that, you'll ruin your appetite," for all the times I have been told "Stop eating that, it's not good for you," and for every time I have heard, "If you keep eating that, you're teeth are going to fall out," this is my declaration of food eating freedom. Of all the foods I consume on a daily basis, I absorb yogurt like a junkie shoots crack or like the cookie monster devours his precious choc chip. My crack of choice: Colombo's Fruit on the Bottom or as I call it, perfection in plastic.

Alright, I know some of you are saying, "Brad you can't be serious, Colombo has nothing on Dannon, and fruit on the bottom doesn't hold a candle to already mixed." To you my yogurt eating friend, I say the following: First off, there was a day when I shared your love of the Dannon product. I will not lie – they make a plush luxurious mix of flavors. From their mixed fruit, to their blackberry to the ever so tangy lime, their products are top notch.

When Dannon downsized their container like a greedy older brother taking candy away from his younger sibling, I had to search the market for another company that made the Strawberry-Banana concoction; lucky Colombo came to my rescue.

All year round I kept my fridge stocked with different assortments of Dannon flavors and blends. From the already mixed to the fruit on the bottom, Dannon was all I ate. But then, three years ago Dannon committed an atrocity to which I will never forgive: to save money, they made their containers smaller from 8 oz to 6 oz. I, like many, was enraged.

At this point in time a tremendous problem reared its ugly head. For 17 years I had sworn by the Dannon product and by my love of their flavors. However, one taste above the rest was my concern. When Dannon downsized their container like a greedy older brother taking candy away from his younger sibling, I had to search the market for another company that made the Strawberry-Banana concoction; lucky Colombo came to my rescue.

For the span of my yogurt ingesting life, Strawberry-Banana has been the staple of my diet. Some of you out there might be saying to yourselves, "But Brad, no, strawberry is the best," or even worse, "Mixed fruit is the best." I agree that strawberry is of the highest quality, however, everyone likes banana. It's the universal fruit of appeal (kiwi got demoted); upon this predication, how could you possibly go wrong mixing both together?

As for the case of mixed fruit, eating mixed fruit gives you the same reaction you got when as a little kid, you would combine all the soda flavors together from the tap, drink it and then say to yourself "What the hell did I do that for?" Mixed fruit tastes like nothing at all, because when you mix every flavor together you lose each individual taste. Now, we come to the final issue in question already mixed or fruit on the bottom?

I have heard the arguments supporting both for years. For the already mixed fruit fans, your argument is one of simplicity. When you eat yogurt, whatever flavor it may be (again, strawberry banana rocks) you want to peel back the top and simply indulge in yogurty goodness. It's quick, it's easy and above all, it's a fruity mixed orgasm in your mouth. Sentiment understood.

Nevertheless, I maintain that fruit on the bottom holds the torch.

As any good ice cream sundae maker knows, the key to a good ice cream sundae is the maintenance, the placement and the overall usage of the hot fudge. To make a great ice cream sundae, the maker first layers the bottom of the bowl with a generous coating of hot chocolate fudge. On top of that, the maker puts the ice cream, sprinkles and whatever else they want (I suggest caramel, snickers crumbles and butter finger crumbles) This allows the eater to control their intake of the key ingredient in any good ice cream sundae, the hot fudge (This analogy thanks to Jerry Seinfeld). There in lies the key to why fruit on the bottom is a level above already mixed.

Fruit on the bottom allows the eater to control his/her level of fruity goodness that he/she takes in at one time. Not only can you control the level of fruity deliciousness you are consuming, you can control the level of plain yogurt you are taking in. Above all, if you do prefer mixed yogurt you can manually mix, giving yourself another lush yogurt experience.

So next time someone tells you, "You're going to ruin your appetite," tell them you only have an appetite for Colombo Fruit on the Bottom Strawberry Banana style. It's smooth, it's orgasmic and, yes, it's splendiferous.

Students can't stay awake

Colin McDonald

I remember sitting down to my astronomy lecture last week. I can't remember much else.

It seems that students at UMass just can't fight the urge to sleep during lectures. More than once I've found myself suddenly jerked back into reality with those two dreaded words: "Pop quiz." Even given the opportunity to discuss the question at hand, must students can only give each other a blank stare.

So, what is it about lectures that seem to sap us of our usually vivacious college energy? Is the professor too boring? Is the material just too dull? Could it possibly be that we simply need to get more sleep? Maybe it's a deadly combination of the three.

In any case, students are given the freedom to choose for themselves just what to do with their time. Among other important things, sleep seems to be an increasingly forgotten aspect of our schedule.

"I felt bad I dozed off, until I realized everyone else in my section of the room fell asleep too," said freshman Rob Jacobus.

It's no small wonder that between activities, class work, studies, athletics and (of course) parties, many young men and women in college are finding it difficult to keep their eyes open during class. Is it really asking too much for us to pay attention during a lecture, though?

Students at UMass would be wise not to abuse their freedoms. Military colleges like the United States Naval Academy (USNA) and the Massachusetts Maritime Academy appropriate certain hours for sleep and have a mandatory morning wake-up. Students at these colleges often have such trouble staying awake in class that they are expected to stand if they feel like taking a snooze during their lecture.

"We have to get up at 5:30 every weekday, so we're all struggling to stay awake," explains Midshipman Christina Chance of the USNA. "It's polite to stand. Sure it's a little goofy, but I can't afford to fall asleep during class."

Obviously, standing in a tightly confined lecture of 200 people isn't quite as feasible here at UMass, but that doesn't mean students can't handle the responsibility of staying awake.

"Scientists feel between seven and eight hours sleep a night is enough for most of us," states a report from Netdoctor, a leading online general health reference.

So, what exactly happens when students are deprived of their necessary sleep? As the National Sleep Foundation (NSF) reports, "The brain's frontal cortex relies on sleep to function effectively. Insufficient rest adversely affects the frontal cortex's ability to control speech, access memory, and solve problems," these being the very aspects that we are expected to develop while in college.

More than once I've looked around and mistaken my lecture hall for a scene from "Dawn of the Dead."

"I sleep about eight hours a night, and I still can't help snoozing in class," says junior Nick Woodberry.

Well, as of late, the common belief that eight hours of rest will get you through the day has been largely contested by the scientific community.

Different people need different amounts of rest. A small percentage of people have the ability to function perfectly normally with only four to five hours of sleep. On the other end of the spectrum, a small number of us can't function without nine or more hours of sleep. The rest of us should be fine with a solid seven or eight hours though.

It's not so much the sleeping part that's hard for me, it's the waking up part. Some of us are early birds and others of us, well, we're more like vampires. It turns out this difference is largely based on the stress hormone Cortisol. Those of us that can barely function without a gallon of caffeine in the morning simply show lower levels of the hormone.

What we do during the day also affects how well we sleep at night. Most of us spend plenty of time straining our eyes on our computers, but for those of us with athletics and jobs, the strain on our bodies can become immense. Eight hours of sleep might not do, but as the NSF stated, proper sleep is entirely particular for each individual.

The responsibility for students to gauge their own sleep cycle is entirely up to us. We don't have our moms telling us our bedtime anymore, so we need to use some common sense and get some rest. Whether or not your lecture is as exciting as "Pride & Prejudice," you still need to make the grade.

Rolling Stones get the last laugh

By Tim McCall
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In Cameron Crowe's movie "Almost Famous," the character Dennis Hope claims "If you think that Mick Jagger will still be doing the whole rock star thing at age fifty, well, then, you are sorely, sorely mistaken." Of course this is meant as a joke since the movie takes place in the early 1970s and the viewers know that Jagger and the rest of the Rolling Stones are still active.

But on Wednesday night, the Rolling Stones got the last laugh by performing to a nearly sold out Gillette Stadium in Foxboro (their fifth appearance in Massachusetts in the last year and a half). Bands fresh out of high school rarely have enough endurance to return to the same state for five different appearances.

Endurance is understatement when trying to explain how the band continues to tour. This past year alone the band had to deal with guitarist Keith Richards falling out of a coconut tree in Fiji and drummer Charlie Watts being diagnosed with throat cancer.

Health problems aside, the band took their performance seriously. They clearly showed any nonbelievers in the audience that they can rock despite their average being in the mid 60's. Of course, with the cheapest tickets being in the $60 range, only the truest and richest fans came out.

Starting off with a bang, they opened their set with "Paint it Black." This move shocked many members of the audience, but at the same time the fans loved it. This was the first time "Paint it Black" has ever been performed as an opening song.

From then on Jagger danced back and forth across the entire stage. Song after song never appearing to be out of breath or out of key, Jagger was impressive.

Richards appeared to get off to a slow start, but by the halfway point he improved and started acting like the Richards of young. When Jagger went back stage for a break and wardrobe change Richards took over the microphone and the crowd went wild, giving him one of the longest ovations of the night.

"It's been one hell of a year, I mean it this time. I needed this," Richards said to the crowd of 44,000.

Then he went into the song "You've got the Silver" from the album "Let it Bleed." As Richards started to sing, his voice was like Bob Dylan's voice on his latest album, but as he went on his vocal chords loosened and he sounded better. By the time he sang his second and last song "Little T&A" his voice reached the best it could get for a 62-year-old.

Following Jagger's return to the stage the band headed out on the front tip of the stage that went down a track through the floor to the 50 yard line to perform up for the fans who had seats further in the back. The stage had just enough room for the five members and three guitar techs.

As the band performed on the smaller stage, the original stage started to get covered with a giant balloon of the band's lips and tongue logo. Three songs later the entire stage was covered and the band slowly made their return back.

By the time they made it back the tongue had retreated and the stage looked normal again. Jagger and the rest of the band spread out all over the stage to make everyone feel like they had the best seats of the house. As Jagger danced it became evident after he shed his coat that he enjoys showing his naval more than Britney Spears.

As the finale approached they retreated back to their positions at center stage, rocking out as if it was their first time on the Ed Sullivan show. The pyrotech nics included flames and fireworks as the band finished up their last songs and took their final bows.

Opening act Kanye West performed to a half empty stadium since most of the audience was still in traffic trying to get into the concert. For the few young er fans that got there early and saw West, they appeared into his set. His older fans, who had never heard of West, simply ignored him and continued buying their $35 t-shirts and $8 margaritas.

Newly renovated Berkshire DC a success with students

By Christina Fong
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Walking towards it, you already begin to notice bright neon lights and an unfamiliar art deco design visible through the glass entrance. It's only a glimpse of what to come. Berkshire welcomes all who wish to savor the best dining experience on campus.

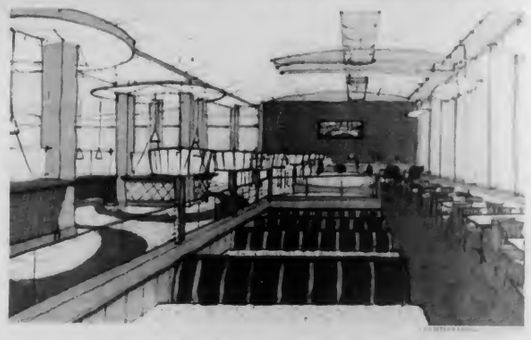
The new and improved, revamped Berkshire Dining Common is drawing the crowds and attention the team behind Berkshire was hoping to get. It has everything you love about the other dining commons, with more stylish and high-tech additions to satisfy the contemporary student. Berkshire was also meant to accommodate the increasing number of students on the meal plan. Catering to about 2,400 people a night, three times the volume of the other dining commons, it's clear the students and I agree this place is a definite improvement.

Berkshire has lost the mundane-looking wooden panels and autumn-themed embellishments, all of which has been replaced with vibrant colors and festive designs, giving it a more upbeat feel. Ryan Pipczynski, the night manager, compared it to a "downtown Northhampton restaurant", providing a trendier and youthful atmosphere. The installation of booths adds comfort to the dining experience, and enhanced lighting opens up the space. Instead of rows of tables, there is a mix of high tops, and smaller round tables. As the other dining commons have most of their food located in the center of their simplified floor plan, giving an even stronger impression of a public school cafeteria, Berkshire has 11 different stations scattered about. Each station is fashioned with signs and updated titles such as "Veggilicious" and "Chef's Table"

The 11 different stations allow students more options instead of having the menus rotate daily. Pizza is available every single day, and not only is it available, there are more to choose from such as Cheese, Spicy, Hawaiian, and the all-time favorite, Pepperoni. Their Asian cuisine rivals that of the Oak Room, found in Worcester. Noodles are offered either stir fried or with soup, which was good though larger proportions were preferable. The Bakery produces more delectable looking cakes and in addition to hard and soft ice cream, popsicles are on the list of alternatives.

The quality and taste of food may be a slight improvement on those of the other dining commons, but for the most part, the food remains the same. They might not be North Hampton restaurant picks, but they are pretty good in terms of university food. Although the staff isn't used to the increased volume of students, as the night manager mentioned, they're still welcoming with their friendly demeanors and hospitality. All of these familiarities remind us we're still in UMass.

The expanding demands and expectations of the students pushed directors and project managers to think beyond what was standard and conventional. Quality and flair was becoming almost as important as simple nourishment. They had to meet more needs than the basics of food and water, and they succeeded. The vast number of students flocking to Berkshire is a testament to their pleasant satisfaction. The décor is modern and lively, and the number of dishes to choose from is refreshing. If you haven't gone down to the newly renovated Berkshire Dining Common, I highly recommend having breakfast, lunch, or dinner there as soon as possible.



Newly renovated Berkshire dining commons offers 11 different food stations and New York diner style booth seating as well as art decor and neon lights on the walls.

Pirates sequel does not live up to original

By Kate Bauer
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

When I first saw the trailer for the sequel to the movie "Pirates of the Caribbean: The Curse of the Black Pearl," I thought, I wonder how they're going to screw this up? Hollywood, as of late, has not done the best job of producing sequels (with the exception of "Spiderman 2" and "X-Men 2"). And with the lineup of other sequel movies that came out this past summer (yes, "Superman Returns" is a sequel), it didn't look promising. It seems that once a movie does well, say $305 million, studios feel the need to produce sequels, in order to rip off Americans even more. Thus, our cinematic choices are often the plotless, weightless, endless sequels that "POTC: Dead Man's Chest" is a perfect example of.

Again we find the memorable Captain Jack Sparrow, stuck in yet another hairy situation, which he drags his friends into. This time the villain is Davy Jones, captain of the sea and looking for Jack Sparrow to repay a debt. But, as Jack will be Jack, he doesn't want to repay Jones, and therefore runs for it. Now Will and Elizabeth must find a way to save Jack from Jones and save themselves from being thrown into jail by the conniving Cutler Beckett for aiding Jack Sparrow and his escape from Port Royal in the first Pirates film. High jinks and action sequences ensue, leaving the audience lost in the absurdity of it all. Don't get me wrong; there are some fun parts to the film. Bill Nighy as Davy Jones is one scary captain, and thanks to amazing CGI work, really does look like a human version of an octopus. You may remember Nighy's memorable performance as an ageing rock star in "Love Actually" and his "Pirates" performance proves he can both make you laugh and scare you.

Davy Jones' name of the game is that when sailors are marooned in the middle of the ocean, he gives them a proposition: either die and sink to the black abyss below, or join his crew for a hundred years. And, it appears, that part of the servitude involves sprouting barnacles and fish-like appendages until you no longer appear human but rather resemble some very creepy-looking crustacean, with a hammerhead or puffer fish skin. The crewmember pirates in this film make the not-dead-but-not-alive pirates of the first film look cheap. If you go see the film, check out the crewmember Bootstrap Bill (yes, Will's supposedly dead father—a whole 'nother can of worms), who seems to sprout new barnacles and other attachments as the film progresses.

The biggest disappointment of the film was the plot. Though the production is bigger and better than the first, definitely more visually stunning, the plot lags. Too many jokes from the first film are re-used, and while funny at times, the repetition makes the movie sag instead of making us laugh. The action sequences also appear too far-fetched. Sparrow, Will and Norrington sword fighting inside a giant spinning wheel that maintains an even role without falling over down a giant hill? Though fun to watch, one can begin to feel dizzy from all the quick camera movements and activity going on. It's as if the viewer takes a ride in the spinning wheel themselves.

Also, what's with the Jack-Will-Elizabeth love triangle? It seems an unnecessary plot only meant to give Jack a potential love interest and show that Will and Elizabeth's relationship isn't made in heaven.

Some new faces for the new movie are Tia Dalma (Naomi Harris) and Cutler Beckett (Tom Hollander). The witch lady Tia, with her bloodshot eyes and really bad dental problems, serves as a guide and aid to Jack and his crew. Cutler Beckett comes into play at the beginning of the film, intent on overtaking Port Royal and a mind to put an end to Jack Sparrow. Royal is the one who coincidentally gave Jack the mark of a pirate-the letter 'P' burn you see on his wrist in the first film. This time around they've added a creature, the Kraken, a mysterious sea monster Jones can summon at his will. We never get a good look at the thing, but learn that it's great at snapping ships in half like a toothpick.

I felt worn out trying to understand the unstructured plot and dizzying action sequences, and definitely checked my watch more than once—something that is typically considered a death sentence for a movie. Depp again delivers a strong performance, but not as memorable as he did in the original. Bloom again attempts to make his voice boom out like he's leading men into battle, and Knightley looks like she's just there to have a good time. Nighy delivers probably the best performance, at least rivaling Depp's, blending so well into the role that you really think he is octopus man.

See the movie if you like to have a fun time and for a surprise ending-which is a set up for the third film "POTC At Worlds End" but as a warning, you might need some Advil after the movies over, due to the headache you'll probably develop. It is recommended that this film be seen at least once in the theatre, because a movie this size needs a screen that big.

Gondry has some dreams of his own

By Hanh Nguyen
ZAP2IT.COM

LOS ANGELES — "Last night I dreamt that 60 homeless prostitutes were invited to my apartment," says writer-director Michel Gondry, known for his critically acclaimed "Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind."

"It was ... a representation of the spam mail I receive, the junk mail about penis and Viagra. So it was kind of a nightmare."

Evidently, the French filmmaker is familiar with the colorful, illogical, yet often meaningful landscape of dreams, which he examines in his latest project, "The Science of Sleep," opening in limited release on Friday.

In the film, artist Stephane (Gael Garcia Bernal) has just moved in with his landlady mom (Miou-Miou) after his father's death. As an escape from his dead-end job at a calendar company, Stephane shows off his fanciful inventions to his equally creative neighbor Stephanie (Charlotte Gainsbourg) and tries to make sense of the vivid dreams that often invade his waking life. When Stephanie rejects Stephane's romantic advances, finding him strangely childish, he turns to the world of dreams for help.

Sometimes in his dreams, Stephane discovers he has overlarge, cartoony hands that make grasping things difficult. This is a dream Gondry has experienced himself and claims that it's not an uncommon archetypal image.

"I had this recurring nightmare that I would wake up with the feeling of having huge hands," he explains. "After I did the film, I went to an exhibition (and saw a picture of) this little guy with exactly the same hand. (He was) originally call the homunculus a representation of our body and our mind. ... Because on your hands we have much more nerve endings (than) on your arm. ... So this comes from experience really. It's just good to feel that it's not a random feeling. It corresponds to really the configuration, the connection of my brain to my body."

Stephane's most common dream, however, is hosting his own TV show, which is a low-budget affair shot with cardboard cameras and featuring a screen that plays his memories. These scenes were influenced by the concept of lucid dreaming, a state in which the sleeper is aware that they're dreaming and is able to control the content of the dream. Gondry shares one of his experiences with lucid dreaming.

"When I'm not trying to have sex with some ladies, as most men do in their lucid dreams," says Gondry, "when I'm done with that, I keep experimenting. I remember a dream when I went into a recording studio and I was changing the quality of the song and really thinking it's fascinating how my brain is recreating all this information and yet I can tweak it and put more treble and bass and make it go faster. So I guess it's interacting with the fact that I'm a director and I'm kind of directing my dreams."

In a sense, Bernal is a dream version of Gondry, albeit a more cinematic one.

"I think he's very handsome so he would give me a little hard time to really imagine that he would feel this rejection," says the director. "So I have to push him into the most awkward place that he wasn't initially. But he has this range that goes from being really comical and sometimes even sarcastic to very dramatic and even aggressive. There was this moment before he dives through the window and he does something that's very like Charlie Chaplin, which I always loved. The fact that he's a little smaller like Chaplin was gives him this energy to fight back."

Helping to create that awkwardness is Stephane's poor French-speaking skills, having grown up elsewhere and speaking primarily Spanish and English. But when he returns to his mother's building and gets his new job, he's forced to try to express his already disordered mind to others in this foreign tongue. In real life, Bernal was similarly uncomfortable speaking the language.

"(Gael) promised me he would learn French and he didn't really," says Gondry with a laugh. "I had to adapt to him. But, on the other hand, the actress who plays his Mom, Miou-Miou, who is one of the most famous French actresses, she refused to speak English. But it was for the best of the film because if you look, it would make total sense that with his mother he would only speak French because he grew up with her and she would not talk English to him like my mother would not speak English to me."

And while "Science of Sleep" addresses the problems of understanding the psychological communication of dreams as well as spoken language, it's the age-old troubled communication between the sexes that causes the central conflict in Stephane and Stephanie's relationship.

"These two characters are like soul mates for each other. They bond with each other on the creative level in a way that nobody else can," explains Gondry. "From the guy's point of view, it should translate into a physical relationship. And since it doesn't work out this way, it's awful for him. And from the girl's perspective, the fact that it should be translated in a physical way, it's an affront and it's hurtful for her because it's like the fact that he should be physical would ruin (their relationship). She finds it so precious. So there are all positive things that add up to something quite negative and in the very end, I think it's open to anybody to believe that they'll end up together or not."

Director Michel Gondry aims to host low budget game show.

Brothers and Sisters premiers this Sunday

By Chuck Barney
CONTRA COSTA TIMES

It never fails. Coming into every television season, there is a so-called "troubled" show. In fact, it's such a common occurrence that I'm gleefully waiting for some network to officially bestow upon a series that actual title: "Stay tuned for 'The Troubled Show,' starring ..."

It requires remarkable versatility to earn the "troubled" tag. In original pilot form, a show must be good enough to earn a network's blessing, but bad enough to provoke major tinkering.

This season, our little trouble-maker is ABC's "Brothers & Sisters," a dreary family drama in which Calista Flockhart returns to prime time amid a stellar cast that includes, among others, Sally Field, Rachel Griffiths and Ron Rifkin.

That kind of star power isn't normally going to prompt a frantic SOS, but after taking one look at the "Brothers & Sisters" pilot, ABC deemed it an overstuffed mess. And so, some key actors were dumped, producers were shuffled, Field was signed up in the 11th hour and several scenes were rewritten and re-shot.

But while the overhauled pilot certainly has its moments, it's no masterpiece. The re-shoots have given it a disjointed feel, and the tone of the show is so tediously earnest it creaks. If this is the new-and-improved version, we should kiss the rings of those who kept us from having to slog through the original.

Flockhart plays Kitty Walker, one of several adult siblings of a wealthy California-based family. Eight years after Alls McBeal, she's a conservative radio pundit who is reuniting with the family (a covey of diehard liberals) just as it's about to experience a seismic upheaval.

Kitty and her mother (Field) have some issues. After 9/11, the daughter apparently spent so much time pushing patriotism and retribution that youngest brother Justin (Dave Annable) hightailed it to Afghanistan. It was a traumatic tour of duty that left him emotionally scarred and mom stewing in her own anger.

All of which bothers the mild-mannered Mr. Walker (Tom Skerritt) to no end. He just wants everyone to get along and the clan to click on all cylinders. But where's the drama in that? Meanwhile, sister Sara (Griffiths) and brother Tommy (Balthazar Getty), who both work for the family company, have started to uncover some suspicious financial shenanigans. Someone's hiding something (keep an eye on that Rifkin guy) and things are about to get ugly.

"Brothers & Sisters" trudges along rather aimlessly for most of its first hour until a tragic event jolts it from its stupor. Beforehand, there are some nice moments: the scenes between Field and Flockhart crackle with dramatic intensity, but not enough to give the show any real traction. Dense and angst-laden, it also seems like a strange fit in a time slot previously occupied by the frothy "Grey's Anatomy."

The guess here is that viewers will give "Brothers & Sisters" some slack early on. This cast is simply too good to ignore. But unless the show can quickly gel and lighten up a bit, its troubles are just beginning.

UMass struggling to score

"We're going to treat it like a conference game," Koch said. "It's our second conference opponent [this season], and we go into conference play next week when [the games] count. We're looking at this game as a game that is going to be important.

"All games are important," he added. "The easiest thing you could say about this game is that it doesn't count as far as the conference standings, so it's not as important as the next nine. But this is an important game because it's the next one we're playing and we got some things we have to sort out from the last two games. And this is the test that we're able to do it in."

The Minutemen are four games above .500, but they still have plenty to improve upon before they play the games that "count."

After opening the season with six shutouts in seven games, UMass got a taste of its own medicine against Vermont and New Hampshire. Both the Catamounts and Wildcats defeated the Minutemen 1-0 at Rudd Field on Sunday and Wednesday, respectively.

The UMass coaching staff stresses communication with the players on the field, especially in the backfield. Sure, it's only two goals in two games, but it was enough to show the former No. 22 team in the nation its mortality.

"It's important that we correct our mistakes and get the job done that we know we need to do," Koch said. "We need to have dedication in the back[field] for 90 minutes. Making sure that we are working together as a whole unit in the back, and not having defensive lapses which have caused two goals to be scored on us."

Koch believes those are some of the key holes to be filled in the next few weeks. Others might say it's the team's lack of scoring.

"Offensively, we need to make sure that when we do get into good opportunities or good areas of the field to create opportunities, we're doing just that," Koch added. "We've done that okay at times, but we need to do it at a more consistent level."

The Minutemen have been held scoreless in their last two games, and their inability to convert on a number of scoring chances in those two games is a cause for concern.

"The goalkeepers have stopped our shots," Koch said. "We are not a high goal-scoring team. So for us to get the opportunities that we've had in the last two games and not put any of them away, I would have to say in the soccer world, that yes, we're struggling up top.

"Being shutout two games in a row, our offense isn't on fire, lets put it that way," he added. "They're pretty cold."

Sophomore Prince Oluwa (left) is tied for second on the team in points with four. He has one goal and two assists on the season.

Catamounts hope to end UM's success

Vermont coach Kerry Dziczkaniec said she first began scouting Bradley because of her character and work ethic and her willingness to work hard with her teammates.

Rudy credits Bradley with being the best player on the Vermont roster.

However, the Minutewomen have a hardworking goalie of their own in Walker.

Walker has started every game this season and allowed only six goals. So far she's blocked 28 of the 63 shots attempted against her. That's good enough for a .824 saves percentage.

UVM has one devastating weapon at its disposal, the offside trap.

An offside trap is a strategic maneuver in which all defenders – with the exception of the goalkeeper – move up the field when an opposing player starts to make a run towards the goal with a teammate ready to pass her the ball. The shift in the line of defenders puts the attacker offsides when she is passed the ball.

This is a tactic that Vermont executes to perfection.

In their game last week, the Catamounts forced the Dartmouth Big Green into 11 offside penalties.

Such a strategy has potential to suffocate the performance of someone like junior forward Britt Canfield, but Rudy isn't worried.

"She's one of the better players I've had here at beating an offside trap," Rudy said. "But, we don't know how they're going to play it. If they're going to play it up at midfield, I think Britt's going to have some breakaways. If they play it really deep, then she's less effective because she needs a little bit of space to run with it.

"[If that happens] it means we really have to play good possessions and work hard on getting around the corners and getting to the endline and not get up the middle to go down the flanks," Rudy explained.

He added that he expects to see a solid performance from last Tuesday's heroine, junior midfielder Jenny Roehrig, but suggests that someone else might answer the call-to-duty.

"It seems like someone different steps up every game," Rudy said. "We certainly put a whole lot of effort into the [win over UConn]. Can we produce those efforts back-to-back within three or four days? That's my question. And I hope that we can."

UMass will try to carry the momentum from the win over UConn into the weekend. Before Tuesday, they hadn't beaten the Huskies them since 1993.

Tournament isn't quite what it used to be

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

STRAFFAN, Ireland – This must be a big event because thousands of fans spent two hours waiting in buses the other day just for the chance to stand on their muddy tiptoes in the wind and rain to try and get a glimpse of someone hitting a practice shot.

It must be big because the Rolex shop in the merchandise tent is doing great business, and you can buy Waterford crystal with a golfer etched on it for the bargain price of 795 euros.

Surely it's big because there were guys in skirts banging drums and women in huge costumes floating around Thursday while a band played under a giant golf ball in an opening ceremony that was bizarre even by Olympic standards.

It's got to be big because not only does Tiger Woods have his game face on, but his dander is up.

Apparently, though, it's not that big to everyone, even in this golf-happy land.

"Some of the non-golfing public still thinks this is a horse race," an Irish bus driver said.

That's understandable. Some of the top social events in Ireland revolve around horse races, and it's not exactly like the country has had anything else to compare with the bloated excess the Ryder Cup brings to town.

Certainly it has never seen the likes of an opening ceremony like the one that took place on the green lawns of The K Club, where costumed performers danced, a band played and men in blazers sat stiffly on stage.

The intent, according to organizers, was "to deliver the visual impact which one would typically associate with the opening of the Olympics."

It delivered, all right, with all the weirdness of an Olympics opening. The only thing missing was Yoko Ono screeching "Imagine" as she did a few months ago in Turin.

The night before, the scene was more one of opulence than weirdness. A thousand or so of the closest friends of the people who run the Ryder Cup dressed up in their finest and feasted on Irish rack of lamb and assorted desserts. Outside the dinner, there was a line of new $100,000 BMWs waiting with motors running to take players and guests home.

Good thing Jackie Burke Jr. wasn't there. Burke played on five Ryder Cup teams in the 1950s, and was the playing captain in 1957. Nothing prepared him, though, for what he saw when Hal Sutton invited him to be an assistant captain for the 2004 team that got trounced at Oakland Hills in Michigan two years ago.

The $2,000 an hour the PGA of America offered Burke to help pay for a private jet to get him there was just the start. There was the wardrobe worth at least $10,000, the jewelry and other goodies stuffed into six huge bags waiting for him in the hotel room, and the $1,500 tuxedo for the opening dinner gala.

"Those tuxedos were one of the reasons we lost," Burke said in his book, "It's Only a Game: Words of Wisdom from a Lifetime in Golf." "The opulence surrounding the Ryder Cup was staggering, and the tuxes were symbols of that. From the moment we landed in Detroit, we were feted with lavish gifts, world-class entertainment and all manner of personal attention."

That, no doubt, is why U.S. captain Tom Lehman tried to put things in perspective when he and his team landed in Dublin earlier this week.

"We're not dealing with world peace. We're not dealing with AIDS in Africa," Lehman said. "We are playing a contest. We're playing a game, which is an important game, and everybody is passionate about it. They want to win, but the end of the day, it is just a game."

Lehman was right, of course. But the time for such purity is long past.

With history against them, U.S. depending on rookies in Ireland

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

STRAFFAN, Ireland – Everybody has a theory on what to do with rookies.

Saddled with a half-dozen in his only stint as Europe's Ryder Cup captain in 1997, Seve Ballesteros simply persuaded the one he liked the least to disappear. Nine years later, American captain Tom Lehman is leaning heavily on two of his four from the get-go, sending out J.J. Henry and Brett Wetterich – though not together – in Friday's opening session.

Captain Tom Lehman leads the Americans into the Ryder Cup this weekend. The U.S. has lost four of the last five tournaments to Europe.

"At some point, you're a rookie," Lehman said Thursday, less than 24 hours from the opening tee shot. "When I was a rookie, I played the very first match and hit the very first shot at Oak Hill."

To quiet his jangling nerves, Lehman recalled focusing on something Lanny Wadkins, his captain in 1995, said just before he sent Lehman out: "'I put you here because I know you can do it.'"

"And I think," Lehman added, "that's why you play the guys you play."

Henry, though, has a slightly different take on why he and fellow rookies Wetterich, Vaughn Taylor and Zach Johnson might see a lot of playing time.

"Let's be honest," Henry said recently. "We've lost four of five. We haven't been setting the world on fire. We might not be household names, but a lack of history might not be all that bad a thing in this case."

Besides, it's worked out plenty of times before – for the Europeans, anyway.

Under the current format – four better-ball and four alternate-shot matches both Friday and Saturday, followed by a dozen singles matches Sunday – every one of the 12 team members has to play at least once. But because their teams have had fewer bona fide superstars and even fewer overheated egos to ice down, the Europeans haven't been afraid to trot theirs out early and often.

In that same 1995 Ryder Cup where Lehman made his debut, an obscure Irishman named Philip Walton sank the winning putt in the next-to-last singles match Sunday against the much more experienced Jay Haas. In 2002, it was another, slightly less obscure Irishman named Paul McGinley who clinched Europe's win with a 6-footer to halve his match with Jim Furyk.

The only U.S. win in the last five cups, in fact, came at Brookline in 1999, when European captain Mark James ignored the philosophy of his predecessors. He sat three of his seven rookies until the singles matches, then watched the strategy backfire as the Americans steamrolled the trio en route to a 6-0 lead and the greatest comeback in Ryder Cup history.

Ian Woosnam, this year's Euro boss, has only two rookies on the squad, Swedes Robert Karlsson and Henrik Stenson. Karlsson gets his feet wet in Friday's second match, pairing with World Match Play winner Paul Casey against Henry and Stewart Cink.

Karlsson might feel he has something extra to prove, since the Swede was mysteriously left off the 1999 team by James in favor of Scot Andrew Coltart, even though Karlsson amassed more qualifying points. But that wouldn't make him much different from any of the other rookies.

"So what if we're rookies? So what if it's our first time in the Ryder Cup? It's still just golf," said Taylor, who, like Wetterich, has never officially competed in match play. "I've played golf for 20 years. I know I will be nervous, but I don't think we're all suddenly going to forget how to play."

Not the way Chris Riley did, anyway.

He was a rookie on the 2004 team that suffered the Americans' worst pummeling ever. Riley had to sit until Saturday morning just to get a game, but after pairing with Tiger Woods to win a better-ball match, he begged off playing alternate-shot in the afternoon and captain Hal Sutton reluctantly went along. In a recent book, Jackie Burke, a two-time U.S. captain himself and Sutton's assistant in 2004, recalled how that little bit of momentum Riley and Woods managed to generate was quickly squandered.

"If Chris had told me he had no experience with the foursomes," Burke wrote, "I would have told him, 'Most of us have little or no experience with it. But it works like this. He hits it, then you hit. Now get your ass out there.'"

Of course, that's easier said than done.

Ballesteros had so little faith in rookie Miguel Angel Martin in 1997 that he convinced his fellow Spaniard that a wrist injury was worse than Martin thought, sent him home with a uniform and a team photo, and replaced him with another countryman, Jose Maria Olazabal.

Because they often play such a pivotal role at the Ryder Cup, advice on how to handle rookies has become something of a cottage industry.

No less an authority than Jack Nicklaus, a two-time Ryder Cup captain, was asked awhile back whether he would let a rookie paired with a veteran at the peak of his game hit the opening drive. He answered by explaining that when he plays with one of his sons in a tournament, he always had them tee off first.

"It's best to know," Nicklaus said. "That they have Dad in reserve."

If only everybody had that option.

of the race. They have been working out on the new course, getting adjusted to the new surroundings.

"The practice has been very good, I think our team looks strong, they have been doing speed workouts on the new track," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said. "The team is comfortable with the new course. It's a great course, and the best cross country course UMass has ever had."

The women are led by Junior Christina Deross, who finished fourth at the Dartmouth meet.

"Christina is very serious about being a good athlete, she has had the best summer of training and is at a different level," LeFreniere said.

The surprise of the team is freshmen Lauren Liuzzo.

"I thought it would take her longer to develop but she is running with [Junior] Amber Sayer," LaFreniere said.

Sayer finished second on the team last week with Liuzzo right behind her.

The Minutewomen have a tough matchup tomorrow.

"BC is a killer team; they are always ranked nationally," LaFreniere noted.

Maine and UMass are closer in competitiveness and should provide a good race. LaFreniere's ideal race would be Christina out in front chasing for the top spots, and the team's two through five runners close behind.

Junior Amber Sayer – one of the team's top runners – has been under the weather and may not run tomorrow. LaFreniere noted that freshmen Stephanie Mattar had a virus, but has recovered and looked great in practice this week.

Notes: This weekend UMass alumnus – and BC coach – Randy Thomas returns to Amherst. Thomas was the first ever Division I All-American for UMass cross country and track and field. Thomas was an assistant cross country and track coach at UMass. He was inducted into the school's Athletic Hall of Fame in 1982.

Charlotte on tap for UM

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

What do you know about shutouts?

The Massachusetts men's soccer team knows too much about them. Before yesterday, that comment could have been a compliment. Instead, the Minutemen (6-2-1) are on a two-game losing skid in which they have been held scoreless in both contests.

UMass travels to Charlotte (4-3-1) to face the 49ers tomorrow night at 7 p.m. in the first match of a five-game road trip.

The 49ers are 4-1-1 at home this season. They are led by senior Jered Turner, who leads the team in goals with three. He is tied with senior Michael Rose for the most points on the team with seven.

Tomorrow night will also mark the last game UMass will play before Atlantic 10 play begins a week from today at George Washington. Charlotte is an A-10 team, but each team is allotted only nine conference games this year.

The game against the 49ers will not count in the conference standings. That doesn't mean UMass coach Sam Koch is going to give his players the day off.

Junior Kenny Cook has anchored the UMass defense this season. The co-captain has helped the Minutemen hold opponents to 81 shots enroute to six shutouts.

Minutewomen take success to Vermont

The Massachusetts women's soccer team (6-1-0) is set to take on the Vermont Catamounts (1-5-1) today at Centennial Field in Burlington, Vt.

UMass is coming off a 2-1 upset win over rival Connecticut this past Tuesday. The Maroon and White hadn't beaten UConn in 13 years. It also snapped a seven-year scoreless drought against the Huskies with the exciting victory at Rudd Field.

The Minutewomen will now look to exact revenge on the team that handed them a tough 2-1 loss last season.

"It was the one game of last year [that I'd like to have back]," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "Just because we dominated so much of it and [redshirt junior goalkeeper Kristin] Walker had her one error of the year...which allowed a soft goal to get in."

The score tied the game up at one-all. UMass sophomore Britt Canfield had scored the game's first goal in the 19th minute.

Forty-one seconds later, with half a minute left in the first period, Vermont took the lead when junior Amy Cochran was left wide open at the back post and headed a ball past Walker.

The second half was uneventful, and UVM was able to pull away with the comeback victory.

The Catamounts have struggled so far this season, with a 2-1 win over Siena being their only triumph this year.

Rudy said that Vermont's losing record will not change how his players approach the game.

"I hope that [our performance] will be at a high level," he said. "The question is, 'Within a week, can we duplicate the same sort of effort that we had against UConn?'"

Rudy also said that Vermont's poor record may be a little deceiving.

"Although, record-wise, they have not done greatly this year they've been in every game," Rudy explained. "Besides their Virginia game [a 6-0 loss] they've been in every game."

Rudy paid kudos to Vermont's freshman Eliza Bradley, whom he calls an "excellent goalkeeper."

UMass has first home game against UConn

By Joe Melone

The Massachusetts field hockey team (2-7) hopes to rebound from a three-game losing streak including a heartbreaking 5-4 overtime loss at Dartmouth on Wednesday.

No. 10 Connecticut (6-2) pays a visit to Garber Field on Saturday at 3 p.m. It is the first home game for UMass this season.

The Minutewomen had a series of leads on Wednesday, but were unable to fend off a feisty Big Green attack and eventually needed to stage a comeback of their own. They tied the game at four with just over nine minutes remaining on a Lauren Gillespie score. It was all for naught, however, as Dartmouth scored just 27 seconds into the extra session.

The defeat was not the only loss for the Maroon and White, sophomore forward Erin Parker suffered an injury in the second half. She missed the remainder of the game. The Minutewomen hope to get her back in time for this Saturday's contest.

UConn on the other hand, is coming off a well-deserved 1-0 victory Wednesday at Harvard. The game wasn't nearly as close as the score showed as the Huskies dominated play – outshooting the Crimson 13-3. The Huskies have won three out of their last four games overall – outscoring their opponents 15-5 during this stretch.

The Huskies are led offensively by junior Lizzy Peiijs. The forward has tallied six goals in eight games thus far, and was named Big East Offensive Player of the Week for the period ending September 11th. The Dutch-national received All-Big East honors last season and is well on her way to another successful campaign.

Last season's leading scorer, Kristin Galuski, also named to the All-Big East team, has been relatively quiet recording just one goal while appearing in every game, but remains a threat to opposing defenses.

Another reason for the Huskies success has been the defensive play of sophomore Jennifer Kleinhans. The German-born defender has started all eight games in the UConn backfield. She was named to the All-Big East team in her freshman year and is expected to garner national recognition in the coming years. She has contributed offensively as well, netting one goal on a penalty corner and handing out five assists.

Redshirt freshman goalkeeper Andrea Mainiero has been solid in net for the Huskies. While the rookie hasn't been unbeatable, her performance has gone a long way to ensure her team's success. She has allowed more than one goal only once and recorded two shutouts.

The two schools have met 40 times in the past with the Huskies holding the advantage (25-12-3). The Minutewomen haven't defeated UConn since 2000.

Regardless of the outcomes of the past three games, the Minutewomen do have a few things to be encouraged by. The loss at Dartmouth saw the offensive emergence of junior midfielder Kara Murphy and freshman forward Anty Novak.

Murphy recorded a goal and dished out two assists while Novak recorded the first two points of her collegiate career with two assists.

Playing a complete game has been a struggle for the Minutewomen thus far. Only against Harvard did they play two solid halves of field hockey and even then they fell behind early.

Gina Sanders has contributed one goal and an assist in 2006. Her lone score was the game-winner against Harvard on Sept. 4.

Senior Nadia Villarael has been a key piece to the Minutewomen's success. She has game-winning goals against Albany and Harvard.

Senior Kaylan Jaggasar has played in all eight games for the Minutewomen this season. She's recorded one shut on goal.

Young team turns in impressive performance

By Mike Walsh

The Massachusetts women's tennis team kicked off its fall season last weekend at the Eastern Collegiate Invitational Tournament in West Point, N.Y. in impressive fashion. Although losing and unaccustomed to playing together, the team had a strong showing and could not have asked for a better start to this year's campaign.

Freshman Ellen de Jong and sophomore transfer Laura Murillo joined forces to take the title the for Group B doubles. UMass coach Judy Dixon said she was "pleasantly surprised" with the victory. It was the first time the two newcomers had played together.

Murillo and de Jong pulled off the win in a close bout against Ashley Pertuzzi and Alison Cech of Connecticut in the quarter finals, 8-6, and then followed that up with an 8-2 victory over a pair from Army in the semis. In the championship match, the Massachusetts combo prevailed in a back-and-forth affair against Monique Burton and Ashley Constantine of West Virginia, 8-6.

In Group A doubles, senior co-captain Michele Spiess teamed up with freshman Maude Lecluyse, another first time grouping. The pair played very well over the first few days of the tournament pulling off victories of 8-2 in the quarters and 8-1 in the semis against teams from Albany and Marist, respectively. They fell just short in the finals to No. 1 Seeded Stacey Percival and Natalia Prinz of West Virginia, 8-9(7-5), in a tiebreak.

In singles play, junior co-captain Masha Pozar was able to advance to the quarters in group one, but was taken down in a hard fought match in the quarter finals 3-6, 6-4, 6-3 by Sarah Mayer of Siena.

In other singles play, sophomore Lauren MacKay won her first two matches of the tournament in group four, but also came up short in the quarterfinals to Brown's Tanja Vucectic. In group two, sophomore Stephanie Gimenez received a bye in the first round but was knocked off by fourth seeded Sarah Giles Madden of Army.

Amazingly, the Minutewomen had only been practicing together for three weeks prior to competing. Dixon said she was "definitely satisfied," with her team's performance, and that this was a great first showing to build upon. She was very pleased with her team's overall effort over the course of the weekend and even though it was just one tournament, starting the year on a positive note is a good base to work and improve upon.

Spiess and Pozar will continue play this weekend at the prestigious Cissy Leary Invitational hosted by the University of Pennsylvania. The invitation will feature top players from top tennis programs across the northeast, such as Harvard and William & Mary. Dixon said that sending two of her players to compete is an "honor."

Spiess and Pozar will take part in both singles and doubles play and it will be great for them to get out on the courts and get back into the swing of things.

Junior Masha Pozar (above), along with Michele Spiess will compete this weekend in the prestigious Cissy Leary Invitational Tournament.

Cross country hosts lone home meet

By Steve Games
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts men and women cross country teams will have a home meet against Boston College and Maine on Saturday. The women start at 10 a.m. and the men are after at 10:30 a.m.

Two weeks ago both teams finished third at the Dartmouth Invitational.

At home last year, the UMass men's team beat Maine and Vermont, while the women finished third. This year, the teams will be running on a new course on the UMass campus, behind the North Apartments.

The men's team is looking to improve upon the third place finish at Dartmouth. They are well rested after the week between meets.

"It's been a good week, they got into a good routine and that keeps them more focused," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said.

The team has no serious injuries but the flu has been going around and it may keep some runners from racing.

In the last meet, freshman Nicolai Naranjo was impressive, finishing first for the Minutemen. The team is stocked with a talented group of freshmen runners. O'Brien wants the young runners to be more cautious this race, and for them not to start out too fast.

"It's always surprising to see what the freshmen bring to the table, they're a confident and talented group," O'Brien said.

With a young core, experience is hard to find on this team. The few upperclassmen are strong leaders.

"[It] looks like there is leadership starting at the junior class with Ryan Durkin and Nils Fischer, I see their confidence growing," O'Brien said.

This is UMass' only home meet this season, but it doesn't quite have an advantage.

"We don't have home-field advantage, this is a new course, last year we raced at Amherst College," O'Brien explained. "No one on our team has raced on the course, but they have had the opportunity to practice on it."

In the past couple of years the UMass teams have faced Vermont and Maine, but because of schedule changes BC will run at UMass.

"BC is a tough team always a top five team in New England," O'Brien said.

The Minutewomen have also been hit by the flu this week and might have some runners held out

Conference aims to improve water

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

This past weekend, the Graduate Employees Organization (GEO) of the University of Massachusetts endorsed the "Our Communities, Our Water Conference," which was held at UMass.

The conference aimed to formalize a regional network of organizations and individuals working on the issue of water and the question of who will control it. Many of the presenters at the event are currently battling all across the region for control of a resource they call "the oil of the 21st century."

"We have taken this step because we feel that the privatization of water, which this conference is concerned with educating the public about, is linked to the privatization of education," said Naate Johnson, a GEO staff member.

The event was headlined by speakers, including Frances Moore-Lappé, author of "Democracy's Edge," Ray Rogers from the Killer Coke Campaign, Tony Clark from the Polaris Institute, Ruth Caplan from the Alliance for Democracy and UMass alumnus, Jonathan Leavitt, who has spearheaded the water work for Massachusetts Global Action for the past three years.

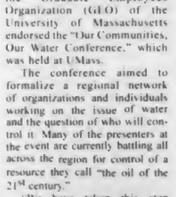
According to MassGlobalAction, "the question of who will own water delivery systems is being driven by corporate interests, their paid lobbyists, and heavily subsidized cross-over government groups. The best interest of communities is not part of the discussion. Neither are the potential long-term impacts to our environment that come with the loss of accountability on a local level."

Armando Flores has a law degree from the University of El Salvador; in 1991 he became co-founder of the Committee for the Defense of the Consumer – CDC; in 1989 and 1990, he was the coordinator of the education program for the Federation of Consumer Cooperatives of El Salvador; between 1991 and 1995 he was Vice Director of CDC; in 1996 he was the Coordinator for the Consumers International for the Central American and the Caribbean region and has been the CDC Director since 1997.

Frances Moore Lappé is the author or coauthor of 15 books. Her 1971 three-million-copy bestseller, "Diet for a Small Planet," describes "the human-made causes of hunger and the power of our everyday choices to create the world we want."

"We think this event will significantly impact the ability of activists to put forward a vision of democratic control of water in the hands of the commons. No one will leave this weekend without a significant understanding of how important this issue is not just on a regional level, but on a national and international level as well," Leavitt said.

The conference also previewed two water documentaries in Northampton, "Water Warrior," directed by UMass alumna, Liz Miller, and "Water First," directed by Amy Hart.



Armando Flores has been the director of the CDC since 1997.

Frances Moore-Lappé, author of "Democracy's Edge," lectured.

University fails to disclose lobbying activity details

Senator Tom Coburn, R-Oklahoma, requested details about all appropriations including the purpose and cost of all university lobbying programs.

By Ryan Richardson

The University of Massachusetts is among 20 universities and academic institutions that didn't respond to a senator's request for the disclosure of lobbying activities related to congressional earmarks.

Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Oklahoma, requested details about all appropriations including the purpose and cost of each project and its accomplishments since 2000. Coburn, chairman of the Senate Federal Financial Management subcommittee, plans to publish an analysis of his inquiries in a report at the end of September, including "grading universities for incomplete responses, or refusals to provide complete responses to questions," according to a press release.
